III. He resolves this difference which Providence makes between one wicked man and another into the wisdom and sovereignty of God (v. 22): Shall any pretend to teach God knowledge? Shall we take upon us to tell God how he should govern the world, what sinner he should spare and whom he should punish? So vast is the disproportion between time and eternity that, if hell be the lot of every sinner at last, it makes little difference if one goes singing thither and another sighing. One dies suddenly, in his full strength, not weakened by age or sickness (v. 23), being wholly at ease and quiet, under no apprehension at all of the approach of death, nor in any fear of it; but, on the contrary, because his breasts are full of milk and his bones moistened with marrow (v. 24), that is, he is healthful and vigorous, and of a good constitution, he counts upon nothing but to live many years in mirth and pleasure. Yet he is cut off in a moment by the stroke of death. Another dies slowly, and with a great deal of previous pain and misery (v. 23), in the bitterness of his soul, such as poor Job was himself now in, and never eats with pleasure, through sickness, or age, or sorrow of mind.

I. Job opposes the opinion of his friends, that the wicked are sure to fall into such visible ruin as Job had now fallen into, upon which principle they condemned Job as a wicked man. "I know your thoughts," says Job (v. 27), "and the devices which you wrongfully imagine against my comfort and honour: and how can such men be convinced?" Job's friends were ready to say, "Where is the house of the prince? (v. 28). Where is Job's house, or the house of his eldest son, in which his children were feasting? Enquire into the circumstances of Job's house and family, and then ask, Where are the dwelling-places of the wicked? and you will soon see that Job's house is in the same predicament with the houses of tyrants and oppressors."

II. He lays down his own judgment to the contrary. He is willing to refer the cause to the next man that comes by (v. 29): "Have you not asked those that go by the way. Turn to which you will, and you will find them all of my mind, that the punishment of sinners is designed more for the other world than for this. Do you not know the tokens of this truth?"

1. What is it that Job here asserts? Two things:—(1) That impenitent sinners will certainly be punished in the other world. (2) That therefore we are not to think it strange if they prosper greatly in this world. Therefore they are spared now, because they are to be punished then. The sinner is here supposed to be the terror of the wise and good, whom he keeps in such awe that none dares declare his way to his face, v. 31. None will take the liberty to reprove him. And, if none dares declare his way to his face, much less dare any repay him what he has done and make him refund what he has obtained by injustice. But there is a day coming when those shall be told of their faults, and those who would not repay the wrongs they had done shall have them repaid to them. He must die; but everything you can think of shall be done to take off the reproach of death. He shall have a splendid funeral—a poor thing for any man to be proud of the prospect of; yet with some it passes for a mighty thing. Well, he shall be brought to the grave in state. He shall have a stately monument erected over him. He shall remain in the tomb with a Hic jacet—Here lies, over him, and a large encomium. The clods of the valley shall be sweet to him; there shall be as much done as can be to take off the noisomeness of the grave. But it is all a jest; what is the light, or what the perfume, to a man that is dead? It shall be alleged, for the lessening of the disgrace of death, that it is the common lot: He has only yielded to fate, and every man shall draw after him, as there are innumerable before him.

2. From all this Job infers the impertinency of their discourses, v. 34. They went upon a wrong hypothesis: "In your answers there remains falsehood." "You comfort me in vain." Where there is not truth there is little comfort to be expected.

CHAP. XXII

Eliphaz here leads on a third attack upon poor Job, in which Bildad followed him, but Zophar drew back, and quitted the field. In this chapter, I. Eliphaz checks him for his complaints of God, and of his dealings with him, as if he thought God had done him wrong, ver. 2–4. II. He charges him with many high crimes and misdemeanours, for which he supposes God was now punishing him. 1. Oppression and injustice, ver. 5–11. 2. Atheism and infidelity, ver 12–14. III. He compares his case to that of the old world, ver. 15–20. IV. He gives him very good counsel, assuring him that, if he could take it, God would return in mercy to him and he should return to his former prosperity, ver. 21–30.

Verses 1–4

What Eliphaz says here is unjustly applied to Job, but in itself it is very true and good,

I. That when God does us good it is not because he is indebted to us. Eliphaz here shows that the righteousness and perfection of the best man in the world are no real benefit or advantage to God, and therefore cannot be thought to merit anything from him. The gains of religion are infinitely greater than the losses of it, and so it will appear when they are balanced. But can a man be thus profitable to God? No, for such is the perfection of God that he cannot receive any benefit or advantage by men; what can be added to that which is infinite? Is it any gain to him, any real addition to his glory or wealth, if we make our way perfect? God has indeed expressed himself in his word well pleased with the righteous; his countenance beholds them and his delight is in them and their prayers; but all that adds nothing to the infinite satisfaction which the Eternal Mind has in itself.

II. That when God restrains or rebukes us it is not because he is in danger from us, or jealous of us (v. 4): "Will he reprove thee for fear of thee." Satan indeed suggested to our first parents that God forbade them the tree of knowledge, for fear of them, lest they should be as gods, and so become rivals with him; but it was a base insinuation. God rebukes the good because he loves them, but he never rebukes the great because he fears them.

Eliphaz and his companions had condemned Job, in general, as a wicked man and a hypocrite. Eliphaz here positively and expressly charges him with many high crimes and misdemeanours. "Come," says Eliphaz, "we have been too long beating about the bush, too tender of Job. It is high time to deal plainly with him. We must plainly tell him, Thou art the man, the tyrant, the oppressor, the atheist, we have been speaking of all this while. Is not thy wickedness great? Certainly it is, or else thy troubles would not be so great." For aught I know, Eliphaz, in accusing Job falsely, as he does here, was guilty of as great a sin and as great a wrong to Job as the Sabeans and Chaldeans that robbed him; for a man's good name is more precious and valuable than his wealth. Eliphaz could produce no instances of Job's guilt in any of the particulars that follow here, but seems resolved to calumniate boldly, and throw all the reproach he could on Job, not doubting but that some would cleave to him. Job, whom God himself praised as the best man in the world, is here represented by one of his friends, and he a wise and good man too, as one of the greatest villains in nature.

I. He charges him with oppression and injustice, that, when he was in prosperity, he not only did no good with his wealth and power, but did a great deal of hurt with them. This was utterly false, as appears by the account Job gives of himself (ch. xxix. 12, &c.) and the character God gave of him, ch. i. He tells him he had been cruel and unmerciful to the poor. Thou hast taken a pledge from thy brother for nought, or, as the LXX. read it, Thou hast taken thy brethren for pledges, and that for nought, imprisoned them, enslaved them, because they had nothing to pay,—that he had taken the very clothes of his insolvent tenants and debtors, so that he had stripped them naked. He had not been charitable to the poor: "Thou hast not given so much as a cup of cold water to the weary to drink, nay, thou hast withholden bread from the hungry in their extremity. Poor widows thou hast sent away empty from thy doors with a sad heart, v. 9. Those who came to thee for justice, thou didst send away unheard, unhelped; and, worst of all, the arms of the fatherless have been broken; those that could help themselves but little thou hast quite disabled to help themselves." This, which is the blackest part of the charge, is but insinuated: The arms of the fatherless have been broken. "They have been broken by those under thee, and thou hast connived at it, which brings thee under the guilt." He had been partial to the rich and great (v. 8): "The poor were not fed at thy door, while the rich were feasted at thy table." He attributes all his present troubles to these supposed sins (v. 10, 11). "Snares are round about thee, and others are as hard upon thee as thou hast been upon the poor. No sin makes a louder cry there than unmercifulness; and, accordingly, sudden fear troubles thee." Those that have not shown mercy may justly be denied the comfortable hope that they shall find mercy; and then what can they expect but snares, and darkness, and continual fear?

II. He charges him with atheism, infidelity, and gross impiety; he that did not fear God did not regard men. He would have it thought that Job was an Epicurean, who did indeed own the being of God, but denied his providence.

1. Eliphaz referred to an important truth, which he thought, if Job had duly considered it, would have prevented him from being so passionate in his complaints and bold in justifying himself (v. 12): Is not God in the height of heaven? There he is pleased to manifest himself in a way peculiar to the upper world, and thence he is pleased to manifest himself in a way suited to this lower world. When we behold the height of the stars, how high they are, we should, at the same time, also consider the transcendant majesty of God, who is above the stars, and how high he is.

2. He charged it upon Job that he made a bad use of this doctrine, which he might have made so good a use of, v. 13. "This is holding the truth in unrighteousness; thou art willing to own that God is in the height of heaven but thence thou inferrest, How doth God know?" Eliphaz suspected that Job had such a notion of God as this, that, because he is in the height of heaven, it is therefore impossible for him to see and hear what is done at so great a distance as this earth, especially since there is a dark cloud (v. 13), many thick clouds (v. 14), that come between him and us, and are a covering to him; so as if God had eyes of flesh, ch. x. 4. Distance of place creates no difficulty to him who fills immensity, any more than distance of time to him who is eternal. Or, He walks in the circuit of heaven, and has enough to do to enjoy himself and his own perfections and glory in that bright and quiet world; why should he trouble himself about us? This is gross absurdity, as well as gross impiety, which Eliphaz here fathers upon Job; for it supposes that the administration of government is a burden and disparagement to the supreme governor and that the acts of justice and mercy are a toil to a mind infinitely wise, holy, and good. If the sun, a creature, and inanimate, can with the light and influence reach this earth, and every part of it (Ps. xix. 6), even from that vast height of the visible heavens in which he is, and in the circuit of which he walks, and that through many a thick and dark cloud, shall we question it concerning the Creator?

Eliphaz, having endeavoured to convict Job, here endeavours to awaken him to a sense of his danger by reason of sin; and this he does by comparing his case with that of the sinners of the old world, who were overflown with a flood (v. 16), and the remnant of whom the fire consumed (v. 20), namely, the Sodomites, who, in comparison of the old world, were but a remnant. Eliphaz would have Job to mark the old way which wicked men have trodden (v. 15). They said to God, Depart from us; and then what could the Almighty do with them but cut them off? Those who will not submit to God's golden sceptre must expect to be broken to pieces with his iron rod. Others make it to denote: "What has he done to oblige us? What can he do in a way of wrath to make us miserable, or in a way of favour to make us happy?" The Lord will not do good, neither will he do evil.

Eliphaz shows the absurdity of this in one word, and that is, calling God the Almighty; for, if he be so, what cannot he do? Yet he had filled their houses with good things, v. 18. Many have their houses full of goods but their hearts empty of grace, and thereby are marked for ruin. But the counsel of the wicked is far from me. Job had said so (ch. xxi. 16) and Eliphaz will not be behind with him. If they cannot agree in their own principles concerning God, yet they agree in renouncing the principles of those that live without God in the world. They take occasion thence to expose the folly of sinners and show how ridiculous their principles are. "Our substance is not cut down, as theirs was, and as thine is; we continue to prosper, which is a sign that we are the favourites of Heaven, and in the right." The same rule that served him to condemn Job by served him to magnify himself and his companions by. His substance is cut down; therefore he is a wicked man; ours is not; therefore we are righteous.

Eliphaz had laid before Job the miserable condition of a wicked man, that he might frighten him into repentance. Here, on the other hand, he shows him the happiness which those may be sure of that do repent, that he might allure and encourage him to it. Ministers must try both ways in dealing with people, must speak to them from Mount Sinai by the terrors of the law, and from Mount Sion by the comforts of the gospel, must set before them both life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse.

I. The good counsel which Eliphaz gives to Job; it was built upon a false supposition that he was a wicked man. 1. Acquaint now thyself with God: be not such a stranger to him as thou hast made thyself by casting off the fear of him and restraining prayer before him. It is our honour that we are made capable of this acquaintance, our misery that by sin we have lost it, our privilege that through Christ we are invited to return to it. 2. "Be at peace, at peace with thyself. Be at peace with thy God; be reconciled to him." 3. Receive the law from his mouth, v. 22. "Having made thy peace with God, submit to his government, and resolve to be ruled by him, that thou mayest keep thyself in his love." 4. Lay up his word in thy heart. It is not enough to receive it, but we must retain it, Prov. iii. 18. 5. Return to the Almighty, v. 23. "Do not only turn from sin, but turn to God and thy duty. Do not only turn towards the Almighty in some good inclinations and good beginnings, but return to him; return home to him, quite to him." 6. Put away iniquity far from thy tabernacle. This was the advice Zophar gave him, ch. xi. 14. "Let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacle. Put iniquity far off, the further the better, not only from thy heart and hand, but from thy house."

II. The encouragement which Eliphaz gives Job, that he shall be very happy, if he will but take this good counsel. In general, "Thereby good shall come unto thee (v. 21). Thou art now ruined and brought down, but, if thou return to God, thou shalt be built up again, and thy present ruins shall be repaired. Thy family shall be built up in children, thy estate in wealth, and thy soul in holiness and comfort."

1. Temporal blessings should be bestowed abundantly on him. It is promised, He shall be very rich (v. 23): "Thou shalt lay up gold as dust, in such great abundance, and shalt have plenty of silver (v. 25), whereas now thou art poor and stripped of all." Thou shalt have silver of strength (for so the word is), which, being honestly got, will wear well—silver like steel. Wealth is a blessing indeed when we are not ensnared with the love of it. Thou shalt lay up gold as dust, and as the stones of the brooks. So little shalt thou value it or expect from it that thou shalt lay it at thy feet (Acts iv. 35), not in thy bosom. Yet he shall be very safe; for the Almighty shall be thy defender; nay, he shall be thy defence, v. 25. He shall be thy gold; so it is in the margin, and it is the same word that is used (v. 24) for gold, but it signifies also a strong-hold, because money is a defence, Eccles. vii. 12. Worldlings make gold their god, saints make God their gold; and those that are enriched with his favour and grace may truly be said to have abundance of the best gold, and best laid up.

2. He should be enriched with spiritual blessings: "For then shalt thou have thy delight in the Almighty; and thus the Almighty comes to be thy gold by thy delighting in him, as worldly people delight in their money." Then shalt thou lift up thy face to God with boldness, and not be afraid, as thou now art, to draw near to him. "Thou shalt by prayer send letters to God: Thou shalt make thy prayer" (the word is, Thou shalt multiply thy prayers) "unto him, and he will not think thy letters troublesome, though many and long. He shall hear thee, and make it to appear he does so by what he does for thee and in thee." He should have inward satisfaction in the management of all his outward affairs (v. 28): "Thou shalt decree a thing and it shall be established unto thee," that is, "Thou shalt frame all thy projects and purposes with so much wisdom, and grace, and resignation to the will of God, that the issue of them shall be to thy heart's content. Thou shalt commit thy works unto the Lord by faith and prayer, and then thy thoughts shall be established; thou shalt be easy and pleased, whatever occurs, Prov. xvi. 3. "Whereas now thou complainest of darkness round about thee, then the light shall shine on thy ways;" that is, "God shall guide and direct thee." Even in times of common calamity and danger he should have abundance of joy and hope (v. 29): "When men are cast down round about thee, desponding, then shalt thou say, There is lifting up."

3. He should be a blessing to his country and an instrument of good to many (v. 30): God shall, in answer to thy prayers, deliver the island of the innocent, and have a regard therein to the pureness of thy hands. He shall deliver those that are not innocent, and they are delivered by the pureness of thy hands; so it may be read, and most probably. Note, A good man is a public good. Sinners fare the better for saints, whether they are aware of it or no. Eliphaz and his three friends were delivered by the pureness of Job's hands, ch. xlii. 8.

CHAP. XXIII

This chapter begins Job's reply to Eliphaz. In this reply he appeals to God, begs to have his cause heard, and doubts not but to make it good, having the testimony of his own conscience concerning his integrity. Here seems to be a struggle between flesh and spirit, fear and faith, throughout this chapter. I. He complains of his calamitous condition and especially of God's withdrawings from him, so that he could not get his appeal heard (ver. 2–5), nor discern the meaning of God's dealings with him (ver. 8, 9), nor gain any hope of relief, ver. 13, 14. But, II. In the midst of these complaints he comforts himself with the assurance of God's clemency (ver. 6, 7) and his own integrity, which God himself was a witness to, ver. 10–12.

Job, ill as he is, will not give up the cause.

I. He justifies his own resentments and representations of his trouble (v. 2): "Even today, I own, my complaint is bitter. Even today is my complaint counted rebellion. But," says he, "I do not complain more than there is cause; for my stroke is heavier than my groaning. The pains of my body and the wounds of my spirit are such that I have reason enough for my complaints."

II. He appeals from the censures of his friends to the just judgment of God; and this he thought was an evidence for him that he was not a hypocrite, for then he durst not have made such an appeal as this.

1. He is so sure of the equity of God's tribunal that he longs to appear before it (v. 3): O that I knew where I might find him! This may properly express the pious breathings of a soul convinced that it has by sin lost God and is undone for ever if it recover not its interest in his favour.

2. He is so sure of the goodness of his own cause that he longs to be opening it at God's bar (v. 4): "I would order my cause before him, and set it in a true light." We may apply this to the duty of prayer, in which we have boldness to enter into the holiest and to come even to the footstool of the throne of grace. We have not only liberty of access, but liberty of speech. We have leave to order our cause before God. We durst not be so free with earthly princes as a humble holy soul may be with God. We are allowed, not only to pray, but to plead, not only to ask, but to argue; nay, to fill our mouths with arguments, not to move God (he is perfectly apprized of the merits of the cause without our showing), but to move ourselves, to excite our fervency and encourage our faith in prayer.

3. He is so sure of a sentence in favour of him that he even longed to hear it (v. 5): "I would know the words which he would answer me." This becomes us, in all controversies; let the word of God determine them; let us know what he answers, and understand what he says.

III. He comforts himself with the hope that God would deal favourably with him in this matter, v. 6, 7. The same power that is engaged against proud sinners is engaged for humble saints, who prevail with God by strength derived from him, as Jacob did, Hos. xii. 3. See Ps. lxviii. 35. There in the court of heaven, when the final sentence is to be given, the righteous might dispute with him and come off in his righteousness. Now, even the upright are often chastened of the Lord, and they cannot dispute against it; integrity itself is no fence either against calamity or calumny. Then you shall discern between the righteous and the wicked, whereas now we can scarcely distinguish them, so little is the difference between them as to their outward condition. Then "I shall be delivered for ever from my Judge." Those that are delivered up to God as their owner and ruler shall be for ever delivered from him as their judge and avenger; and there is no flying from his justice but by flying to his mercy.

I. Job complains that he cannot understand the meaning of God's providence concerning him (v. 8, 9): I go forward, but he is not there, &c. He had a great desire to appear before God, and get a hearing of his case, but the Judge was not to be found. Job, no doubt, believed that God is everywhere present, but by reason of the disorder and tumult his spirit was in, he could not fasten upon that which he knew to be in God. He could not perceive wherein he had sinned more than others, nor could he discern what other end God should aim at in afflicting him thus. He was quite at a loss to know what God designed to do with him.

II. He satisfies himself with this, that God himself was a witness to his integrity, and therefore did not doubt but the issue would be good.

1. After Job had almost lost himself in the labyrinth, how contentedly does he sit down with this thought: "Though I know not the way that he takes yet he knows the way that I take," v. 10. It is a great comfort to those who mean honestly that God understands their meaning, though men do not, cannot, or will not. "He knows that, however I may sometimes have taken a false step, yet I have still taken a good way, have chosen the way of truth," that is, he accepts it, and is well pleased with it, as he is said to know the way of the righteous, Ps. i. 6. Job infers, When he hath tried me I shall come forth as gold. The trial will have an end. God will not contend for ever. They shall come forth as gold approved and improved, found to be good and made to be better.

2. Now that which encouraged Job to hope that his present troubles would thus end well was the testimony of his conscience. God's way was the way he walked in (v. 11): "My foot hath held his steps," that is, "held to them, adhered closely to them; the steps he takes." God's word was the rule he walked by, v. 12. He governed himself by the commandment of God's lips. Job kept closely to the law of God. I have esteemed the words of his mouth more than my necessary food; that is, he could as well have lived without his daily bread as without the word of God. I have laid it up (so the word is), as those that lay up provision for a siege, or as Joseph laid up corn before the famine. The word of God is to our souls what our necessary food is to our bodies; it sustains the spiritual life and strengthens us for the actions of life.

Job reasons himself into a sort of patience per force, which he cannot do without reflecting upon God as dealing hardly with him; the worst he says is that God deals unaccountably with him.

I. He lays down good truths, v. 13, 14. 1. That God's counsels are immutable: He is in one mind, and who can turn him? He is one (so some read it) or in one; he has no counsellors by whose interest he might be prevailed with to alter his purpose. Prayer has prevailed to change God's way and his providence, but never was his will or purpose changed; for known unto God are all his works. 2. That his power is irresistible: What his soul desires or designs even that he does. None can stay his hand. Whatever the Lord pleased that did he (Ps. cxxxv. 6), and always will, for it is always best. He performs the thing that is appointed for me. Many such things are with him, that is, He does many things in the course of his providence which we can give no account of, but must resolve into his absolute sovereignty.

II. He makes but a bad use of these good truths. He said, Therefore am I troubled at his presence, v. 15. What confusion poor Job was now in, for he contradicted himself: just now he was troubled for God's absence (v. 8, 9); now he is troubled at his presence. When I consider, I am afraid of him. The Almighty troubled him, and so made his heart soft, a grievous softness, which apprehends everything that is present to be pressing and everything future to be threatening. He quarrels with God. Because I was not cut off before the darkness, v. 17.

CHAP. XXIV

Job now applies himself to a further discussion of the doctrinal controversy between him and his friends concerning the prosperity of wicked people. That many live at ease who yet are ungodly and profane, and despise all the exercises of devotion, he had shown, ch. xxi. Now here he goes further, and shows that many who are mischievous to mankind, and live in open defiance to all the laws of justice and common honesty, yet thrive and succeed in their unrighteous practices in this world. What he had said before (ch. xii. 6), "The tabernacles of robbers prosper," he here enlarges upon. I. Those that openly do wrong to their poor neighbours are not reckoned with, nor the injured righted (ver. 2–12), though the former are very barbarous, ver. 21, 22. II. Those that secretly practise mischief often go undiscovered and unpunished, ver. 13–17. III. That God punishes such by secret judgments and reserves them for future judgments (ver. 18–20, and ver. 23–25), so that, upon the whole matter, we cannot say that all who are in trouble are wicked; for it is certain that all who are in prosperity are not righteous.

Job's friends had been very positive in it that they should soon see the fall of wicked people, how much soever they might prosper for a while. By no means, says Job; though times are not hidden from the Almighty, yet those that know him do not presently see his day, v. 1. God governs the world. Bad times are not hidden from him, though the bad men that make the times bad say one to another, He has forsaken the earth, Ps. xciv. 6, 7. Before Job will enquire into the reasons of the prosperity of wicked men he asserts God's omniscience. He yet asserts that those who know him (that is, wise and good people who are acquainted with him, and with whom his secret is) do not see his day,—the day of his judging for them. We shall shortly know why the judgment is deferred; even the wisest, and those who know God best, do not yet see it. God will exercise their faith and patience, and excite their prayers for the coming of his kingdom, for which they are to cry day and night to him, Luke xviii. 7. Job specifies two sorts of unrighteous ones, whom all the world saw thriving in their iniquity:—

I. Tyrants, and those that do wrong under pretence of law and authority. They remove the land-marks, under pretence that they were misplaced (v. 2), and so they think they effectually secure that to their posterity which they have got wrongfully. This was forbidden by the law of Moses (Deut. xix. 14), under a curse, Deut. xxvii. 17. They violently take away flocks, pretending they are forfeited, and feed thereof. If a poor fatherless child has but an ass of his own to get a little money with, they find some colour or other to take it away. It is all one if a widow has but an ox for what little husbandry she has; under pretence of distraining for some small debt, or arrears of rent, this ox shall be taken for a pledge, though perhaps it is the widow's all. God has taken it among the titles of his honour to be a Father of the fatherless and a judge of the widows; and therefore those will not be reckoned his friends that do not to their utmost protect them; but those he will certainly reckon with as his enemies that vex and oppress them. They love in their hearts to triumph over poor people, whom they turn out of the way of getting relief, threaten to punish them as vagabonds, and so force them to abscond. They pluck the fatherless from the breast; that is, having made poor infants fatherless, they make them motherless too; having taken away the father's life, they break the mother's heart, and so starve the children and leave them to perish. Those who show no mercy to such as lie at their mercy shall themselves have judgment without mercy. They squeeze them so with their extortion that they cause them to go naked without clothing (v. 10). They are very oppressive to the labourers they employ in their service. Those that carry their sheaves are hungry; so some read it (v. 10), and it agrees with v. 11, that those who make oil within their walls, and with a great deal of toil labour at the wine-presses, yet suffer thirst. In the cities also, we see the tears of the oppressed (v. 12): Men groan from out of the city, where the rich merchants and traders are as cruel with their poor debtors as the landlords in the country are with their poor tenants.

II. He speaks of robbers, and those that do wrong by downright force, as the bands of the Sabeans and Chaldeans, which had lately plundered him. Their character is that they are as wild asses in the desert, untamed, untractable, unreasonable. They choose the deserts for their dwelling. The desert is indeed the fittest place for such wild people, ch. xxxix. 6. But no desert can set men out of the reach of God's eye and hand. Their trade is to steal, and to make a prey of all about them. They are diligent and take pains at it: They rise betimes for a prey. They not only rob travellers, but they make incursions upon their neighbours, and reap every one his corn in the field (v. 6), that is, they enter upon other people's ground, cut their corn, and carry it away as freely as if it were their own. They cause the naked, whom they have stripped, not leaving them the clothes to their backs, to lodge, in the cold nights, without clothing, so that they are wet with the showers of the mountains, and, for want of a better shelter, embrace the rock, and are glad of a cave or den in it to preserve them from the injuries of the weather. The impunity of these oppressors and spoilers is expressed in one word (v. 12): Yet God layeth not folly to them, that is, he does not prosecute them with his judgments until he saith, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee, Luke xii. 20.

Another sort of sinners who go unpunished, because they go undiscovered. They rebel against the light, v. 13. Some understand it figuratively. Of their own consciences they profess to know God, but they rebel against the knowledge they have of him. Others understand it literally: they have the daylight, and choose the night as the most advantageous season for their wickedness. In this paragraph Job specifies three sorts of sinners that shun the light:—1. Murderers, v. 14. 2. Adulterers. 3. Housebreakers, v. 16.

And, lastly, Job observes that they are in a continual terror for fear of being discovered (v. 17): The morning is to them even as the shadow of death. The light of the day, which is welcome to honest people, is a terror to bad people. They curse the sun because it discovers them.

Job in the conclusion of his discourse,

I. Gives some further instances of the wickedness of these cruel bloody men. 1. Some are pirates and robbers at sea. To this many interpreters apply those difficult expressions (v. 18), He is swift upon the waters. Their portion is cursed in the earth, and they behold not the way of the vineyards, that is, they despise the employment of those who till the ground and plant vineyards as poor and unprofitable. But others make this a further description of the conduct of those sinners that are afraid of the light: if they be discovered, they get away as fast as they can, and choose to lurk, not in the vineyards, for fear of being discovered, but in some cursed portion, a lonely and desolate place, which nobody looks after. 2. Some are abusive to those that are in trouble, and add affliction to the afflicted. Barrenness was looked upon as a great reproach, and those that fall under that affliction they upbraid with it. This is evil entreating the barren that beareth not (v. 21), or those that are childless. 3. There are those who, by inuring themselves to cruelty, come at last to be the terror of the mighty in the land of the living (v. 22): He draws the mighty into a snare with his power; he rises up in his passion, and lays about him with so much fury that no man is sure of his life.

II. Shows that these daring sinners prosper, and are at ease for a while, nay, and often end their days in peace. It is given them to be in safety, v. 23. They are exalted for a while. At length, they are carried out of the world very silently and gently. "They go down to the grave as easily as snow-water sinks into the dry ground when it is melted by the sun;" so Bishop Patrick explains v. 19. He paraphrases, v. 20, The womb shall forget him, &c. "God sets no such mark of his displeasure upon him but that his mother may soon forget him. Neither he nor his wickedness is any more remembered than a tree which is broken to shivers." And v. 24, They are taken out of the way as all others, that is, "they are shut up in their graves like all other men; nay, they die as easily as an ear of corn is cropped with your hand."

III. Foresees their fall however. God's eyes are upon their ways, v. 23. Though he keep silence yet he will make it to appear shortly that their most secret sins, which they thought no eye should see (v. 15), were under his eye and will be called over again. The grave shall consume those that have sinned; that land of darkness will be the lot of those that love darkness rather than light. Their pride shall be brought down and laid in the dust (v. 24). Job owns that wicked people will be miserable on the other side death, but utterly denies what his friends asserted, that ordinarily they are miserable in this life.

IV. Concludes with a bold challenge to all that were present to disprove what he had said (v. 25): "If it be not so now, as I have declared, and if it do not thence follow that I am unjustly condemned and censured, let those that can undertake to prove me a liar."

CHAP. XXV

Bildad makes a short reply to Job's last discourse. He drops the main question concerning the prosperity of wicked men, but, because he thought Job had made too bold with the divine majesty in his appeals to the divine tribunal (ch. xxiii), he in a few words shows the infinite distance there is between God and man, teaching us, I. To think highly and honourably of God, ver. 2, 3, 5. II To think meanly of ourselves, ver 4, 6. These, however misapplied to Job, are two good lessons for us all to learn.

Bildad is to be commended, 1. For speaking no more on the subject about which Job and he differed. 2. For speaking so well on the matter about which Job and he were agreed.

Two ways Bildad takes here to exalt God and abase man:

I. He shows how glorious God is, and thence infers how guilty and impure man is before him, v. 2–4. God is the sovereign Lord of all, and with him is terrible majesty. Dominion and fear are with him, v. 2. He that gave being has an incontestable authority to give laws, and can enforce the laws he gives. His having dominion (or being Dominus—Lord) bespeaks him both owner and ruler of all the creatures. They are all his, and they are all under his direction and at his disposal. He maketh peace in his high places. The holy angels never quarrel with him, nor with one another, but acquiesce in his will, and execute it without murmuring or disquieting. The high places are his high places; for the heaven, even the heavens, are the Lord's (Ps. cxv. 16). Peace is God's work; where it is made it is he that makes it, Isa. lvii. 19. In heaven there is perfect peace; for there is perfect holiness, and there is God, who is love. He is a God of irresistible power: Is there any number of his armies? v. 3. His providence extends itself to all: Upon whom does not his light arise? How then can man be justified with God? Or how can he be clean? Man is not only mean, but vile, not only earthy, but filthy; he cannot be justified, he cannot be clean, (1) In comparison with God. (2) In debate with God. (3) In the sight of God. If God is so great and glorious, how can man, who is guilty and impure, appear before him?

II. He shows how dark and defective even the heavenly bodies are in the sight of God, and in comparison with him, and thence infers how little, and mean, and worthless, man is. The lights of heaven have no glory by reason of the glory which excelleth, as a candle, though it burn, yet does not shine when it is set in the clear light of the sun. The moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Sion. How durst Job then so confidently appeal to God, who would discover that amiss in him which he was not aware of in himself? The children of men, though noble creatures, are before God but as worms of the earth (v. 6): How much less does man shine in honour, how much less is he pure in righteousness that is a worm. What little reason has man to be proud, and what great reason to be humble! Shall man be such a fool as to contend with his Maker.

CHAP. XXVI

Job's short reply to Bildad's short discourse, in which he confirms what he had said, and out-does him in magnifying God to show what reason he had still to say, as he did (ch. xiii. 2), "What you know, the same do I know also." I. He shows that Bildad's discourse was very true and good, yet not to the purpose, ver. 2–4. II. That it was needless, for he knew it, and believed it, and could speak of it as well as he (ver. 5–13), concluding that all came short of the merit of the subject, ver. 14.

Bildad thought that he had made a fine speech, but Job peevishly enough shows that his performance was not so valuable as he thought it.

I. There was no great matter to be found in it (v. 3): How hast thou plentifully declared the thing as it is? This is spoken ironically, upbraiding Bildad. 1. He thought he had spoken very clearly, had declared the thing as it is. 2. He thought he had spoken very fully. It was but poorly and scantily that he declared it, in comparison with the vast compass of the subject.

II. There was no great use to be made of it. Cui bono—What good hast thou done by all that thou hast said? How hast thou, with all this mighty flourish, helped him that is without power? v. 2. Job would convince him, 1. That he had done God no service by it. 2. That he had done his cause no service by it. 3. That he had done him no service by it. He pretended to convince, instruct, and comfort, Job; but, alas! what he had said was little to the purpose. "To whom hast thou uttered words? v. 4. Was it to me that thou didst direct thy discourse? And dost thou take me for such a child as to need these instructions?" Everything that is true and good is not suitable and seasonable. To one that was humbled, and broken, as Job was, he ought to have preached of the grace and mercy of God, rather than of his greatness and majesty. Job asks him, Whose spirit came from thee? that is, "What troubled soul would ever been revived, and relieved, and brought to itself, by such discourses as these?"

Now they are upon a subject in which they were all agreed, the infinite glory and power of God.

I. Many instances are here given of the wisdom and power of God in the creation and preservation of the world.

1. If we look about us, to the earth and waters here below, we shall see striking instances of omnipotence, which we may gather out of these verses. (1) He hangs the earth upon nothing, v. 7. The art of man could not hang a feather upon nothing, yet the divine wisdom hangs the whole earth so. (2) He sets bounds to the waters of the sea, and compasses them in (v. 10), that they may not return to cover the earth. (3) He forms dead things under the waters. Rephaim—giants, are formed under the waters, that is, vast creatures, of prodigious bulk, as whales. (4) By mighty storms and tempests he shakes the mountains, which are here called the pillars of heaven (v. 11), and even divides the sea, and smites through its proud waves, v. 12.

2. By hell and destruction (v. 6) we may understand the grave, and those who are buried in it, that they are under the eye of God, though laid out of our sight, which may strengthen our belief of the resurrection of the dead. We may also consider them as referring to the place of the damned.

3. If we look up to heaven above, we shall see instances of God's sovereignty and power. He stretches out the north over the empty place, v. 7. So he did at first, when he stretched out the heavens like a curtain (Ps. civ. 2). He binds up the waters in his thick clouds, as if they were tied closely in a bag, and, notwithstanding the vast weight of water so raised and laid up, yet the cloud is not rent under them, but they distil through the cloud, and so come drop by drop, in mercy to the earth, in small rain, or great rain, as he pleases. He holds back the face of his throne, that light in which he dwells, and spreads a cloud upon it, through which he judges, ch. xxii. 13. By his Spirit, the eternal Spirit that moved upon the face of the waters, he has garnished the heavens, not only made them, but beautified them, has curiously bespangled them with stars by night and painted them with the light of the sun by day. "If the pavement be so richly inlaid, what must the palace be! If the visible heavens be so glorious, what are those that are out of sight!" What is meant here by the crooked serpent which his hands have formed is not certain. Some make it part of the garnishing of the heavens, the milky-way, say some; some particular constellation, so called, say others. It is the same word that is used for leviathan (Isa. xxvii. 1), and probably may be meant of the whale or crocodile, in which appears much of the power of the Creator; and why may not Job conclude with that inference, when God himself does so? ch. xli.

II. He concludes (v. 14): Lo, these are parts of his ways, by which he makes himself known to the children of men. Here he acknowledges, with adoration, the discoveries that were made of God. These things which he himself had said, and which Bildad had said, are his ways, and this is something of God. He admires the depth of that which is undiscovered. What we know of God is nothing in comparison with what is in God and what God is. He is infinite and incomprehensible; our understandings and capacities are weak and shallow, and the full discoveries of the divine glory are reserved for the future state.

CHAP. XXVII

Job had sometimes complained of his friends that would scarcely let him put in a word But now they left him room to say what he would What Job had said (ch xxvi) was a sufficient answer to Bildad's discourse; and Job himself went on, and said all he desired to say in this matter. I. He begins with a solemn protestation of his integrity and of his resolution to hold it fast, ver. 2–6. II. He expresses the dread he had of that hypocrisy which they charged him with, ver. 7–10. III. He shows the miserable end of wicked people, notwithstanding their long prosperity, and the curse that attends them and is entailed upon their families, ver. 11–23.

Job's discourse here is called a parable (mashal), the title of Solomon's proverbs, because it was very instructive, and he spoke as one having authority. It comes from a word that signifies to rule, or have dominion; and some think it intimates that Job now triumphed over his opponents. We say of an excellent preacher that he knows how to command his hearers. Job here backs all he had said in maintainance of his own integrity with a solemn oath, to silence contradiction, and take the blame entirely upon himself if he prevaricated.

I. The form of his oath (v. 2): As God liveth, who hath taken away my judgment. He speaks highly of God, in calling him the living God (which means ever-living, the eternal God, that has life in himself). Yet he speaks hardly of him, and unbecomingly, in saying that he had taken away his judgment (that is, refused to do him justice in this controversy and to appear in defence of him), and that by continuing his troubles, on which his friends grounded their censures of him, he had taken from him the opportunity he hoped ere now to have of clearing himself. He also charges it upon God that he had vexed his soul by laying such grievous afflictions upon him. Yet see Job's confidence in the goodness both of his cause and of his God, that though God seemed to be angry with him, and to act against him for the present, yet he could cheerfully commit his cause to him.

II. The matter of his oath, v. 3, 4. 1. That he would not speak wickedness, nor utter deceit—that, as in this debate he had all along spoken as he thought so he would never wrong his conscience by speaking otherwise; he would never maintain any doctrine, nor assert any matter of fact, but what he believed to be true; nor would he deny the truth, how much soever it might make against him. He would not be brought by their unjust censures, falsely to accuse himself. 2. That he would adhere to this resolution as long as he lived (v. 3): All the while my breath is in me. In things doubtful and indifferent, it is not safe to be thus peremptory. We know not what reason we may see to change our mind. But in so plain a thing as this we cannot be too positive that we will never speak wickedness.

III. The explication of his oath (v. 5, 6): "God forbid that I should justify you in your uncharitable censures of me, by owning myself a hypocrite: no, until I die I will not remove my integrity from me; my righteousness I hold fast, and I will not let it go." Job complained much of the reproaches of his friends; but (says he) my heart shall not reproach me, that is, "I will never give my heart cause to reproach me, but will keep a conscience void of offence; and, while I do so, I will not give my heart leave to reproach me."

Job here expresses the dread he had of being found a hypocrite.

I. He looked upon the condition of a hypocrite to be certainly the most miserable condition that any man could be in (v. 7): Let my enemy be as the wicked, a proverbial expression. If he might wish the greatest evil to the worst enemy he had, he would wish him the portion of a wicked man, knowing that worse he could not wish him.

II. The reasons of it.

1. Because the hypocrite's hopes will not be crowned (v. 8): For what is the hope of the hypocrite? Job's friends would persuade him that all his hope was but the hope of the hypocrite, ch. iv. 6. "Nay," says he, "I would not, for all the world, be so foolish as to build upon such a rotten foundation; for what is the hope of the hypocrite?" It is certain that a formal hypocrite, with all his gains and all his hopes, will be miserable in a dying hour.

2. Because the hypocrite's prayer will not be heard (v. 9): Will God hear his cry when trouble comes upon him? If true repentance come upon him, God will hear his cry and accept him (Isa. i. 18); but if he continue impenitent and unchanged, let him not think to find favour with God.

3. Because the hypocrite's religion is neither comfortable nor constant (v. 10): Will he delight himself in the Almighty? Will he always call upon God? No, in prosperity he will not call upon God, but slight him; in adversity he will not call upon God but curse him. The reason why hypocrites do not persevere in religion is because they have no pleasure in it.

Now that the heat of the battle was nearly over Job was willing to own how far he agreed with his friends, and where the difference between his opinion and theirs lay. 1. He agreed with them that wicked people are miserable people, that God will surely reckon with cruel oppressors, make reprisals upon them for all the affronts they have put upon God and all the wrongs they have done to their neighbours.

This truth is abundantly confirmed by the entire concurrence even of these angry disputants in it. But, 2. In this they differed—they held that these deserved judgments are presently and visibly brought upon wicked oppressors. Now Job held that, in many cases, judgments do not fall upon them quickly, but are deferred for some time.

I. Job here undertakes to set this matter in a true light (v. 11, 12): I will teach you. 1. What he would teach them: "That which is with the Almighty," that is, "the counsels and purposes of God concerning wicked people." This, says Job, will I not conceal. Things revealed belong to us and our children. 2. How he would teach them: By the hand of God. Those whom God teaches with a strong hand are best able to teach others, Isa. viii. 11. 3. What reason they had to learn those things which he was about to teach them (v. 12), "You yourselves have seen it. Why then are you thus altogether vain, to condemn me for a wicked man because I am afflicted?" He offers now to lay before them the portion of a wicked man with God, particularly of oppressors, v. 13. Compare ch. xx. 29. Their portion in the world may be wealth and preferment, but their portion with God is ruin and misery.

II. He does it, by showing that wicked people may, in some instances, prosper, but that ruin follows them and that is their portion.

1. They may prosper in their children, but ruin attends them. His children perhaps are multiplied (v. 14) or magnified (so some); they are very numerous and are raised to honour and great estates. (1) Some of them shall die by the sword, the sword of war, by the sword of justice for their crimes, or the sword of the murderer for their estates. (2) Others of them shall die by famine (v. 14): His offspring shall not be satisfied with bread. (3) Those that remain shall be buried in death, that is, shall die of the plague, which is called death (Rev. vi. 8), and be buried privately and in haste, without any solemnity, buried with the burial of an ass; and even their widows shall not weep.

2. They may prosper in their estates, but ruin attends them too, v. 16 18. They heap up silver in abundance as the dust, and prepare raiment as the clay; they have heaps of clothes about them, as plentiful as heaps of clay. But what comes of it? God will so order it that the just shall wear his raiment and the innocent shall divide his silver. Good men shall come honestly by that wealth which the wicked man came dishonestly by. They shall do good with it. The innocent shall not hoard the silver, but shall divide it to the poor. Money is like manure, good for nothing if it be not spread. Suppose them to have built themselves strong and stately houses; but they are like the house which the moth makes for herself in an old garment, out of which she will soon be shaken, v. 18. He is very secure in it, as a moth, and has no apprehension of danger; but it will prove of as short continuance as a booth which the keeper makes, which will quickly be taken down.

3. Destruction attends their persons, though they lived long in health and at ease (v. 19): The rich man shall lie down to sleep, but he shall not be gathered, that is, he shall not have his mind composed, and gathered in, to enjoy his wealth. He does not sleep so contentedly as people think he does. His abundance will not suffer him to sleep so sweetly as the labouring man, Eccles. v. 12. His cares increase his fears, and both together make him uneasy. He is miserable in death. It is to him the king of terrors, v. 20, 21. Terrors take hold of him as waters, as if he were surrounded by the flowing tides. He trembles to think of leaving this world, and much more of removing to another. The tempest of death, may be said to steal him away in the night. He is said to be carried away, and hurled out of his place as with a storm, and with an east wind, violent, and noisy, and very dreadful. Death, to a godly man, is like a fair gale of wind to convey him to the heavenly country. But the wicked man is miserable after death. His soul falls under the just indignation of God. For God shall cast upon him and not spare. Those who will not be persuaded now to fly to the arms of divine grace, which are stretched out to receive them, will not be able to flee from the arms of divine wrath. Men shall clap their hands at him, that is, they shall be well pleased in his fall.

CHAP. XXVIII

Job forgets his sores, and all his sorrows, and talks like a philosopher. The knowledge of the reasons in God's government of the world is kept from us, and we must neither pretend to it nor reach after it. Zophar had wished that God would show Job the "secrets of wisdom", ch. xi. 6. No, says Job, "secret things belong not to us, but things revealed," Deut. xxix. 29. And here he shows, I. Concerning worldly wealth, how industriously that is sought for by the children of men, and what hazards they run to get it, ver. 1-11. II. Concerning wisdom, ver. 12. In general, the price of it is very great; it is of inestimable value, ver. 15–19. The place of it is very secret, ver. 14, 20, 22. In particular, there is a wisdom which is hidden in God (ver. 23–27) and there is a wisdom which is revealed to the children of men, ver. 28 Our enquiries into the former must be checked, into the latter quickened.

Here Job shows, 1. What a great way the wit of man may go in diving into the depths of nature and seizing the riches of it. But does it therefore follow that men may, by their wit, comprehend the reasons why some wicked people prosper and others are punished. By no means. The caverns of the earth may be discovered, but not the counsels of heaven. 2. What a great deal of pains worldly men take to get riches. He shows whence that silver came and how it was obtained, to show what little reason wicked rich men have to be proud of their wealth and pomp.

I. The wealth of this world is hidden in the earth. Thence the silver and the gold, which afterwards they refine, are fetched, v. 1. Iron and less costly but more serviceable metals, are taken out of the earth (v. 2), and are there found in great abundance, which abates their price indeed, but is a great kindness to man, who could much better be without gold than without iron. Nay, out of the earth comes bread, that is, bread-corn, the necessary support of life, v. 5. Thence man's maintenance is fetched, to remind him of his own original; he is of the earth. Under it is turned up as it were fire, precious stones, that sparkle as fire—coal, that is proper to feed fire. The wisdom of the Creator has placed these things, 1. Out of our sight, to teach us not to set our eyes upon them, Prov. xxiii. 5. 2. Under our feet, to teach us to trample upon them with a holy contempt.

II. The wealth that is hidden in the earth cannot be obtained but with a great deal of difficulty. 1. It is hard to be found out: there is but here and there a vein for the silver, v. 1. 2. When found out it is hard to be fetched out. If one method fail, they must try another, till they have searched out all perfection, and turned every stone to effect it, v. 3. They must grapple with subterraneous waters (v. 4, 10, 11), and force their way through rocks which are, as it were, the roots of the mountains, v. 9. Now God has made the getting of gold, and silver, and precious stones, so difficult, (1) For the engaging of industry. If valuable things were too easily obtained men would never learn to take pains. (2) For the checking and restraining of pomp and luxury. What is for necessity is had with a little labour from the surface of the earth; but what is for ornament must be dug with a great deal of pains out of the bowels of it. To be fed is cheap, but to be fine is chargeable.

III. Though the subterraneous wealth is thus hard to obtain, yet men will have it. They search out all perfection, v. 3. They have arts and engines to dry up the waters, and carry them off, when they break in upon them in their mines and threaten to drown the work, v. 4. They have pumps and pipes, and canals, to clear their way, and, obstacles being removed, they tread the path which no fowl knoweth (v. 7, 8), unseen by the vulture's eye, which is piercing and quick-sighted, and untrodden by the lion's whelps, which traverse all the paths of the wilderness. They work their way through the rocks and undermine the mountrains, v. 10. Those that dig in the mines have their lives in their hands; for they are obliged to bind the floods from overflowing (v. 11), and are continually in danger of being suffocated by damps or crushed or buried alive by the fall of the earth upon them. Their eye sees every precious thing, v. 10. In the prospect of laying hold of them, they make nothing of all these difficulties. Go to the miner's then, thou sluggard in religion; consider their ways, and be wise. Let their courage, diligence, and constancy in seeking the wealth that perisheth shame us out of slothfulness and faint-heartedness in labouring for the true riches.

Job here comes to speak of another more valuable jewel, and that is, wisdom and understanding, the knowing and enjoying of God and ourselves. There is more true knowledge, satisfaction, and happiness, in sound divinity, which shows us the way to the joys of heaven, than in natural philosophy or mathematics, which help us to find a way into the bowels of the earth. Two things cannot be found out concerning this wisdom:—

I. The price of it, for that is inestimable: its worth is infinitely more than all the riches in this world: Man knows not the price thereof (v. 13). Few put a due value upon it. The cock in the fable knew not the value of the precious stone he found in the dunghill, and therefore would rather have lighted on a barley-corn. Men know not the worth of grace, and therefore will take no pains to get it. None can possibly give valuable consideration for it. This Job enlarges upon v. 15, &c., where he makes an inventory of the bona notabilia—the most valuable treasures of this world. There is no purchasing wisdom with these. It is a gift of the Holy Ghost, which cannot be bought with money, Acts viii. 20. Spiritual gifts are conferred without money and without price, because no money can be a price for them. It is better to get wisdom than gold. Gold is another's, wisdom our own; gold is for the body and time, wisdom for the soul and eternity.

II. The place of it, for that is undiscoverable. Where shall wisdom be found? v. 12. This is a question we should all put. While the most of men are asking, "Where shall money be found?" we should ask, Where may wisdom be found? not vain philosophy, or carnal policy, but true religion; for that is the only true wisdom, It is not found in this land of the living, v. 13. We cannot attain to a right understanding of God and his will, of ourselves and our duty and interest, by reading any books or men, but by reading God's book and the men of God. Such is the degeneracy of human nature that there is no true wisdom to be found with any but those who are born again, and who, through grace, partake of the divine nature. Ask the miners, and by them the depth will say, It is not in me, v. 14. Ask the mariners, and by them the sea will say, It is not in me. It can never be got either by trading on the waters or diving into them, can never be sucked from the abundance of the seas or the treasures hidden in the sand.

There is a twofold wisdom, one hidden in God, which is secret and belongs not to us, the other made known by him and revealed to man, which belongs to us and to our children.

I. The knowledge of God's secret will, the will of his providence, is out of our reach. It belongs to the Lord our God. To know what God will do hereafter, and the reasons of what he is doing now, is the knowledge Job first speaks of.

1. This knowledge is hidden from us. It is high, we cannot attain unto it (v. 21, 22): It is hid from the eyes of all living, even of philosophers, politicians, and saints; it is kept close from the fowls of the air; though their eyes behold afar off (ch. 29). Even those who, in their speculations, soar highest above the heads of other people, cannot pretend to this knowledge. "What fools are we" (says Job) "to fight in the dark thus, to dispute about that which we do not understand!" The line and plummet of human reason can never fathom the abyss of the divine counsels. Yet there is a world on the other side death and the grave, and there we shall see clearly what we are now in the dark about. When the mystery of God shall be finished it will be laid open, and we shall know as we are known: when the veil of flesh is rent, and the interposing clouds are scattered, we shall know what God does, though we know not now, John xiii. 7.

2. This knowledge is hidden in God, as the apostle speaks, Eph. iii. 9. Men sometimes do that which they cannot give a good reason for, but in every will of God there is a counsel: he knows both what he does and why he does it. Two reasons why God must needs understand his own way, and he only:—

(1) Because all events are now directed by an all-seeing and almighty Providence, v. 24, 25. He that governs the world is Omniscient. One day's events, and one man's affairs, have such a reference to, and such a dependence upon, another's, that he only to whom all events and all affairs are naked and open, and who sees the whole at one entire and certain view, is a competent Judge of every part. He is omnipotent. For proof of this Job mentions the winds and waters, v. 25. What is lighter than the wind? Yet God hath ways of poising it. The waters of the sea, and the rainwaters, he both weighs and measures, allotting the proportion of every tide and every shower. A great and constant communication there is between clouds and seas, the waters above the firmament and those under it. Vapours go up, rains come down, air is condensed into water, water rarefied into air; but the great God keeps an exact account of all the stock with which this trade is carried on for the public benefit. Now, if in these things, Providence be so exact, much more in dispensing frowns and favours, rewards and punishments, to the children of men, according to the rules of equity.

(2) Because all events were from eternity designed and determined by an infallible prescience and immutable decree, v. 26, 27. He settled the course of nature. Job mentions particularly a decree for the rain and a way for the thunder and lightning. The general method, and the particular uses of these strange performances, both their causes and their effects, were appointed by the divine purpose. Some make Job to speak of wisdom here as a person, and translate it, Then he saw her and showed her, &c.

II. The knowledge of God's revealed will is within our reach; it is level to our capacity, and will do us good (v. 28): Unto man he said, Behold, the fear of the Lord that is wisdom. Let it not be said that when God concealed his counsels from man, it was because he grudged him anything that would contribute to his real bliss and satisfaction. He let him know as much as is needful and fit for a subject, but he must not think himself fit to be a privy-counsellor. No less wisdom (says Archbishop Tillotson) than that which made the world can thoroughly understand the philosophy of it. But let him look upon this as his wisdom, to fear the Lord and to depart from evil.

When God forbade man the tree of knowledge he allowed him the tree of life. We cannot attain true wisdom but by divine revelation. The fear of the Lord, that is the wisdom. Pure religion, and undefiled, is to fear the Lord and depart from evil, which agrees with God's character of Job, ch. i. 1. The fear of the Lord is the spring and summary of all religion. There is a slavish fear of God, springing from hard thoughts of him, which is contrary to religion, Matt. xxv. 24. There is a selfish fear of God springing from dreadful thoughts of him, which may be a good step towards religion, Acts ix. 5. But there is a filial fear of God, springing from great and high thoughts of him, which is the life and soul of all religion. And, wherever this reigns in the heart, it will appear by a constant care to depart from evil, Prov. xvi. 6. This is essential to religion.

CHAP. XXIX

1. He describes the height of the prosperity from which he had fallen. And, II. The depth of the adversity into which he had fallen; and this he does to move the pity of his friends, and to justify his own complaints. But then, III. To obviate his friends' censures of him, he makes a protestation of his own integrity. In this chapter he looks back to the days of his prosperity, and shows, I What comfort he had in his house and family, ver. 1–6. 2. What honour he had in his country, ver. 7–10. 3. What abundance of good he did as a magistrate, ver. 11 17. 4. What prospect he had of the continuance of his comfort at home (ver. 18–20) and of his interest abroad, ver. 21–25.

Job begins here with a wish (v. 2): O that I were as in months past! so he brings in this account of his prosperity. "O that I might be restored to my prosperity, and then the censures and reproaches of my friends would be effectually silenced, even upon their own principles, and for ever rolled away!" He wishes he now had his spirit as much encouraged in the service of God as he had then, and that he had as much freedom and fellowship with him. This was in the days of his youth (v. 4), when he was in the prime. Two things made the months past pleasant to Job:—

I. That he had comfort in his God. This was the chief thing he rejoiced in, in his prosperity, as the spring of it and the sweetness of it, that he had the favour of God and the tokens of that favour. They were the days when God preserved me, v. 2. God's candle shone upon his head, that is, God lifted up the light of his countenance upon him. That guided him in his doubts, comforted him in his griefs, bore him up under his burdens, and helped him through all his difficulties. The secret of God was upon my tabernacle, that is, God conversed freely with him, as one bosom-friend with another. He knew God's mind, and was not in the dark about it, as, of late, he had been. The Almighty was yet with me. Now he thought God had departed from him, but in those days he was with him, and that was all in all to him. God's presence with a man in his house, though it be but a cottage, makes it both a castle and a palace.

II. That he had comfort in his family. Everything was agreeable there: he had both mouths for his meat and meat for his mouths; the want of either is a great affliction. Job speaks very feelingly of this comfort now that he was deprived of it. Yet we reckon amiss if, when we have lost our children, we cannot comfort ourselves with this, that we have not lost our God. He had a plentiful estate for the support of this numerous family, v. 6. His dairy abounded to such a degree that he might, if he pleased, wash his steps with butter; and his olive-yards were so fruitful that it seemed as if the rock poured him out rivers of oil. He reckons his wealth, not by his silver and gold, which were for hoarding, but by his butter and oil, which were for use; for what is an estate good for unless we take the good of it ourselves and do good with it to others?

Job in a post of honour and power. Judgment was administered in the gate, in the street, in the places of concourse, to which every man might have a free access, that every one who would might be a witness to all that was said and done. Job being a magistrate, we are here told,

I. What a profound respect was paid to him, not only for the dignity of his place, but for his personal merit. The people honoured him and stood in awe of him, v. 8. The young men, who, it may be, were conscious of something amiss, hid themselves, and got out of his way; and the aged, though they kept their ground, yet would not keep their seats: they arose and stood up to do homage to him. The princes and nobles paid great deference to him, v. 9, 10. When he came into court the princes refrained talking, the nobles held their peace, that they might the more diligently hearken to what he said.

II. What a great deal of good he did in his place. Job valued himself, not by the honour of his family, the great estate he had, and the court that was made to him, but by his usefulness. All that heard what he said, and saw how he laid out himself for the public good with all the authority and tender affection of a father to his country, blessed him, and gave witness to him, v. 11. Such was the blessing of him who was ready to perish (v. 13) and who by Job's means was rescued from perishing. If the poor were injured or oppressed, they might cry to Job, and, if he found the allegations of their petitions true he delivered the poor that cried (v. 12) and would not suffer them to be trampled upon. He was a father to the poor, not only a judge to protect them and to see that they were not wronged, but a father to provide for them and to see that they did not want, to counsel and direct them. Those that were ready to perish he saved from perishing, taking care of those that were sick, that were outcasts, that were falsely accused, or in danger of being turned out of their estates. The widows that were sighing for grief, and trembling for fear, he made to sing for joy. Those that were upon any account at a loss Job gave suitable and seasonable relief to (v. 15): I was eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame. He devoted himself to the administration of justice (v. 14): I put on righteousness and it clothed me, that is, he had an habitual disposition to execute justice. He always appeared in it, as in his clothing, and never without it. My judgment was as a robe and a diadem. If a magistrate do the duty of his place, that is an honour to him far beyond his gold or purple. If he do not make conscience of his duty, his robe and diadem, his gown and cap, are but a reproach. As clothes on a dead man will never make him warm, so robes on a base man will never make him honourable. The cause which I knew not I searched out. He diligently enquired into the matters of fact, patiently and impartially heard both sides. He valued himself by the check he gave to the violence of proud and evil men (v. 17): I broke the jaws of the wicked. He does not say that he broke their necks. He did not take away their lives, but he broke their jaws, he took away their power of doing mischief. Good magistrates must thus be a terror and restraint to evil-doers and a protection to the innocent. A judge upon the bench has as much need to be bold and brave as a commander in the field.

I. Job's thoughts in his prosperity (v. 18): Then I said, I shall die in my nest. He saw no storm arising to shake down his nest; and therefore concluded, Tomorrow shall be as this day. In the midst of his prosperity he thought of dying. Yet he flattered himself he should multiply his days as the sand. He means as the sand on the sea-shore; whereas we should rather reckon our days by the sand in the hour-glass, which will have run out in a little time.

II. The ground of these thoughts. He found no bodily distemper growing upon him; his estate did not lie under any incumbrance; nor was he sensible of any worm at the root of it. He was like a tree whose root is not only spread out, which fixes it and keep it firm, so that it is in no danger of being overturned, but spread out by the waters, which feed it. Blessed with the fatness of the earth, so also with the kind influences of heaven too; for the dew lay all night upon his branch. His bow also was renewed in his hand, that is, his power to protect himself, so that he had little reason to fear the insults of the Sabeans and Chaldeans. Neither had he any reason to distrust the fidelity of his friends. Nothing surely could be done against him when really nothing was done without him. He was consulted as an oracle, v. 21. When others could not be heard all men gave ear to him, and kept silence at his counsel, knowing that, as nothing could be said against it, so nothing needed to be added to it. And therefore, after his words, they spoke not again, v. 22. He had the hearts and affections of all his neighbours. Those were thought happy to whom he spoke. His speech dropped upon them, and they waited for it as for the rain (v. 22, 23). "If I laughed on them, designing thereby to show myself pleased in them, or pleasant with them, it was such a favour that they believed it not for joy," or because it was so rare a thing to see this grave man smile. He chose out their way, sat at the helm, and steered for them. He dwelt as a king in the army, giving orders which were not to be disputed. Everyone that has the spirit of wisdom has not the spirit of government, but Job had both. Yet he had the tenderness of a comforter. Our Lord Jesus is such a King as Job was, the poor man's King.

CHAP. XXX

It is a melancholy "But now" which this chapter begins with. I. He had lived in great honour, but now he had fallen into disgrace, and was as much vilified, even by the meanest, as ever he had been magnified by the greatest, ver. 1–14. II. He had had much inward comfort, but now he was a burden to himself (ver. 15, 16), and overwhelmed with sorrow, ver. 28–31 III. He had long enjoyed good health, but now he was sick and in pain, ver. 17–19, 29, 30. IV. Time was when the secret of God was with him, but now his communication with heaven was cut off, ver. 20–22. V. He had promised himself a long life, but now he saw death at the door, ver. 23. But two things gave him some relief:—1. That his troubles would not follow him to the grave, ver. 24. 2. That his conscience witnessed for him that, in his prosperity, he had sympathised with those that were in misery, ver. 25.

Here Job makes complaint of the great disgrace he had fallen into, from the height of honour and reputation. Two things he insists upon as greatly aggravating his affliction:

I. The meanness of the persons that affronted him. He was spurned by the meanest and most contemptible of mankind. They were young, younger than he (v. 1), the youth (v. 12), who ought to have behaved themselves respectfully towards him for his age and gravity. Their fathers were so very despicable that such a man as Job would have disdained to take them into the lowest service about his house, as that of tending the sheep and attending the shepherds with the dogs of his flock, v. 1. Job himself, with all his prudence and patience, could make nothing of them, v. 2. The young were not fit for labour, they were so lazy. Whereto might the strength of their hands profit me? The old were not to be advised with in the smallest matters, for their old age was perished, they were twice children. Being brought into straits by their own slothfulness and wastefulness, nobody was forward to relieve them. Hence they were forced to flee into the deserts both for shelter and sustenance, and were put to sorry shifts indeed, when they cut up mallows by the bushes, and were glad to eat them, for want of food that was fit for them, v. 4. This beggarly world is full of the devil's poor. They were driven forth from among men, v. 5. An idle fellow is a public nuisance; but it is better to drive such into a workhouse than, as here, into a wilderness, which will punish them indeed, but never reform them. They were forced to dwell in caves of the earth, and they brayed like asses among the bushes, v. 6, 7. They groan among the trees (so Broughton) and smart among the nettles; they are stung and scratched there, where they hoped to be sheltered and protected. But such as these were abusive to Job because when he was in prosperity and power, like a good magistrate, he put in execution the laws which were in force against vagabonds, and rogues, and sturdy beggars, which these base people now remembered against him. They thought he had now become like one of them.

II. The greatness of the affronts that were given him. I am their song and their byword. They shunned him as a loathsome spectacle, abhorred him, fled far from him (v. 10), as an ugly monster or as one infected. They tripped up his heels, pushed away his feet (v. 12), kicked him, either in wrath or in sport. They raise up against me the ways of their destruction; or (as some read it), They cast upon me the cause of their woe; that is, "They lay the blame of their being driven out upon me;" and it is common for criminals to hate the judges and laws by which they are punished. They misrepresented his former conversation, which is here called marring his path. They reflected upon him as a tyrant because he had done justice upon them; and perhaps Job's friends grounded their uncharitable censures of him (ch. xxii. 6, &c.) upon the clamours of these sorry people. They are fools in other things, but wise enough to do mischief, and need no help in inventing that. Some read it thus, They hold my heaviness a profit, though they be never the better. They came upon me as a wide breaking in of waters, when the dam is broken; or, "They came as soldiers into a broad breach which they have made in the wall of a besieged city, pouring in upon me with the utmost fury." They rolled themselves in the desolation with all the weight of their malice.

III. All this contempt put upon him was caused by the troubles he was in (v. 11): "Because he has loosed my cord, has taken away the honour and power with which I was girded (ch. xii. 18), because he has afflicted me, therefore they have let loose the bridle before me," that is, "have given themselves a liberty to say and do what they please against me." "Because he hath loosed his cord," that is, "because he has taken off his bridle of restraint from off their malice, they cast away the bridle from me," that is, "they make no account of my authority, nor stand in any awe of me." Those that today cry Hosannah may tomorrow cry Crucify. But there is an honour which comes from God, which if we secure, we shall find it not thus changeable and losable.

This second part of Job's complaint is very bitter.

I. Affliction seized him, and surprised him. The days of affliction have taken hold upon me, have caught me (so some); they have arrested me, as the bailiff arrests the debtor. It surprised him (v. 27): "The days of affliction prevented me," that is, "they came upon me without giving me any previous warning. I did not make any provision for such an evil day." He was in great sorrow by reason of it. His bowels boiled with grief, and rested not, v. 27. The sense of his calamities was continually preying upon his spirits without any intermission. He went mourning from day to day, and such a cloud was constantly upon his mind that he went, in effect, without the sun, v. 28. Thus he was a brother to dragons and owls (v. 29), both in choosing solitude and retirement, as they do (Isa. xxxiv. 13), and in making a fearful hideous noise as they do. The terror and trouble that seized his soul were the sorest part of his calamity, v. 15, 16. He complained, at first, of the terrors of God setting themselves in array against him, ch. vi. 4. And still, which way soever he looked, they turned upon him; which way soever he fled, they pursued him. The soul is the principal part of the man and therefore that which pursues the soul, and threatens, should be most dreaded. My welfare and prosperity pass away, as suddenly, swiftly, and irrecoverably, as a cloud. If he looked within, he found his spirit not only wounded, but poured out upon him, v. 16. His bodily diseases went to the bone, v. 17. It was a sword in his bones, which pierced him in the night season. His sinews took no rest. By reason of his pain, sleep departed from his eyes. His bones were burnt with heat, v. 30. He was in a constant fever. He was full of sores. His skin was black upon him, v. 30. Some think that Job was ill of a quinsy and that it was this which bound him like a collar. Thus was he cast into the mire (v. 19), compared to mire (so some); his body looked more like a heap of dirt than anything else. That which afflicted him most of all was that God seemed to be his enemy and to fight against him. "I cry unto thee, as one in earnest, I stand up and cry, as one waiting for an answer, but thou hearest not, thou regardest not, for anything I can perceive." That which he here says of God is one of the worst words that ever Job spoke (v. 21): Thou hast become cruel to me. Job was unjust and ungrateful when he said so of him. He thought God fought against him and stirred up his whole strength to ruin him: With thy strong hand thou opposest thyself, or art an adversary against me. He thought he insulted over him (v. 22): Thou liftest me up to the wind, as a feather or the chaff which the wind plays with. He expected now that God would shortly make an end of him: "I know that thou wilt bring me, with so much the more terror, to death, though I might have been brought thither without all this ado, for it is the house appointed for all living," v. 23. "When I looked for good, for more good, or at least for the continuance of what I had, then evil came"—such uncertain things are all our worldly enjoyments. "My harp is turned to mourning, and my organ into the voice of those that weep." Job, in his prosperity, had taken the timbrel and harp, and rejoiced at the sound of the organ, ch. xxi. 12.

II. Something in the midst of all with which he comforts himself. He foresees that death will be the period of all his calamities (v. 24): Though God now opposed himself against him, "yet," says he, "he will not stretch out his hand to the grave." He reflects with comfort upon the concern he always had for the calamities of others when he was himself at ease (v. 25): Did not I weep for him that was in trouble? His conscience witnessed for him that he had always sympathised with persons in misery and done what he could to help them, and therefore he had reason to expect that, at length, both God and his friends would pity him. Did not my soul burn for the poor? so some read it, comparing it with that of St. Paul, 2 Cor. xi. 29, Who is offended, and I burn not?

CHAP. XXXI

Job protested his integrity to clear himself from those crimes with which his friends had falsely charged him. Job's friends had been particular in their articles of impeachment against him, and therefore he is so in his protestation, which seems to refer especially to what Eliphaz had accused him of, ch. xxii. 6, &c. I. The sins from which he here acquits himself are, 1. Wantonness and uncleanness of heart, ver. 1–4. 2. Fraud and injustice in commerce, ver. 4–8. 3. Adultery, ver. 9–12. 4. Haughtiness and severity towards his servants, ver. 13–15. 5. Unmercifulness to the poor, the widows, and the fatherless, ver. 16-23. 6. Confidence in his worldly wealth, ver. 24, 25 7. Idolatry, ver. 26–28. 8. Revenge, ver. 29–31. 9. Neglect of poor strangers, ver. 32. 10. Hypocrisy in concealing his own sins and cowardice in conniving at the sins of others, ver. 33, 34. 11. Oppression, and the violent invasion of other people's rights, ver. 38–40. And, towards the close, he appeals to God's judgment concerning his integrity, ver. 35–37. Now, II. In all this we may see, 1. The sense of the patriarchal age concerning good and evil and what was so long ago condemned as sinful. 2. A noble pattern of piety and virtue proposed to us for our imitation.

The lusts of the flesh, and the love of the world, are the two fatal rocks on which multitudes split; against these Job protests he was always careful to stand upon his guard.

I. Against the lusts of the flesh. He not only kept himself clear from adultery, from defiling his neighbours' wives (v. 9), but from all lewdness with any woman whatsoever. I made a covenant with my eyes, that is, "I watched against the occasions of the sin; why then should I think upon a maid?" that is, "by that means, through the grace of God, I kept myself from the very first step towards it." He would not so much as admit a wanton look. Those that would keep their hearts pure must guard their eyes, which are both the outlets and inlets of uncleanness. He would not so much as allow a wanton thought. It was not for fear of reproach among men, though that is to be considered (Prov. vi. 33), but for fear of the wrath and curse of God. Uncleanness is a sin that forfeits all good, and shuts us out from the hope of it (v. 2): What portion of God is there from above? Is not destruction, a swift and sure destruction, to those wicked people, and a strange punishment to the workers of this iniquity? Is there not alienation (so some read it) to the workers of iniquity? This is the sinfulness of the sin that it alienates the mind from God (Eph. iv. 18, 19). Doth not he see my ways? O God! thou hast searched me and known me. God sees what rule we walk by, what company we walk with, what end we walk towards, and therefore what ways we walk in. He counts all my steps, all my false steps in the way of duty, all my by-steps into the way of sin. God takes a more exact notice of us than we do of ourselves; for who ever counted his own steps? yet God counts them.

II. He stood upon his guard against the love of the world, and carefully avoided all sinful means of getting wealth. He dreaded all forbidden profit as much as all forbidden pleasure. He never walked with vanity (v. 5), that is, he never durst tell a lie to get a good bargain. He never hasted to deceit. He never made haste to be rich by deceit, but always acted cautiously, lest, through inconsideration, he should do an unjust thing. His steps never turned out of the way, the way of justice and fair dealing; from that he never deviated, v. 7. His heart did not walk after his eyes, that is, he did not covet what he saw that was another's nor wish it his own. Covetousness is called the lust of the eye, 1 John ii. 16. No blot had cleaved to his hands, that is, he was not chargeable with getting anything dishonestly, or keeping that which was another's. Injustice is a blot, a blot to the estate, a blot to the owner; it spoils the beauty of both. Job ratifies his protestation. He is willing to have his goods searched (v. 6): Let me be weighed in an even balance, that is, "Let what I have got be enquired into and it will be found to weigh well." He is willing to forfeit the whole cargo if there be found any prohibited or contraband goods, anything but what he came honestly by (v. 8): "Let me sow, and let another eat," which was already agreed to be the doom of oppressors (ch. v. 5), "and let my offspring, all the trees that I have planted, be rooted out." He knew himself innocent and would venture all the poor remains of his estate upon the issue of the trial.

Two more instances of Job's integrity:

I. He had a very great abhorrence of the sin of adultery. He was careful not to offer any injury to his neighbour's marriage bed. He did not so much as covet his neighbour's wife; for even his heart was not deceived by a woman. He never laid wait at his neighbour's door, to get an opportunity to debauch his wife in his absence. He owns that, if he were guilty: Let my wife grind to another. Let her be a slave (so some), a harlot, so others. God often punishes the sins of one with the sin of another, the adultery of the husband with the adultery of the wife. Those who are not just and faithful to their relations must not think it strange if their relations be unjust and unfaithful to them. For it is an iniquity to be punished by the judges. Adultery is a crime which the civil magistrate ought to take cognizance of and punish. It is a fire. Lust is a fire in the soul: those that indulge it are said to burn.

II. He had a very great tenderness for his servants and ruled them with a gentle hand. He did not despise the cause of his man-servant, no, nor of his maid-servant, when they contended with him. If they had offended him, or were accused to him, if they complained of any hardship he put upon them, he gave them leave to tell their story, and redressed their grievances as far as it appeared they had right on their side. He considered, "If I should be imperious and severe with my servants, what then shall I do when God riseth up?" When he was tempted to be harsh with his servants this thought came very seasonably into his mind, "Did not he that made me in the womb make him? I am a creature as well as he, and my being is derived and depending as well as his. He partakes of the same nature that I do and is the work of the same hand.

Eliphaz had particularly charged Job with unmercifulness to the poor (ch. xxii. 6, &c.). It appears, by Job's protestation, that it was utterly false and groundless.

I. He was always compassionate to the poor, and careful of them, especially the widows and fatherless, always ready to grant their desires and answer their expectations, v. 16. If he could but perceive by the widow's look that she expected an alms from him, he had compassion enough to give it, and never caused the eyes of the widow to fail. He was a father to the fatherless, took care of orphans. He provided food convenient for them; they ate of the same morsels that he did (v. 17), did not eat after him, of the crumbs that fell from his table, but with him, of the best dish upon his table. He took particular care to clothe those that were without covering, which would be more expensive to him than feeding them, v. 19. If Job knew of any that were in this distress he had good warm strong clothes made on purpose for them of the fleece of his sheep (v. 20) He never so much as lifted up his hand against the fatherless (v. 21). He never used his power to crush those that stood in his way, though he saw his help in the gate, that is, though he had interest enough, both in the people and in the judges, both to enable him to do it and to bear him out when he had done it.

II. The imprecation with which he confirms this protestation (v. 22): "If I have been oppressive to the poor, let my arm fall from my shoulder-blade and my arm be broken from the bone," that is, "let the flesh rot off from the bone and one bone be disjoined and broken off from another."

III. The principles by which Job was restrained from all uncharitableness and unmercifulness. "Destruction from God was a terror to me, whenever I was tempted to this sin, and by reason of his highness I could not endure the thought of making him my enemy." He thought of the infinite distance between him and God. Those who oppress the poor, and pervert judgment and justice, forget that he who is higher than the highest regards, and there is a higher than they, who is able to deal with them (Eccles. v. 8); but Job considered this.

Four articles more of Job's protestation not only assure us what he was and did, but teach us what we should be and do:

I. He protests that he never set his heart upon the wealth of this world. His wealth was great, and he had gotten much. Job put no great confidence in it: he did not make gold his hope, v. 24. It is hard to have riches and not to trust in riches; and it is this which makes it so difficult for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God, Matt. xix. 23; Mark x. 24.

II. He protests that he never gave the worship and glory to the creature which are due to God only; he was never guilty of idolatry, v. 26–28. He not only never bowed the knee to Baal (which, some think, was designed to represent the sun), never fell down and worshipped the sun, but he kept his eye, his heart, and his lips, clean from this sin. This was his covenant, that, whenever he looked at the lights of heaven, he should by faith look through them, and beyond them, to the Father of lights. He did not perform the least and lowest act of adoration: His mouth did not kiss his hand, which, it is likely, was a ceremony then commonly used even by some that yet would not be thought idolaters. In giving divine honours to the sun and moon, they could not reach to kiss them, but to show their goodwill, they kissed their hand, reverencing those as their masters which God has made servants to this lower world, to hold the candle for us. He looked upon it as an affront to the civil magistrate: It were an iniquity to be punished by the judge, as a public nuisance. He looked upon it as a much greater affront to the God of heaven, and no less than high treason against his crown and dignity. Idolatry is in effect atheism.

III. He protests that he was so far from doing or designing mischief to any that he neither desired nor delighted in the hurt of the worst enemy he had. He did not so much as rejoice when any mischief befell them, v. 29. He did not so much as wish in his own mind that evil might befall them, v. 30. He was violently urged to revenge, and yet he kept himself thus clear from it (v. 31): The men of his tabernacle, his domestics, his servants, and those about him, were enraged at Job's enemy who hated him. "O that we had of his flesh! Our master is satisfied to forgive him, but we cannot be so satisfied."

IV. He protests that he had never been unkind or inhospitable to strangers (v. 32). The stranger lodged not in the street. He opened his door to the road (so it may be read); he kept the street-door open, that he might see who passed by and invite them in, as Abraham, Gen. xviii. 1.

Job's protestation against three more sins.

I. Of dissimulation and hypocrisy. The general crime of which his friends accused him was that really he was as bad as other people, but had the art of concealing it. Zophar insinuated (ch. xx. 12) that he hid his iniquity under his tongue. "No," says Job, "I never did (v. 33), I never covered my transgression as Adam, never palliated a sin with frivolous excuses, nor ever hid my iniquity in my bosom."

II. His courage in that which is good he produces as an evidence of his sincerity in it (v. 34): Did I fear a great multitude, that I kept silence? No, all that knew Job knew him to be a man of undaunted resolution in a good cause, and did not fear the face of man, but set his face as a flint. He did not, he durst not, keep silence when he had a call to speak in an honest cause, or keep within doors when he had a call to go abroad to do good. He valued not the clamours of the mob, feared not a great multitude, nor did he value the menaces of the mighty: The contempt of families never terrified him.

III. The charge of oppression and violence, and doing wrong to his poor neighbours. The estate he had he both got and used honestly, so that his land could not cry out against him nor the furrows thereof complain (v. 38), as they do against those who get the possession of them by fraud and extortion, Hab. ii. 9–11. Two things he could say safely concerning his estate:—1. That he never ate the fruits of it without money, v. 39. What he purchased he paid for. The labourers that he employed had their wages duly paid them. 2. That he never caused the owners thereof to lose their life, never got an estate, as Ahab got Naboth's vineyard, by killing the heir and seizing the inheritance, never starved those that held lands of him nor killed them with hard bargains and hard usage. "If I have got my estate unjustly, let thistles grow instead of wheat, the worst of weeds instead of the best of grains." Job, towards the close of his protestation, appeals to the judgment-seat of God concerning the truth of it (v. 35–37): O that he would hear me, even that the Almighty would answer me! An upright heart does not dread a scrutiny. He that means honestly wishes he had a window in his breast, that all men might see the intents of his heart. But an upright heart does particularly desire to be determined in everything by the judgment of God, which we are sure is according to truth. "O that my adversary had written a book—that my friends, who charge me with hypocrisy, would draw up their charge in writing, that it might be reduced to a certainty, and that we might the better join issue upon it." If it discovered to him any sin he had been guilty of, which he did not yet see, he should be glad to know it, that he might repent of it and get it pardoned. If it charged him with what was false, he doubted not but to disprove the allegations. The defendant is ready to make his appearance and to give his accusers all the fair play they can desire. He will declare unto them the number of his steps, v. 37. He will let them into the history of his own life. So confident he is of his integrity that as a prince to be crowned, rather than as a prisoner to be tried, he would go near to him,.both to his accuser to hear his charge and to his judge to hear his doom. He has now said all he would say in answer to his friends: he afterwards said something in a way of self-reproach and condemnation (ch. xl. 4, 5; xlii. 2, &c.), but here ends what he had to say in a way of self-defence and vindication.

CHAP. XXXII

The stage is clear, it is therefore seasonable for a moderator to interpose, and Elihu is the man. I. Some account of him, his parentage, his presence at this dispute, and his sentiments concerning it, ver. 1–5. II. The apology he made for his bold undertaking to speak to a question which had been so largely and learnedly argued by his seniors. He pleads, 1. That, though he had not the experience of an old man, yet he had the understanding of a man, ver. 6–10. 2. That he had patiently heard all they had to say, ver. 11–13. 3. That he had something new to offer, ver. 14–17. 4. That his mind was full of this matter, and it would be a refreshment to him to give it vent, ver. 18–20. 5. That he was resolved to speak impartially, ver. 21, 22. And he did speak so well that Job made no reply to him, and God gave him no rebuke.

When old men were the disputants, as a rebuke to them for their unbecoming heat, a young man is raised up to be the moderator.

I. The reason why Job's three friends were now silent. They ceased to answer him, and let him have his saying, because he was righteous in his own eyes. It was to no purpose to argue with a man that was so opinionative, v. 1. But they did not judge fairly concerning Job: he was really righteous before God, and not righteous in his own eyes only.

II. The reasons why Elihu, the fourth, now spoke. His name Elihu signifies My God is he. He is said to be a Buzite, from Buz, Nahor's second son (Gen. xxii. 21), and of the kindred of Ram, that is, Aram (so some), whence the Syrians or Aramites descended and were denominated, Gen. xxii. 21. Of the kindred of Abram; so the Chaldee-paraphrase, supposing him to be first called Ram—high, then Abram—a high father, and lastly Abraham—the high father of a multitude.

1. Elihu spoke because he was angry and thought he had good cause to be so. He was angry at Job, because he thought he did not speak so reverently of God as he ought to have done; and that was too true (v. 2): He justified himself more than God, that is, took more care and pains to clear himself from the imputation of unrighteousness in being thus afflicted than to clear God from the imputation of unrighteousness in afflicting him. Elihu owned Job to be a good man. He was angry at his friends because he thought they had not conducted themselves so charitably towards Job as they ought to have done (v. 3): They had found no answer, and yet had condemned Job. Seldom is a quarrel carried on to the length that this was, in which there is not a fault on both sides. Elihu, as became a moderator, took part with neither.

2. Elihu had waited on Job's speeches, had patiently heard him out, until the words of Job were ended.

Elihu appears to have been,

I. A man of great modesty and humility. "I am young, and therefore I was afraid, and durst not show you my opinion, for fear I should either prove mistaken or do that which was unbecoming me." It becomes us to be swift to hear the sentiments of others and slow to speak our own, especially when we go contrary to the judgment of those for whom, upon the score of their learning and piety, we justly have a veneration. I said, Days should speak. Age and experience give a man great advantage in judging of things, both as they furnish a man with so much the more matter for his thoughts to work upon and as they ripen and improve the faculties. It is good lodging with an old disciple, Acts xxi. 16; Titus ii. 4. Elihu's modesty appeared in the patient attention he gave to what his seniors said, v. 11, 12. He attended to them with diligence and care. Though they had often to seek for matter and words, paused and hesitated, yet he gave ear to their reasons. We must often be willing to hear what we do not like, else we cannot prove all things. Those that have heard may speak, and those that have learned may teach.

II. A man of great sense and courage, and one that knew as well when and how to speak as when and how to keep silence. Though he had so much respect to his friends as not to interrupt them with his speaking, yet he had so much regard to truth and justice (his better friends) as not to betray them by his silence.

1. Man is a rational creature, and therefore has for himself a judgment of discretion and ought to be allowed a liberty of speech in his turn. He means the same that Job did (ch. xii. 3, But I have understanding as well as you) when he says (v. 8), But there is a spirit in man; only he expresses it a little more modestly, that one man has understanding as well as another, and no man can pretend to have the monopoly of reason. Therefore hearken to me. The soul is a spirit, neither material itself nor dependent upon matter. It is an understanding spirit. It is able to discover and receive truth, to discourse and reason upon it, and to direct and rule accordingly. This understanding spirit is in every man; it is the light that lighteth every man, John i. 9. It is the inspiration of the Almighty that gives us this understanding spirit.

2. Those who are advanced above others in grandeur and gravity do not always proportionably go beyond them in knowledge and wisdom (v. 9): Great men are not always wise; it is a pity but they were, for then they would never do hurt with their greatness and would do so much the more good with their wisdom. The aged do not always understand judgment; even they may be mistaken, and they must not take it as an affront to be contradicted, but rather take it as a kindness to be instructed, by their juniors: Therefore I said, hearken to me, v. 10. He that has a good eye can see further upon level ground than he that is purblind can from the top of the highest mountain. Better is a poor and wise child than an old and foolish king, Eccles. iv. 13.

3. It was requisite for something to be said, for the setting of this controversy in a true light. "I must speak, lest you should say, We have found out wisdom, lest you should think your argument against Job conclusive and that he cannot be convinced and humbled by any other argument than this of yours, that God casteth him down and not man, that it appears by his extraordinary afflictions that God is his enemy, and therefore he is certainly a wicked man. I must show you that this is a false hypothesis and that Job may be convinced without maintaining it."

4. He had something new to offer. He will not reply to Job's protestations of his integrity, but allows the truth of them, and therefore does not interpose as his enemy: "He hath not directed his words against me." He will not repeat their arguments, nor go upon their principles: "Neither will I answer him with your speeches—not with the same matter, for should I only say what has been said I might justly be silenced as impertinent,—nor in the same manner; I will not be guilty of that peevishness towards him myself which I dislike in you."

Three things here apologize for Elihu's interposing as he does in this controversy which had already been canvassed by such learned disputants:—

1. The stage was clear, and he did not break in upon any of the managers on either side: They were amazed (v. 15); they stood still, and answered no more, v. 16. The judgment is the Lord's, and by him it must be determined who is in the right and who is in the wrong; but, since you have each of you shown your opinion, I also will show mine, and let it take its fate with the rest.

2. He was uneasy, and even in pain, to be delivered of his thoughts upon this matter. "I am full of matter, having carefully attended to all that has hitherto been said, and made my own reflections upon it. The spirit within me not only instructs me what to say, but puts me on to say it; so that if I have not vent I shall burst like bottles of new wine when it is working," v. 19. I will speak, that I may be refreshed, not only that I may be eased of the pain of stifling my thoughts, but that I may have the pleasure of endeavouring, according to my place and capacity, to do good.

3. That he was resolved to speak, with sincerity, what he thought was true, not what he thought would please (v. 21, 22): "Let me not accept any man's person, as partial judges do, that aim to enrich themselves, not to do justice. I am resolved to flatter no man." He that made us hates all dissimulation and flattery, and will soon put lying lips to silence and cut off flattering lips, Ps. xii. 3.

CHAP. XXXIII

Elihu's discourse here does not disappoint the expectations which his preface had raised. It is substantial, and lively, and very much to the purpose. I. He bespeaks Job's favourable acceptance of what he should say, ver. 1–7. II. He does, in God's name, bring an action against him, for words which he had spoken, in the heat of disputation, reflecting upon God as dealing hardly with him, ver. 8–11. III. He endeavours to convince him of his fault and folly herein, by showing him, 1. God's sovereign dominion over man, ver. 12, 13. 2. The care God takes of man when he lays bodily afflictions upon him, ver. 14. (1) Job had sometimes complained of unquiet dreams, ch. vii. 14. "Why," says Elihu, "God sometimes speaks conviction and instruction to men by such dreams," ver. 15–18. (2) Job had especially complained of his sicknesses and pains; and, as to these, he shows largely that they were so far from being tokens of God's wrath, as Job took them, or evidences of Job's hypocrisy, as his friends took them, that they were really wise and gracious methods, which divine grace took for the increase of his acquaintance with God, to work patience, experience, and hope, ver. 19–30. And, lastly, he concludes with a request to Job, either to answer him or give him leave to go on, ver. 31–33.

Elihu does not join with his three friends against him. He has, in the foregoing chapter, declared his dislike of their proceedings, disclaimed their hypothesis, and quite set aside the method they took of healing Job. "Wherefore, Job, I pray thee, hear my speech, v. 1. I am trying a new way, therefore hearken to all my words." He opened his mouth (v. 2), with deliberation and design. "My words shall be of the uprightness of my heart, the genuine product of my convictions and sentiments." What he said should be easy, and not dark and hard to be understood: My lips shall utter knowledge clearly. He owns himself unfit to enter into the lists with his seniors, yet he desires they will not despise his youth. He would be very willing to hear what Job could object against what he had to say (v. 5): "If thou canst, answer me." He had often wished for one that would appear for God, with whom he might freely expostulate, and to whom, as arbitrator, he might refer the matter, and such a one Elihu would be (v. 6): I am, according to thy wish, in God's stead. "I also am formed out of the clay. I also as well as thou." Job had urged this with God as a reason why he should not bear hard upon him (ch. x. 9), Remember that thou hast made me as the clay. "I," says Elihu, "am formed out of the clay as well as thou," formed of the same clay, so some read it. "My terror shall not make thee afraid." If we would rightly convince men, it must be by reason, not by terror, by fair arguing, not by a heavy hand.

I. Elihu particularly charges Job with some expressions that had dropped from him, reflecting upon the justice and goodness of God in his dealings with him. "Thou hast spoken it in my hearing, and in the hearing of all this company." When we hear anything said that tends to God's dishonour we ought publicly to bear our testimony against it. What is said amiss in our hearing we are concerned to reprove; for you are my witnesses, saith the Lord, to confront the accuser. Job had represented himself as innocent (v. 9): I am clean without transgression. Job had not said this in so many words; he had owned himself to have sinned and to be impure before God; but he had indeed said, Thou knowest that I am not wicked, my righteousness I hold fast. Elihu did not deal fairly in charging Job with saying that he was clean and innocent from all transgression, when he only pleaded that he was upright and innocent from the great transgression. He had represented God as severe in marking what he did amiss (v. 10, 11), as if he sought opportunity to pick quarrels with him. He findeth occasions against me.

II. He endeavours to convince him that he had spoken amiss in speaking thus, and that he ought to humble himself before God for it, and by repentance to unsay it (v. 12): Behold, in this thou art not just. See the difference between the charge which Elihu exhibited against Job and that which was preferred against him by his other friends; they would not own that he was just at all, but Elihu only says, "In this, in saying this, thou art not just." Job himself said a great deal, and admirably well, concerning the greatness of God, his irresistible power and incontestable sovereignty, his terrible majesty and unsearchable immensity. "Now," said Elihu, "do but consider what thou thyself hast said concerning the greatness of God, and apply it to thyself; if he is greater than man, he is greater than thou, and thou wilt see reason enough to repent of these ill-natured reflections upon him, and tremble to think of thy own presumption." There is enough in this one plain truth, That God is greater than man, to put to silence all our complaints of his providence and our exceptions against his dealings with us. He is not only more wise and powerful than we are, but more holy, just, and good, for these are the transcendent glories and excellencies of the divine nature; in these God is greater than man, and therefore it is absurd and unreasonable to find fault with him. God is not accountable to us (v. 13): Why dost thou strive against him? It is an unreasonable thing for us, weak, foolish, sinful, creatures, to strive with a God of infinite wisdom, power, and goodness. He gives not account of all his matters (so some read it); he reveals as much as it is fit for us to know, as follows here (v. 14).

Job had complained that God kept him wholly in the dark concerning the meaning of his dealings with him, and therefore concluded he dealt with him as his enemy. "No," says Elihu, "he speaks to you, but you do not perceive him; so that the fault is yours, not his; and he is designing your real good even in those dispensations which you put this harsh construction upon." 1. What a friend God is to our welfare: He speaketh to us once, yea, twice, v. 14. When one warning is neglected he gives another. 2. What enemies we are to our own welfare: Man perceives it not, is not aware that it is the voice of God. He stops his ear, stands in his own light, rejects the counsel of God against himself. God teaches and admonishes the children of men by their own consciences.

I. The proper season and opportunity for these admonitions (v. 15): In a dream, in slumberings upon the bed, when men are retired from the world and the business and conversation of it. Thus he made his mind known to the prophets by visions and dreams (Num. xii. 6). When he stirred up conscience, that ordinary deputy of his, in the soul, to do its office, he took that opportunity, either when deep sleep fell on men (for, though dreams mostly come from fancy, some may come from conscience) or in slumberings, when men are between sleeping and waking, reflecting at night upon the business of the foregoing day or projecting in the morning the business of the ensuing day; then is a proper time for their hearts to reproach them for what they have done ill and to admonish them what they should do.

II. The power and force with which those admonitions come, v. 16. Then he opens the ears of men, which were before shut. He opens the heart, as he opened Lydia's, and so opens the ears. He sealeth their instruction, that is, the instruction that is designed for them and is suited to them; this he makes their souls to receive the deep and lasting impression of, as the wax of the seal.

III. The end and design of these admonitions that are sent. 1. To keep men from sin, and particularly the sin of pride (v. 17). That he may withdraw man from his purpose, that is, from his evil purposes. Many a man has been stopped in the full career of a sinful pursuit by the seasonable checks of his own conscience, saying, Do not this abominable thing which the Lord hates. Particularly, God does, by this means, hide pride from man. That he may take away pride from man (so some read it), that he may pluck up that root of bitterness which is the cause of so much sin. 2. To keep men from ruin, v. 18. God, by the admonitions of conscience, withdraws them from sin, he thereby keeps back their souls from the pit. What a mercy it is to be under the restraints of an awakened conscience. Faithful are the wounds, and kind are the bonds, of that friend.

God speaks a second time, and tries another way to convince and reclaim sinners, and that is by providences, afflictive and merciful (in which he speaks twice). Job complained much of his diseases and judged by them that God was angry with him; but Elihu shows that God often afflicts the body in love, and with gracious designs of good to the soul. This part of Elihu's discourse will be of great use to us for the due improvement of sickness, by which God speaks to men.

I. See what work sickness makes (v. 19, &c.) when God sends it with commission. 1. The sick man is full of pain all over him (v. 19): He is chastened with pain upon his bed. Pain and sickness will turn a bed of down into a bed of thorns. Frequently the stronger the patient the stronger the pain. It is not the smarting of the flesh that is complained of, but the aching of the bones. It is an inward rooted pain; and not only the bones of one limb, but the multitude of the bones, are thus chastened. By the grace of God, the pain of the body is often made a means of good to the soul. 2. He has quite lost his appetite, the common effect of sickness (v. 20): His life abhorreth bread, the most necessary food. 3. He has become a perfect skeleton, nothing but skin and bones, v. 21. 4. His soul draws near to the grave, and in the apprehension of all about him, as well as in his own, he is a dying man. The pangs of death, here called the destroyers, are ready to seize him.

II. The provision made for his instruction, that, when God in that way speaks to man, he may be heard and understood, v. 23. He is happy if there be a messenger with him an interpreter to expound the providence and give him to understand the meaning of it, a man of wisdom that knows the voice of the rod and its interpretation. The advice and help of a good minister are as needful and seasonable, and should be as acceptable, in sickness, as of a good physician, especially if he be well skilled in the art of explaining and improving providences. His business at such a time is to show his uprightness, that is, God's uprightness, that in faithfulness he afflicts him. If it appear that the sick person is truly pious, the interpreter will not do as Job's friends had done, make it his business to prove him a hypocrite because he is afflicted, but will show him his uprightness, notwithstanding his afflictions, that he may be easy.

III. God's gracious acceptance of him, upon his repentance, v. 24. Wherever God finds a gracious heart he will be found a gracious God; and, 1. He will give a gracious order for his discharge. He says, Deliver him (that is, let him be delivered) from going down to the pit, from that death which is the wages of sin. 2. He will give a gracious reason for this order: I have found a ransom, or propitiation; Jesus Christ is that ransom, so Elihu calls him, as Job had called him his Redeemer, for he is both the purchaser and the price, the priest and the sacrifice. God glories in the invention here, ἔυρηκα, ἔυρηκα—"I have found, I have found, the ransom; I, even I, am he that has done it."

IV. The recovery of the sick man hereupon. When the patient becomes a penitent see what a blessed change follows. 1. His body recovers its health, v. 25. This is not always the consequence of a sick man's repentance and return to God, but sometimes it is; and recovery from sickness is a mercy indeed when it arises from the remission of sin. Interest him in the ransom, and then his flesh shall be fresher than a child's and there shall be no remains of his distemper, but he shall return to the days of his youth, to the beauty and strength which he had then. 2. His soul recovers its peace, v. 26. (1) The patient, being a penitent, is a supplicant, and has learned to pray. (2) His prayers are accepted. All true penitents rejoice more in the returns of God's favour than in any instance whatsoever of prosperity or pleasure, Ps. iv. 6, 7.

V. The general rule which God will go by in dealing with the children of men inferred from this instance, v. 27, 28. As sick people, upon their submission, are restored so all others that truly repent of their sins shall find mercy with God. Would we know the nature of sin and the malignity of it? It is the perverting of that which is right; it is a most unjust unreasonable thing; it is the rebellion of the creature against the Creator, the usurped dominion of the flesh over the spirit. Would we know what is to be got by sin? It profiteth us not. What reason we have to repent. We must confess the fault of sin, the iniquity, the dishonesty of it (I have perverted that which was right); we must confess the folly of sin—"so foolish have I been and ignorant, for it profited me not." God looked upon sinners with an eye of compassion, desiring to hear this from them; for he has no pleasure in their ruin. He shall be happy in everlasting life and joy: His life shall see the light, that is, all good, in the vision and fruition of God.

Verses 29–33

Elihu briefly sums up what he had said, showing that God's great and gracious design, in all the dispensations of his providence towards the children of men, is to save them from being for ever miserable and bring them to be for ever happy, v. 29, 30. He deals with them by conscience, by providences, by ministers, by mercies, by afflictions. He makes them sick, and makes them well again. All providences are to be looked upon as God's workings with man, his strivings with him. Why does he take all this pains with man? It is to bring back his soul from the pit, v. 30. Job is welcome to make what objections he can (v. 32): If thou hast anything to say for thyself, in thy own vindication, answer me. Speak, for I desire to justify thee. Elihu lets him know that he has something more to say, which he desires him patiently to attend to (v. 33): Hold thy peace, and I will teach thee wisdom.

CHAP. XXXIV

Elihu, it is likely, paused awhile, to see if Job had anything to say; but he sitting silent, Elihu proceeds. I. He bespeaks not only the audience, but the assistance of the company, ver. 2–4. II. He charges Job with some more expressions that had dropped from him, ver. 5–9. III. He undertakes to convince him that he had spoken amiss, by showing very fully, 1. God's incontestable justice, ver. 10–12, 17, 19, 23. 2. His sovereign dominion, ver. 13–15. 3. His almighty power, ver. 20, 24. 4. His omniscience, ver. 21, 22, 25. 5. His severity against sinners, ver. 26–28. 6. His overruling providence, ver. 29, 30. IV. He teaches him what he should say, ver. 31, 32. And then, lastly, he leaves the matter to Job's own conscience, and concludes with a sharp reproof for his discontent, ver. 33–37. All this Job not only bore patiently, but took kindly, because, whereas his other friends had accused him of that from which his own conscience acquitted him, Elihu charged him with that only for which, it is probable, his own heart, now upon the reflection, began to smite him.

I. Elihu addresses himself to the auditors, and endeavours to gain their goodwill and attention. 1. He calls them wise men, and men that had knowledge, v. 2. It is comfortable dealing with such as understand sense. Elihu differed in opinion from them, and yet he calls them wise and knowing men. 2. He appeals to their judgment, and therefore submits to their trial, v. 3. The ear of the judicious tries words, whether what is said to be true or false, right or wrong, and he that speaks must stand the test of the intelligent. 3. He takes them into partnership with him in the examination and discussion of this matter, v. 4. He does not pretend to be sole dictator. "Let us agree to lay aside all animosities and prejudices and let us choose to ourselves judgment; and let us know among ourselves, by comparing notes and communicating our reasons, what is good and what is otherwise."

II. He warmly accuses Job for some passionate words which he had spoken, that reflected on the divine government.

1. He recites the words which Job had spoken, as nearly as he can remember. Job hath said, I am righteous (v. 5), and, when urged to confess his guilt, had stiffly maintained his plea of, Not guilty: Should I lie against my right? v. 6. My wound is incurable, and likely to be mortal, and yet without transgression; not for any injustice in my hand, ch. xvi. 16, 17. He had, in effect, said that there is nothing to be got in the service of God and that no man will be the better at last for his religion (v. 9). This Elihu gathers as Job's opinion, by an innuendo from what he said (ch. ix. 22), He destroys the perfect and the wicked, which has a truth in it (for all things come alike to all), but it was ill expressed. Job sat down silently under it and attempted not his own vindication, whence Mr. Caryl well observes that good men sometimes speak worse than they mean, and that a good man will rather bear more blame than he deserves than stand to excuse himself when he has deserved any blame.

2. He charges Job: What man is like Job? v. 7. Did you ever know such a man as Job, or ever hear a man talk at such an extravagant rate? "He drinketh up scorning like water." By these foolish expressions of his he makes himself the object of scorn, lays himself very open to reproach, and gives occasion to others to laugh at him. He goes in company with the workers of iniquity (v. 8), not that in his conversation he did associate with them, but in his opinion he did favour and countenance them, and strengthen their hands.

The scope of Elihu's discourse is to reconcile Job to his afflictions. God meant him no hurt in afflicting him, but intended it for his spiritual benefit. In these verses he directs his discourse to all the company: "Hearken to me, you men of understanding" (v. 10). The righteous God never did, nor ever will do, any wrong to any of his creatures, but his ways are equal, ours are unequal.

1. This truth is laid down, both negatively and positively. God cannot do wickedness, nor the Almighty commit iniquity, v. 10. It is inconsistent with the perfection of his nature, and so it is also with the purity of his will (v. 12): God will not do wickedly, neither will the Almighty pervert judgment. He will never either do any man wrong or deny any man right, but the heavens will shortly declare his righteousness. Though he be Almighty, yet he never uses his power for the support of injustice. He is Shaddai—God all-sufficient, and therefore he cannot be tempted with evil (James i. 13). He ministers justice to all (v. 11): The work of a man shall he render unto him.

II. How warmly it is asserted, 1. With an assurance of the truth of it: Yea, surely, v. 12. 2. With an abhorrence of the very thought of the contrary

(v. 10): Far be it from God that he should do wickedness, and from us that we should imagine such a thing.

III. How evidently it is proved by two arguments:

1. His independent absolute sovereignty and dominion (v. 13): Who has given him a charge over the earth? He has the sole administration of the kingdoms of men, and has it of himself.

2. His irresistible power (v. 14): If he set his heart upon man, to contend with him, much more if (as some read it) he set his heart against man, to ruin him, if he should deal with man either by summa potestas—mere sovereignty, or by summum jus—strict justice, there were no standing before him; man's spirit and breath would soon be gone and all flesh would perish together, v. 15.

Elihu here addresses himself more directly to Job.

I. God is not to be quarrelled with for anything that he does. Shall even he that hates right govern? v. 17. The righteous Lord so loves righteousness that, in comparison with him, even Job himself, though a perfect and upright man, might be said to hate right; and shall he govern? Shall he pretend to direct God or correct what he does? Wilt thou condemn him that is righteous in all his ways, and cannot but he so? He regardeth not the rich more than the poor, and therefore it is fit he should rule, and it is not fit we should find fault with him, v. 19. A great man shall fare never the better, nor find any favour, for his wealth and greatness; nor shall a poor man fare ever the worse for his poverty, nor an honest cause be starved.

II. God is to be acknowledged and submitted to in all that he does. Divers considerations Elihu here suggests to Job, to beget in him great and high thoughts of God, and so to persuade him to submit and proceed no further in his quarrel with him.

1. God is almighty, and able to deal with the strongest of men when he enters into judgment with them (v. 20); even the people, the body of a nation, though ever so numerous, shall be troubled, unhinged, and put into disorder, when God pleases; even the mighty man, the prince, shall, if God speak the word, be taken away out of his throne. Nor is it one single mighty man only that he can thus overpower, but even hosts of them (v. 24).

2. God is omniscient, and can discover that which is most secret. As the strongest cannot oppose his arm, so the most subtle cannot escape his eye; and therefore, if some are punished either more or less than we think they should be, instead of quarrelling with God, it becomes us to ascribe it to some secret cause known to God only. Everything is open before him (v. 21): His eyes are upon the ways of man. There is no darkness nor shadow of death so close, so remote from light or sight as that in it the workers of iniquity may hide themselves from the discovering eye of the righteous God. The workers of iniquity may find ways and means to hide themselves from men, but not from God: He knows their works (v. 25), both what they do and what they design.

3. God is righteous. He will not lay upon man more than right, v. 23. As he will not punish the innocent, so he will not exact of those that are guilty more than their iniquities deserve; and of the proportion between the sin and the punishment Infinite Wisdom shall be the judge. Therefore Job was to be blamed for his complaints of God. These unjust judges were rebels to God: They turned back from him, cast off the fear of him, and abandoned the very thoughts of him; for they would not consider any of his ways, took no heed either to his precepts or to his providences, but lived without God in the world. They were tyrants to all mankind, v. 28.

4. God has an uncontrollable dominion in all the affairs of the children of men, and so guides and governs whatever concerns both communities and particular persons, that, as what he designs cannot be defeated, so what he does cannot be changed, v. 29. The frowns of all the world cannot trouble those whom God quiets with his smiles. When he gives quietness who then can make trouble? v. 29. If God give outward peace to a nation, he can secure what he gives. If God give inward peace to a man only, neither the accusations of Satan nor the afflictions of this present time, no, nor the arrests of death itself, can give trouble. See Phil. iv. 7. If God in displeasure, hide his face, and withhold the comfort of his favour, who then can behold him?

5. God is wise, and careful of the public welfare, and therefore provides that the hypocrite reign not, lest the people be ensnared, v. 30. The pride of hypocrites. They aim to reign; the praise of men, and power in the world, are their reward. The policy of tyrants. When they aim to set up themselves they sometimes make use of religion as a cloak and cover for their ambition. The danger the people are in when hypocrites reign. They are likely to be ensnared in sin, or trouble, or both.

I. Elihu instructs Job what he should say under his affliction, v. 31, 32. In general, he would have him repent of his expressions, under his affliction. Job's other friends would have had him own himself a wicked man, and by overdoing they undid. Elihu will oblige him only to own that he had, in the management of this controversy, spoken unadvisedly with his lips. He directs Job, 1. To humble himself before God for his sins, and to accept the punishment of them: "I have borne chastisement." Many are chastised that do not bear chastisement, do not bear it well, and so, in effect, do not bear it at all. Penitents, if sincere, will take all well that God does, and will bear chastisement as a medicinal operation intended for good. 2. To pray to God to discover his sins to him (v. 32). 3. To promise reformation (v. 31): I will not offend any more. "If I have done iniquity (or seeing I have), I will do so no more; whatever thou shalt discover to me to have been amiss, by thy grace I will amend it for the future."

II. He reasons with him concerning his discontent and uneasiness under his affliction, v. 33. We are ready to think every thing that concerns us should be just as we would have it; but Elihu here shows it is absurd and unreasonable to expect this: "Should it be according to thy mind? No, what reason for that?"

III. He appeals to all intelligent indifferent persons whether there was not sin and folly in that which Job said. "My desire is that Job may be tried unto the end. Let the trial be continued till the end be obtained." He appeals both to God and man, and desires the judgment of both upon it. Some read v. 36 as an appeal to God: O my Father! let Job be tried. So the margin of our Bibles, for the same word signifies my desire and my father; and some suppose that he lifted up his eyes when he said this, meaning, "O my Father who art in heaven! let Job be tried till he be subdued."

CHAP. XXXV

Job, being still silent, Elihu a third time, undertakes to show him that he had spoken amiss, and ought to recant. I. He had represented religion as an indifferent unprofitable thing; Elihu evinces the contrary, ver. 1–8. II. He had complained of God as deaf to the cries of the oppressed, ver. 9–13. III. He had despaired of the return of God's favour to him, because it was so long deferred, but Elihu shows him the true cause of the delay, ver. 14–16.

I. The bad words which Elihu charges upon Job, v. 2, 3. It intimates his good opinion of Job, that he thought better than he spoke, and that, when he perceived his mistake, he would not stand to it. "Thou hast, in effect, said, My righteousness is more than God's." Job did in effect say, My righteousness is more than God's (v. 2); for if he got nothing by his religion, God was more beholden to him than he was to God. But, though there might be some colour for it, yet it was not fair to charge these words upon Job, when he himself had made them the wicked words of prospering sinners (ch. xxi. 15, What profit shall we have if we pray to him?).

II. The good answer which Elihu gives to this (v. 4): "I will undertake to answer thee, and thy companions with thee," that is, all those that approve thy sayings. To do this he has recourse to his old maxim (ch. xxxiii. 12), that God is greater than man. Elihu needs not prove that God is above man; it is agreed by all; but he endeavours to affect Job and us with it, by an ocular demonstration of the height of the heavens and the clouds, v. 5. They are far above us, and God is far above them; how much then is he set out of the reach either of our sins or of our services! Look unto the heavens, and behold the clouds. He utterly denies that God can be either prejudiced or advantaged by what any, even the greatest men of the earth, do, or can do. Sin is said to be against God because so the sinner intends it and so God takes it, and it is an injury to his honour; yet it cannot do anything against him. Job therefore spoke amiss in saying What profit is it that I am cleansed from my sin? God was no gainer by his reformation; and who then would gain if he himself did not? The services of the best saints are no profit to him (v. 7): If thou be righteous, what givest thou to him?

Elihu returns an answer to another word that Job had said, which, he thought, reflected upon the justice and goodness of God.

I. Job complained that God did not regard the cries of the oppressed against their oppressors (v. 9): "By reason of the multitude of oppressions they make the oppressed to cry; but it is to no purpose: God does not appear to right them." This seems to refer to those words of Job (ch. xxiv. 12), Men groan from out of the city, and the soul of the wounded cries out against the oppressors, yet God lays not folly to them. Is there a righteous God, and can it be that he should so slowly hear, so slowly see?

II. How Elihu solves the difficulty. If the cries of the oppressed be not heard, the fault is in themselves; they ask and have not, but it is because they ask amiss, James iv. 3. They cry out by reason of the arm of the mighty, but it is not a penitent praying cry, the cry of nature and passion, not of grace.

1. They do not enquire after God, nor seek to acquaint themselves with him, under their affliction (v. 10): But none saith, Where is God my Maker? God is our Maker, the author of our being. It is our duty therefore to enquire after him. Where is he, that we may pay our homage to him? All are asking, Where is mirth? Where is wealth? Where is a good bargain? But none ask, Where is God my Maker?

2. They do not take notice of the mercies they enjoy in their afflictions. He provides for our inward comfort and joy under our outward troubles. He gives songs in the night, that is, when our condition is ever so dark, and sad, and melancholy, there is that in God, in his providence and promise. He preserves to us the use of our reason and understanding (v. 11): Who teaches us more than the beasts of the earth, that is, who has endued us with more noble powers and faculties than they are endued with and has made us capable of more excellent pleasures and employments here and for ever. Now this furnishes us with matter for thanksgiving, even under the heaviest burden of affliction. Whatever we are deprived of, we have our immortal souls continued to us; even those that kill the body cannot hurt them. This is the greatest excellency of reason, that it makes us capable of religion, and it is in that especially that we are taught more than the beasts and the fowls. They have wonderful instincts and sagacities in seeking out their food, their physic, their shelter; but none of them are capable of enquiring, Where is God my Maker? Something like logic, and philosophy, and politics, has been observed among the brute-creatures, but never anything of divinity or religion; these are peculiar to man. If therefore the oppressed only cry by reason of the arm of the mighty, and do not look up to God, they do no more than the brutes (who complain when they are hurt). God relieves the brute-creatures because they cry to him according to the best of their capacity, ch. xxxviii. 41; Ps. civ. 21. But what reason have men to expect relief, who are capable of enquiring after God as their Maker and yet cry to him no otherwise than as brutes do? There they cry but none gives answer. God does not work deliverance for them, because of the pride of evil men; they regard iniquity in their hearts, and therefore God will not hear their prayers, Ps. lxvi. 18; Isa. i. 15. The case is plain then, If we cry to God for the removal of the oppression and affliction we are under, and it is not removed, the reason is not because the Lord's hand is shortened or his ear heavy, but because the affliction has not done its work; we are not sufficiently humbled, and therefore must thank ourselves that it is continued.

I. Another improper word for which Elihu reproves Job (v. 14): Thou sayest thou shalt not see him; that is, 1. "Thou complainest that thou dost not understand the meaning of his severe dealings with thee." As, when we are in prosperity, we are ready to think our mountain will never be brought low, so when we are in adversity we are ready to think our valley will never be filled, but, in both, to conclude that to-morrow must be as this day, which is as absurd as to think, when the weather is either fair or foul, that it will be always so, that the flowing tide will always flow, or the ebbing tide will always ebb.

II. The answer which Elihu gives is this, 1. That, when he looked up to God, he had no just reason to speak thus despairingly: Judgment is before him, that is, "He knows what he has to do, and will do all in infinite wisdom and justice; he has the entire plan and model of providence before him. Therefore trust in him, depend upon him, wait for him, and believe that the issue will be good at last." He is a God of judgment (Isa. xxx. 18), we shall see no reason to despair of relief from him, but all the reason in the world to hope in him. "Because it is not so, because thou dost not thus trust in him, therefore the affliction which came at first from love has now displeasure mixed with it. Now God has visited thee in his anger." Elihu concludes therefore that Job opens his mouth in vain (v. 16), because he does not trust in God and wait for him. Let not that man who distrusts God think that he shall receive anything from him, James i. 7. He did not, as his other friends, condemn him for a hypocrite, but charged him only with Moses's sin, speaking unadvisedly with his lips when his spirit was provoked.

CHAP. XXXVI

Elihu, having largely reproved Job for some of his unadvised speeches, urges many reasons, taken from the wisdom and righteousness of God, his care of his people, and especially his greatness and almighty power, with which he persuades him to submit to the hand of God. I. His preface, ver. 2–4. II. The account he gives of the methods of God's providence towards the children of men, according as they conduct themselves, ver. 5–15. III. The fair warning and good counsel he gives to Job thereupon, ver. 16–21. IV. His demonstration of God's sovereignty and omnipotence, which is a reason why we should all submit to him in his dealings with us, ver. 22–23.

Once more Elihu begs the patience of the auditory, and Job's particularly. To gain this he pleads, 1. That he had a good cause, and a noble and very fruitful subject: I have yet to speak on God's behalf. 2. That he had something to offer: I will fetch my knowledge from afar (v. 3), that is, we will have recourse to our first principles. It is worth while to go far for this knowledge of God, to dig for it, to travel for it; it will recompense our pains, and, though far-fetched, is not dear-bought. "My words shall not be false. He who is perfect or upright in knowledge is now reasoning with thee; and therefore let him not only have a fair hearing, but let what he says be taken in good part, as meant well."

Elihu, being to speak on God's behalf, shows that the disposals of divine Providence are all according to the eternal rules of equity. God acts as a righteous governor, for,

I. He does not think it below him to take notice of the meanest of his subjects, but God is mighty, infinitely so, and yet he despises not any, v. 5. Job thought himself and his cause slighted because God did not immediately appear for him. "No," says Elihu, God despises not any, which is a good reason why we should honour all men.

II. He gives no countenance to the greatest, if they be bad (v. 6): He preserves not the life of the wicked. Though their life may be prolonged, yet not under any special care of the divine Providence, but only its common protection.

III. He is always ready to right those that are any way injured, and to plead, their cause (v. 6). If men will not right the injured poor, God will.

IV. He takes a particular care for the protection of his good subjects, v. 7. He not only looks on them, but he never looks off them: He withdraws not his eyes from the righteous. Though they may seem sometimes neglected and forgotten, yet the tender careful eye of their heavenly Father never withdraws from them.

1. Sometimes he prefers good people to places of trust and honour (v. 7): With kings are they on the throne, and every sheaf is made to bow to theirs. When righteous persons are advanced to places of honour and power, it is in mercy to them. It is also in mercy to those over whom they are set: When the righteous bear rule the city rejoices.

2. If at any time he bring them into affliction, it is for the good of their souls, v. 8–10. If they be bound in fetters, laid in prison as Joseph was, or holden in the cords of any other affliction, confined by pain and sickness, hampered by poverty, it is for the benefit of their souls, the consideration of which should reconcile us to affliction. Three things God intends when he afflicts us:—(1) To discover past sins to us. He shows them their work. Sin is our own work. (2) To dispose our hearts to receive present instructions: Then he opens their ear to discipline, v. 10. Whom God chastens he teaches (Ps. xciv. 12), and the affliction makes people willing to learn, softens the wax, that it may receive the impression of the seal; yet it does not do this of itself, but the grace of God working with and by it. (3) To deter and draw us off from iniquity for the future.

3. If the affliction do its work, and accomplish that for which it is sent, he will comfort them again, according to the time that he has afflicted them (v. 11). If we faithfully serve God, (1) We have the promise of outward prosperity, the promise of the life that now is, and the comforts of it, as far as is for God's glory and our good; and who would desire them any further? (2) We have the possession of inward pleasures, the comfort of communion with God and a good conscience, and that great peace which those have that love God's law.

4. If the affliction do not do its work, let them expect the consuming fire will prevail if the refining fire do not; for when God judges he will overcome.

V. He brings ruin upon hypocrites, the secret enemies of his kingdom (such as Elihu described, v. 12). They cry not when he binds them, that is, when they are in affliction, bound with the cords of trouble, their hearts are hardened, they are stubborn and unhumbled, and will not cry to God nor make their application to him. They die in youth, and their life is among the unclean, v. 14.

Elihu here comes more closely to Job; and,

I. He tells him what God would have done for him before this if he had been duly humbled under his affliction (v. 15). "The poor in spirit, those that are of a broken and contrite heart, he looks upon with tenderness, and, when they are in affliction, is ready to help them. He opens their ears, and makes them to hear joy and gladness, even in their oppressions. If thou hadst accommodated thyself to the will of God, thy liberty and plenty would have been restored to thee with advantage." 1. "Thou wouldst have been enlarged, and not confined thus by thy sickness and disgrace: He would have removed thee into a broad place where is no straitness, and thou wouldst no longer have been cramped thus and have had all thy measures broken." 2. "Thou wouldst have been enriched, and wouldst not have been left in this poor condition; thou wouldst have had thy table richly spread, not only with food convenient, but with the finest of the wheat."

II. He charges him with standing in his own light, and makes him the cause of the continuance of his own trouble (v. 17): "But thou hast fulfilled the judgment of the wicked," that is, "Whatever thou art really, in this thing thou hast conducted thyself like a wicked man, and therefore judgment and justice take hold on thee as a wicked man."

III. He cautions him not to persist in his frowardness. "Because there is wrath" (that is, "because God is a righteous governor, because thou hast reason to fear that thou art under God's displeasure) therefore beware lest he take thee away suddenly with his stroke, and be so wise as to make thy peace with him quickly and get his anger turned away from thee." This was a friendly caution to Job, and necessary. There is no escaping by money, no purchasing a pardon with silver, or gold, and such corruptible things: "Even a great ransom cannot deliver thee when God enters into judgment with thee. If all the forces of strength were at thy command, if thou couldst muster ever so many servants and vassals to appear for thee it were all in vain. There is none that can deliver out of his hand." There is no escaping by absconding (v. 20): "Desire not the night, which often favours the retreat of a conquered army and covers it; think not that thou canst so escape the righteous judgment of God, for the darkness hideth not from him," Ps. cxxxix. 11, 12. "Take heed, look well to thy own spirit, and regard not iniquity, return not to it (so some), for it is at thy peril if thou do." Let him not dare to prescribe to God, nor give him his measures (v. 22, 23): "Behold, God exalteth by his power," that is, "He does, may, and can set up and pull down whom he pleases, and therefore it is not for thee nor me to contend with him." He is an incomparable teacher: Who teaches like him? It is absurd for us to teach him who is himself the fountain of light, truth, knowledge, and instruction. He that teaches man knowledge, and so as none else can, shall not he know? Shall we light a candle to the sun? When Elihu would give glory to God as a ruler he praises him as a teacher, for rulers must teach. He teaches by the Bible, and that is the best book, teaches by his Son, and he is the best Master.

Elihu is here endeavouring to give Job great and high thoughts of God, and so to persuade him into a cheerful submission to his providence.

I. He represents the work of God, in general, v. 24. God does nothing mean. His visible works, those of nature, are such as we admire and commend, and in which we observe the Creator's wisdom, power, and goodness; shall we then find fault with his dispensations concerning us. Look which way we will, we see: "This is the work of God," the finger of God; it is the Lord's doing. Every man may see, afar off, the heaven and all its lights, the earth and all its fruits, to be the work of Omnipotence. Look at the minutest works of nature through a microscope; do they not appear curious? The eternal power and godhead of the Creator are clearly seen and understood by the things that are made, Rom. i. 20. It ought to be marvellous in our eyes. The beauty and excellency of the work of God, and the agreement of all the parts of it, are what we must remember to magnify and highly to extol.

II. He represents God, the author of them, as infinite and unsearchable, v. 26. The streams of being, power, and perfection should lead us to the fountain. God is great, infinitely so, and therefore greatly to be praised,—great, and therefore we know him not. We know that he is, but not what he is. We know what he is not, but not what he is. We know in part, but not in perfection. The number of his years cannot possibly be searched out, for he is eternal; there is no number of them. He is a Being without beginning, succession, or period, who ever was, and ever will be, and ever the same, the great I AM. This is a good reason why we should not prescribe to him, nor quarrel with him.

III. He gives some instances of God's wisdom, power, and sovereign dominion, beginning in this chapter with the clouds and the rain that descends from them. We need not be critical in examining either the phrase or the philosophy of this noble discourse. The general scope of it is to show that God is infinitely great, and the Lord of all, the first cause and supreme director of all the creatures, and has all power in heaven and earth (whom therefore we ought, with all humility and reverence, to adore, to speak well of, and to give honour to), and that it is presumption for us to prescribe to him the rules and methods of his special providence towards the children of men. Elihu, to affect Job with God's sublimity and sovereignty, had directed him (ch. xxxv. 5) to look unto the clouds. Consider the clouds,

1. As springs to this lower world, the source and treasure of its moisture. The clouds above distil upon the earth below. If the heavens become brass, the earth becomes iron; therefore thus the promise of plenty runs, I will hear the heavens and they shall hear the earth. Every good gift is from above, from him who is both Father of lights and Father of the rain. They are here said to distil upon man (v. 28); for, though indeed God causes it to rain in the wilderness where no man is (ch. xxxviii. 26; Ps. civ. 11), yet special respect is had to man herein, to whom the inferior creatures are all made serviceable. Among men, he causes his rain to fall upon the just and upon the unjust, Matt. v. 45. They are said to distil the water in small drops, not in spouts, as when the windows of heaven were opened, Gen. vii. 11. God waters the earth with that with which he once drowned it. Though it comes down in drops, yet it distils upon man abundantly (v. 28), and therefore is called the river of God which is full of water, Ps. lxv. 9. The clouds pour down according to the vapour that they draw up, v. 27. So just the heavens are to the earth, but the earth is not so in the return it makes.

2. As shadows to the upper world (v. 29): Can any understand the spreading of the clouds? Shall we then pretend to understand the reasons and methods of God's judicial proceedings with the children of men whose characters and cases are so various. By the interposition of the clouds between us and the sun, we are favoured; for they serve as an umbrella to shelter us from the violent heat of the sun. A cloud of dew in the heat of harvest is spoken of as a very great refreshment, Isa. xviii. 4. Sometimes we are by them frowned upon; for they darken the earth at noon-day and eclipse the light of the sun. Sin is compared to a cloud (Isa. xliv. 22), because it comes between us and the light of God's countenance and obstructs the shining of it. But though the clouds darken the sun for a time, and pour down rain, yet after he has wearied the cloud, he spreads his light upon it, v. 30. There is a clear shining after rain, 2 Sam. xxiii. 4.

CHAP. XXXVII

Elihu here goes on to extol the wonderful power of God in the meteors and all the changes of the weather: if, in those changes, we submit to the will of God, take the weather as it is and make the best of it, why should we not do so in other changes of our condition? Here he observes the hand of God, I. In the thunder and lightning, ver. 1–5. II. In the frost and snow, the rains and wind, ver. 6–13. III. He applies it to Job, and challenges him to solve the phenomena of these works of nature, that, confessing his ignorance in them, he might own himself as incompetent judge in the proceedings of divine Providence, ver. 14–22. And then, IV. Concludes with his principle, God is great and greatly to be feared, ver. 23, 24.

Verses 1–5

Thunder and lightning are sensible indications of the glory and majesty of Almighty God. In these God leaves not himself without witness of his greatness, as, in the rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, he leaves not himself without witness of his goodness (Acts xiv. 17). It is very probable that at this time, when Elihu was speaking, it thundered and lightened, for he speaks of the phenomena as present; and, God being about to speak (ch. xxxviii. 1), these were, as on Mount Sinai, the proper prefaces to command attention and awe. Elihu was himself affected, and desired to affect Job, with the appearance of God's glory in the thunder and lightning (v. 1, 2): "For my part," says Elihu, "my heart trembles at it; it is still terrible to me, and makes my heart beat as if it would move out of its place." He also calls upon Job to attend to it (v. 2): Hear attentively the noise of his voice. To apprehend and understand the instructions God thereby gives us, we have need to hear with great attention and application of mind. God directs the thunder, and the lightning is his, v. 3. Their production and motion are not from chance, though to us they seem accidental and ungovernable. The claps of thunder roll under the whole heaven, and are heard far and near; so are the lightnings darted to the ends of the earth. The lightning is first directed, and after it a voice roars, v. 4. The thunder is here called the voice of God's excellency, because by it he proclaims his transcendent power and greatness. He will not stay the rains and showers that usually follow upon the thunder, but will pour them out upon the earth when his voice is heard. Does God thunder thus marvellously with his voice? From this one instance we may argue to all, that, in the dispensations of his providence, there is that which is too great, too strong, for us to oppose or strive against.

The changes and extremities of the weather, wet or dry, hot or cold, are the subject of a great deal of our common talk, but how seldom do we think and speak of these things, as Elihu does here, with regard to God. We must take notice of the glory of God, not only in the thunder and lightning, but in the more common revolutions of the weather.

I. In the snow and rain, v. 6. Then he saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth. He speaks, and it is done: as in the creation of the world, Let there be light, so in the words of common providence, Snow, be thou on the earth. Saying and doing are not two things with God, though they are with us. When he speaks the word the small rain distils and the great rain pours down as he pleases—the winter-rain. The providence of God is to be acknowledged, both by husbandmen in the fields and travellers upon the road, in every shower of rain, whether it does them a kindness or a diskindness. It is sin and folly to contend with God's providence in the weather. The effect of the extremity of the winter-weather obliges both men and beasts to retire. He seals up the hand of every man. In frost and snow, husbandmen cannot follow their business, nor some tradesmen, nor travellers. The plough is laid by, the shipping laid up. Men, being taken off from their own work, may know his work, and contemplate that, and give him the glory. When we are confined to our houses we should thereby be driven to our Bibles and ours knees. The beasts also retire to their dens and remain in their close places, v. 8. The wild beasts must seek a shelter for themselves, to which by instinct they are directed, while the tame beasts, which are serviceable to man, are housed and protected by his care.

II. In the winds, which blow from different quarters and produce different effects (v. 9): Out of the hidden place (so it may be read) comes the whirlwind; it turns round, and so it is hard to say from which point it comes but it comes from the secret chamber, as the word signifies, which I am not so willing to understand of the south, because he says here (v. 17) that the wind out of the south is so far from being a whirlwind that it is a warming, quieting, wind.

III. In the frost, v. 10. See the cause of it: It is given by the breath of God, that is, by the word of his power and the command of his will; or, as some understand it, by the wind, which is the breath of God, as the thunder is his voice; it is caused by the cold freezing wind out of the north. See the effect of it: The breadth of the waters is straightened, that is, the waters are congealed, benumbed, arrested, bound up in crystal fetters. This is such an instance of the power of God as, if it were not common, would be next to a miracle.

IV. In the clouds. Three sorts of clouds he here speaks of: 1. Close, black, thick clouds, pregnant with showers; and these with watering he wearies (v. 11), that is, they spend themselves, and are exhausted by the rain into which they melt and are dissolved, pouring out water till they are weary and can pour out no more. The clouds water the earth till they are weary; they spend and are spent for our benefit. 2. Bright thin clouds, clouds without water; and these he scattereth; they are dispersed of themselves. 3. Flying clouds, which do not dissolve, as the thick cloud, into a close rain, but are carried upon the wings of the wind from place to place, dropping showers as they go; and these are said to be turned round about by his counsels, v. 12.

Elihu here addresses himself closely to Job, desiring him to apply what he had hitherto said to himself. He begs that he would hearken to this discourse (v. 14), that he would pause awhile: Stand still, and consider the wondrous works of God. Elihu, for the humbling of Job, shows him,

I. That he had no insight into natural causes, could neither see the springs of them nor foresee the effects of them (v. 15-17): Dost thou know this and know that which are the wondrous works of him who is perfect in knowledge? We are here taught, 1. The perfection of God's knowledge. It is one of the most glorious perfections of God that he is perfect in knowledge; he is omniscient. His knowledge is intuitive: he sees. It is intimate and entire. To his knowledge there is nothing distant, but all near—nothing future, but all present—nothing hid, but all open. 2. The imperfection of our knowledge. The greatest philosophers are much in the dark concerning the powers and works of nature. We are a paradox to ourselves, and about us is a mystery. It is good for us to be made sensible of our own ignorance. Some have confessed their ignorance, and those that would not do this have betrayed it. But what incompetent judges we are of the divine politics, when we understand so little even of the divine mechanics. If we foresee the change of weather a few hours before, by vulgar observation, or when second causes have begun to work by the weather-glass, yet how little do these show us of the purposes of God by these changes! We know not how the clouds are poised in the air, the balancing of them, which is one of the wondrous works of God, so balanced that they do not fall at once, nor burst into cataracts or water-spouts. He quiets the earth by the south wind, when the spring comes. As he has a blustering freezing north wind, so he has a thawing, composing, south wind; the Spirit is compared to both, because he both convinces and comforts, Cant. iv. 16.

II. That he had no share at all in the first making of the world (v. 18): Hast thou with him spread out the sky? It is strong, and has its name from its stability. It still is what it was, and suffers no decay, nor shall the ordinances of heaven be altered till the lease expires with time. It is a molten looking-glass, smooth and polished, and without the least flaw or crack. In this, as in a looking-glass, we may behold the glory of God and the wisdom of his handiwork, Ps. xix. 1.

III. That neither he nor they were able to speak of the glory of God in any proportion to the merit of the subject, v. 19, 20. He challenges Job ironically: "Teach us, if thou canst, what we shall say unto him, v. 19. Thou hast a mind to reason with God, and wouldst have us to contend with him on thy behalf; teach us then what we shall say." He owns his own insufficiency: We cannot order our speech by reason of darkness. Those that through grace know much of God, yet know little in comparison with what is to be known, and what will be known, when that which is perfect shall come and the veil shall be rent. He is even ashamed of what he has said, not of the cause, but of his own management of it: "Shall it be told him that I speak? v. 20. By no means; let it never be spoken of," for he fears that the subject has suffered by his undertaking it, as a fine face is wronged by a bad painter.

Elihu here concludes his discourse with some short but great sayings concerning the glory of God, who has said that he will dwell in the thick darkness and make that his pavilion (2 Chron. vi. 1; Ps. xviii. 11). He saw the cloud, with a whirlwind in the bosom of it, coming out of the south; but now it hung so thick, so black, over their heads, that they could none of them see the bright light which just before was in the clouds. Yet he looks to the north, and sees it clear that way, which gives him hope that the clouds are not gathering for a deluge; they are covered, but not surrounded, with them. He expects that the wind will pass (so it may be read) and cleanse them, and then fair weather will come out of the north (v. 22) and all will be well. God will not always frown, nor contend for ever. He hastens to conclude, now that God is about to speak. He observes, (1) That with God is terrible majesty. He is a God of glory and transcendent perfection. (2) That when we speak touching the Almighty we must own that we cannot find him out; our finite understandings cannot comprehend his infinite perfections, v. 23. Can we put the sea into an egg-shell? (3) That he is excellent in power. (4) That he is no less excellent in wisdom and righteousness, in judgment and plenty of justice, else there would be little excellency in his power. (5) That he will not afflict, that is, that he will not afflict willingly; it is no pleasure to him to grieve the children of men, much less his own children. Some read it thus: "The Almighty, whom we cannot find out, is great in power, but he will not afflict in judgment, and with him is plenty of justice, nor is he extreme to mark what we do amiss." (6) He values not the censures of those who are wise in their own conceit: He respecteth them not, v. 24.

CHAP. XXXVIII

In most disputes the strife is who shall have the last word. Job's friends, had in this controversy, tamely yielded it to Job, and then he to Elihu. But, after all the wranglings of the counsel at bar, the judge upon the bench must have the last word; so God had here, and so he will have in every controversy. Job had often appealed to God, and had talked boldly, but, when God took the throne, Job had nothing to say in his own defence, but was silent, before him. Job's friends had sometimes appealed to God too: "O that God would speak!" ch xi. 5. And now, at length, God does speak, when Job, by Elihu's clear and close arguings, was mollified a little, and mortified. It is the office of ministers to prepare the way of the Lord. That which the great God designs in this discourse is to humble Job, and bring him to repent of, and to recant, his passionate indecent expressions concerning God's providential dealings and this he does by calling upon Job to compare God's eternity with his own time, God's omniscience with his own ignorance, and God's omnipotence with his own impotency. 1. He begins with an awakening challenge and demand in general, ver. 2, 3. II. He proceeds in divers particular instances and proofs of Job's utter inability to contend with God: for, 1. He knew nothing of the founding of the earth, ver. 4–7. 2. Nothing of the limiting of the sea, ver. 8–11. 3. Nothing of the morning-light, ver. 12–15. 4. Nothing of the dark recesses of the sea and earth, ver. 16–21. 5. Nothing of the springs in the clouds (ver. 22–27), nor the secret counsels by which they are directed. 6. He could do nothing towards the production of the rain, or frost, or lightning (ver. 28–30, 34, 35, 37, 38), nothing towards the directing of the stars and their influences (ver. 31 33), nothing towards the making of his own soul, ver. 36. And, lastly, he could not provide for the lions and the ravens, ver. 39–41 If, in these ordinary works of nature, Job was puzzled, how durst he pretend to dive into the counsels of God's government and to judge of them?

1. Who speaks—The Lord, Jehovah, not a created angel, but the eternal Word himself, the second person in the blessed Trinity, for it is he by whom the worlds were made, and that was no other than the Son of God. He begins with the creation of the world. Elihu had said, God speaks to men and they do not perceive it (ch. xxxiii. 14); but this they could not but perceive. 2. When he spoke—Then. When they had all had their saying, then it was time for God to interpose, whose judgment is according to truth. Job had silenced his three friends, and yet could not convince them of his integrity in the main. Elihu had silenced Job, and yet could not bring him to acknowledge his mismanagement of this dispute. But now God comes, and does both, convinces Job first of his unadvised speaking and makes him cry, Peccavi—I have done wrong; and, having humbled him, he puts honour upon him, by convincing his three friends that they had done him wrong. 3. How he spoke—Out of the whirlwind, the rolling and involving cloud. A whirlwind prefaced Ezekiel's vision (Ezek. i. 4), and Elijah's, 1 Kings xix. 11. God is said to have his way in the whirlwind (Nah. i. 3), and, to show that even the stormy wind fulfils his word, here it was made the vehicle of it. 4. To whom he spoke: He answered Job, directed his speech to him, to convince him of what was amiss, before he cleared him from the unjust aspersions cast upon him. 5. What he said. The preface is very searching. (1) God charges him with ignorance and presumption in what he had said (v. 2): "Who is this that talks at this rate? Is it Job? What! my servant Job, a perfect and an upright man? Can he so far forget himself, and act unlike himself? Who, where is he that darkens counsel thus by words without knowledge? Let him show his face if he dare and stand to what he has said." A humble faith and sincere obedience shall see further and better into the secret of the Lord than all the philosophy of the schools, and the searches of science. This first word which God spoke is the more observable because Job, in his repentance, fastens upon it as that which silenced and humbled him, ch. xlii. 3. This he repeated and echoed as the arrow that stuck fast in him: "I am the fool that has darkened counsel." (2) He challenges him to give such proofs of his knowledge as would serve to justify his enquiries into the divine counsels (v. 3): "Gird up now thy loins like a stout man; I will demand of thee, will put some questions to thee, and answer me if thou canst, before I answer thine."

For the humbling of Job, God here shows him his ignorance even concerning the earth and the sea.

I. Concerning the founding of the earth.

1. Let him tell where he was when this lower world was made (v. 4): "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? Wast thou present when the world was made?" See here, (1) The greatness and glory of God: I laid the foundations of the earth. (2) The meanness of man: Where wast thou then? So far were we from having any hand in the creation of the world, which might entitle us to a dominion in it, or so much as being witnesses of it, by which we might have gained an insight into it, that we were not then in being. The first man was not, much less were we. It is the honour of Christ that he was present when this was done (Prov. viii. 22, &c.; John i. 1, 2); but we are of yesterday and know nothing. Let us not therefore find fault with the works of God.

2. Let him describe how this world was made, "Declare, if thou hast so much understanding, what were the advances of that work. Stand forth, and tell who laid the measures thereof and stretched out the line upon it. Wast thou the architect that formed the model and then drew the dimensions by rule according to it?" The vast bulk of the earth is moulded as regularly as if it had been done by line and measure; but who can describe how it was cast into this figure? How it came to be so firmly fixed. Though it is hung upon nothing, yet it is established, but who can tell upon what the foundations of it are fastened, that it may not sink with its own weight, or who laid the corner-stone thereof, that the parts of it may not fall asunder? v. 6.

3. Let him repeat if he can, the songs of praise which were sung at that solemnity (v. 7), when the morning-stars sang together, the blessed angels, who, in the morning of time, shone as brightly as the morning star, going immediately before the light which God commanded to shine out of darkness upon the earth, which was without form and void. They were the sons of God, who shouted for joy when they saw the foundations of the earth laid. The angels are called the sons of God because they bear much of his image, are with him in his house above, and serve him as a son does his father.

II. Concerning the limiting of the sea to the place appointed for it, v. 8, &c. This refers to the third day's work, when God said (Gen. i. 9), Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and it was so. 1. Out of the great deep or chaos, in which earth and water were intermixed, in obedience to the divine command the waters broke forth like a child out of the teeming womb, v. 8. 2. This new-born babe is clothed and swaddled, v. 9. The cloud is made the garment thereof, with which it is covered, and thick darkness (that is, shores vastly remote and distant from one another and quite in the dark one to another) is a swaddling-band for it. It is not said, He made rocks and mountains its swaddling bands, but clouds and darkness, something that we are not aware of and should think least likely for such a purpose. 3. There is a cradle too provided for this babe: I broke up for it my decreed place, v. 10. Valleys were sunk for it in the earth, capacious enough to receive it, and there it is laid to sleep; and, if it be sometimes tossed with winds, that (as Bishop Patrick observes) is but the rocking of the cradle, which makes it sleep the faster. As for the sea, so for every one of us, there is a decreed place; for he that determined the times before appointed determined also the bounds of our habitation. 4. This babe being made unruly and dangerous by the sin of man, which was the original of all unquietness and danger in this lower world, there is also a prison provided for it; bars and doors are set, v. 10. And it is said to it, by way of check to its insolence, Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further. The sea is God's, for he made it, he restrains it; he says to it, Here shall thy proud waves be stayed, v. 11. This may be considered as an act of God's power over the sea. Though it is so vast a body, and though its motion is sometimes extremely violent, yet God has it under check. Its waves rise no higher, its tides roll no further, than God permits; and this is mentioned as a reason why we should stand in awe of God (Jer. v. 22), and yet why we should encourage ourselves in him, for he that stops the noise of the sea, even the noise of her waves, can, when he pleases, still the tumult of the people, Ps. lxv. 7.

The Lord here proceeds to ask Job many puzzling questions, to convince him of his ignorance, and so to shame him for his folly in prescribing to God. Job is here challenged to give an account of six things:—

I. Of the springs of the morning, the dayspring from on high, v. 12-15. It was not we, it was not any man, that commanded the morning-light at first, or appointed the place of its springing up and shining forth, or the time of it. The constant and regular succession of day and night was no contrivance of ours; it is the glory of God that it shows, and his handy work, not ours, Ps. xix. 1, 2. It is quite out of our power to alter this course: "Hast thou countermanded the morning since thy days? No, never. Why then wilt thou pretend to direct the divine counsels, or expect to have the methods of Providence altered in favour of thee?" It is God that has appointed the day-spring to visit the earth, and diffuses the morning light through the air, which receives it as readily as the clay does the seal (v. 14), immediately admitting the impressions of it, so as of a sudden to be all over enlightened by it, as the seal stamps its image on the wax; and they stand as a garment, or as if they were clothed with a garment. The earth puts on a new face every morning, and dresses itself as we do, puts on light as a garment, and is then to be seen. This is made a terror to evil-doers. God makes the light a minister of his justice as well as of his mercy. It is designed to shake the wicked out of the earth, and for that purpose it takes hold of the ends of it, as we take hold of the ends of a garment to shake the dust and moths out of it. Job had observed what a terror the morning light is to criminals, because it discovers them (ch. xxiv. 13, &c.), and God here asks him whether the world was indebted to him for that kindness? No, the great Judge of the world sends forth the beams of the morning light as his messengers to detect criminals (v. 15), that their light may be withholden from them (that is, that they may lose their comfort, their confidence, their liberties, their lives) and that their high arm, which they have listed up against God and man, may be broken, and they deprived of their power to do mischief. Here we are reminded of the Benedictus (Luke i. 78, By the tender mercy of our God the day-spring from on high has visited us, to give light to those that sit in darkness, 2 Cor. iv. 6), and the Magnificat (Luke i. 51), showing that God, in his gospel, has shown strength with his arm, scattered the proud, and put down the mighty, by that light by which he designed to shake the wicked, to shake wickedness itself out of the earth, and break its high arm.

II. Of the springs of the sea (v. 16): "Hast thou entered into them, or hast thou walked in the search of the depth? God's way in the government of the world is said to be in the sea, and in the great waters (Ps. lxxvii. 19), intimating that it is hidden from us and not to be pried into by us.

III. Of the gates of death: Have these been open to thee? v. 16. Death is a grand secret. Man knows not his time. We cannot describe what death is. Let us make sure that the gates of heaven shall be opened to us on the other side death, and then we need not fear the opening of the gates of death, though it is a way we are to go but once. While we are here, in a world of sense, we speak of the world of spirits as blind men do of colours.

IV. Of the breadth of the earth (v. 18): Hast thou perceived that? The knowledge of this might seem most level to him and within his reach; yet he is challenged to declare this if he can. It is but a point to the universe yet, small as it is, we cannot be exact in declaring the dimensions of it. Job had never sailed round the world, nor any before him; so little did men know the breadth of the earth that it was but a few ages ago that the vast continent of America was discovered, which had, time out of mind, lain hidden. It is presumption for us, who perceive not the breadth of the earth, to dive into the depth of God's counsels.

V. Of the place and way of light and darkness. Of the day-spring he had spoken before (v. 12) and he returns to speak of it again (v. 19): Where is the way where light dwells? And again (v. 24): By what way is the light parted? When God, in the beginning, first spread darkness upon the face of the deep, and afterwards commanded the light to shine out of darkness, by that mighty word, Let there be light, was Job a witness to the order, to the operation? Though we long ever so much either for the shining forth of the morning or the shadows of the evening, we know not whither to send, or go, to fetch them, nor can tell the paths to the house thereof, v. 20. We were not then born, nor is the number of our days so great that we can describe the birth of that first-born of the visible creation, v. 21. Shall we then undertake to discourse of God's counsels, which were from eternity, or to find out the paths to the house thereof, to solicit for the alteration of them? It is no order of ours, that is executed by the outgoings of the morning light and the darkness of the night. We cannot so much as tell whence they come nor whither they go (v. 24): By what way is the light parted in the morning, when, in an instant, it shoots itself into all the parts of the air above the horizon. It is a marvellous change that passes over us every morning by the return of the light and every evening by the return of the darkness; but we expect them, and so they are no surprise nor uneasiness to us. If we would, in like manner, reckon upon changes in our outward condition, we should neither in the brightest noon expect perpetual day nor in the darkest midnight despair of the return of the morning. God has set the one over against the other, like the day and night; and so must we, Eccles. vii. 14.

VI. Of the treasures of the snow and hail (v. 22, 23): "Hast thou entered into these and taken a view of them?" In the clouds the snow and hail are generated, and thence they come in such abundance that one would think there were treasures of them laid up in store there, whereas indeed they are produced for the occasion. What folly it is to strive against God, who is thus prepared for battle and war, and how much it is our interest to make our peace with him and to keep ourselves in his love.

Hitherto God had put questions to Job to convince him of his ignorance. Now he comes, in the same manner, to show his weakness. It is but little that he knows, and therefore he ought not to arraign the divine counsels. It is but little that he can do, and therefore he ought not to oppose the proceedings of Providence. Let him consider what great things God does, and try whether he can do the like.

I. God has thunder, and lightning, and rain, and frost, at command, but Job has not, and therefore let him not dare to compare himself with God, or to contend with him. He has a sovereign dominion over the waters, even when they seem to overflow and to be from under his check, v. 25. He has divided a watercourse. Thus the hearts of kings are said to be in God's hand; and as the rains, those rivers of God, he turns them whithersoever he will. The lightning or the thunder, are not blind bullets, but go the way that God himself, who means no hurt to them, directs.

In directing the course of the rain he does not neglect the wilderness, the desert land (v. 26, 27), where no man is. God's providence reaches further than man's industry. If he had not more kindness for many of the inferior creatures than man has, it would go ill with them. When there was not a man to till the ground, yet there went up a mist and watered it. But we cannot make it fruitful without God; it is he that gives the increase. God has enough for all, and wonderfully provides even for those creatures that man neither has service from nor makes provision for. He is, in a sense, the Father of the rain, v. 28. Even the small drops of the dew he distils upon the earth, as the God of nature; and, as the God of grace, he rains righteousness upon us and is himself as the dew unto Israel. See Hos. xiv. 5, 6; Micah v. 7. The ice and the frost, by which the waters are congealed are produced by his providence, v. 29, 30. These are very common things, which lessens the strangeness of them. But, considering what a vast change is made by them in a very little time, we may well ask, "Out of whose womb came the ice? What created power could produce such a wonderful work?" No power but that of the Creator himself. Job cannot command one shower of rain: "Canst thou lift up thy voice to the clouds, those bottles of heaven, that abundance of waters may cover thee, to water thy fields when they are dry and parched? Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go on thy errand. Will they come at thy call, and say unto thee, Here we are?" No, the ministers of God's wrath will not be ministers of ours.

II. God has the stars of heaven under his command and cognizance. God mentions particularly the fixed stars. It is supposed that they have an influence upon this earth, notwithstanding their vast distance, not upon the minds of men or the events of providence (men's fate is not determined by their stars), but upon the ordinary course of nature. And if the stars have such a dominion over this earth (v. 33), though they are but mere matter, much more has he who is their Maker and ours, and who is an Eternal Mind. Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades? Canst thou loose the bands of Orion? Both summer and winter will have their course. God can change them when he pleases, can make the spring cold, and so bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, and the winter warm, and so loose the bands of Orion; but we cannot. God, who calls the stars by their names (Ps. cxlvii. 4), calls them forth in their respective seasons, appointing them the time of their rising and setting. But this is not our province; we cannot bring forth Mazzaroth— the stars in the southern signs, nor guide Arcturus— those in the northern, v. 32. We know not the ordinances of heaven, v. 33. So far are we from being able to change them that we can give no account of them; they are a secret to us. Shall we then pretend to know God's counsels. Shall we then teach God how to govern the world?

III. God is the author and giver, the father and fountain of all wisdom and understanding, v. 36. The souls of men are nobler and more excellent beings than the stars of heaven and shine more brightly. The powers and faculties of reason with which man is endued bring him into some alliance to the blessed angels; and whence comes this light, but from the Father of lights? Who else has put wisdom into the inner parts of man, and given understanding to the heart? The rational soul itself, and its capacities, come from him as the God of nature; for he forms the spirit of man within him. We did not make our own souls, nor can we describe how they act, nor how they are united to our bodies. He only that made them knows them. Shall we pretend to be wiser than God, when we have all our wisdom from him?

IV. God has the clouds under his cognizance and government, v. 37. Can any man, with all his wisdom, undertake to number the clouds. And when the clouds have poured down rain in abundance, so that the dust grows into solid mire and the clods cleave fast together (v. 38), who can stay the bottles of heaven? As we cannot command a shower of rain, so we cannot command a fair day, without God.

V. God provides food for the inferior creatures. The following chapter is wholly taken up with the instances of God's power and goodness about animals, and therefore some transfer to it the last three verses of this chapter, which speak of the provision made, v. 39, 40. "Let us try that then: Wilt thou hunt the prey for the lion? Thou valuest thyself upon thy possessions of cattle which thou wast once owner of, the oxen, and asses, and camels, that were fed at thy crib; but wilt thou undertake the maintenance of the lions, and the young lions, when they couch in their dens, waiting for a prey? No, they can shift for themselves without thee: But I do it." The all-sufficiency of the divine providence has wherewithal to satisfy the desire of every living thing. See the bounty of the divine Providence, that, wherever it has given life, it will give livelihood. The young ravens, v. 41, ravenous birds, are fed by the divine Providence. Who but God provides for the raven his food? They cry and this is interpreted a crying to God. It being the cry of nature, it is looked upon as directed to the God of nature. Some way or other he provides for them, so that they grow up, and come to maturity. And he that takes this care of the young ravens certainly will not be wanting to his people.

CHAP. XXXIX

God proceeds here to show Job what little reason he had to charge him with unkindness who was so compassionate to the inferior creatures and took such a tender care of them. He shows him also what reason he had to be humble who knew so little of the nature of the creatures about him and had so little influence upon them, and to submit to that God on whom they all depend. I. Concerning the wild goats and the hinds, ver. 1–4. II. Concerning the wild ass, ver. 5–8. III. Concerning the unicorn, ver. 9–12. IV. Concerning the peacock, ver. 13. V. Concerning the ostrich, ver. 13–18. VI. Concerning the horse, ver. 19–25. VII. Concerning the hawk and the eagle, ver. 26–30.

God here shows Job what little acquaintance he had with the untamed creatures that run wild in the deserts, but are the care of the divine Providence.

I. The wild goats and the hinds. Though they bring forth their young with a great deal of difficulty and sorrow, and have no assistance from man, yet, by the good providence of God, their young ones are safely produced, v. 3. Concerning the growth of their young (v. 4): They are in good liking; after their dams have suckled them awhile they shift for themselves in the cornfields, and are no more burdensome to them, which is an example to children, when they have grown up, not to be always hanging upon their parents.

II. The wild ass, a creature we frequently read of in Scripture, some say untameable. Who but God has sent out the wild ass free? He has given a disposition to it, and therefore a dispensation for it. Freedom from service, and liberty to range at pleasure, are but the privileges of a wild ass. It is a pity that any of the children of men should covet such a liberty. It is better to labour and be good for something than ramble and be good for nothing (v. 6). Whose house I have made the wilderness, where he has room enough to traverse his ways. The tame ass, that labours, and is serviceable to man, has his master's crib to go to both for shelter and food, and lives in a fruitful land: but the wild ass, that will have his liberty, must have it in a barren land. He has no owner, nor will he be in subjection: He scorns the multitude of the city, and the crying of the driver is nothing to him. The range of the mountains is his pasture, and a bare pasture it is; there he searches after here and there a green thing, as he can find it and pick it up; whereas the labouring asses have green things in plenty, without their searching for them. From the untamableness of this and other creatures we may infer how unfit we are to give law to Providence, who cannot give law even to a wild ass's colt.

III. The unicorn—rhem, a strong creature (Num. xxiii. 22), a stately proud creature, Ps. xcii. 10. He is able to serve, but not willing; and God here challenges Job to force him to it. "Since thou dost pretend" (says God) "to bring everything beneath thy sway, begin with the unicorn, and try thy skill upon him. Now that thy oxen and asses are all gone, try whether he will be willing to serve thee in their stead (v. 9) and whether he will be content with the provision thou usedst to make for them: Will he abide by thy crib? No; Thou canst not tame him, nor bind him with his band, nor set him to draw the harrow," v. 10. Though the wild bull (which some think is meant here by the unicorn) will not serve him, nor submit to his band in the furrows, yet there are tame bullocks that will. "Thou darest not trust him; though his strength is great, yet thou wilt not leave thy labour to him, as thou dost with thy asses or oxen. Thou wilt never depend upon the wild bull, as likely to come to thy harvest-work, much less to go through it, to bring home thy seed and gather it into thy barn," v. 11, 12.

The ostrich is a very large bird, but it never flies. Some have called it a winged camel.

I. Something that it has in common with the peacock, that is, beautiful feathers (v. 13): Gavest thou proud wings unto the peacocks? Fine feathers make proud birds. The peacock is an emblem of pride; the ostrich too has goodly feathers, and yet is a foolish bird. God gives his gifts variously, and those gifts are not always the most valuable that make the finest show. Who would not rather have the voice of the nightingale than the tail of the peacock, the eye of the eagle and her soaring wing, and the natural affection of the stork, than the beautiful wings and feathers of the ostrich, which can never rise above the earth, and is without natural affection?

II. Something that is peculiar to itself. Most birds, as well as other animals, are strangely guided by natural instinct in providing for the preservation of their young. But the ostrich is a monster, for she drops her eggs anywhere upon the ground and takes no care to hatch them. If the sand and the sun will hatch them, well and good; for she will not warm them, v. 14. The foot of the traveller may crush them, and the wild beast break them, v. 15. She is hardened against her young ones. Her labour in laying her eggs is in vain, because she has not that tender concern for them that she should have. God has deprived her of wisdom. This intimates that the art which other animals have to nourish and preserve their young is God's gift, and that, where it exists not, God denies it, that by the folly of the ostrich, as well as by the wisdom of the ant, we may learn to be wise. So careless are many parents of their children; some of their bodies, not providing for their own house, and therefore as bad as the ostrich; but many more are thus careless of their children's souls, take no care of their education, send them abroad into the world untaught, unarmed, forgetting what corruption there is in the world through lust. She leaves her eggs in danger, but, if she herself be in danger, she lifts up her wings, and, with the help of them, runs so fast that a horseman at full speed cannot overtake her: She scorneth the horse and his rider. Those that are least under the law of natural affection often contend most for the law of self-preservation.

God, having displayed his power in those creatures that despise man, here shows it in one serviceable to man, and that is the horse, especially the horse that is prepared against the day of battle. It seems, there was, in Job's country, a noble breed of horses. The great horse has a great deal of strength and spirit (v. 19): Hast thou given the horse strength? He uses his strength for man, but God gave it to him, who is the fountain of all the powers of nature. It is a mercy to man to have such a servant, which, though very strong, submits to the management of a child, and rebels not against his owner. His neck is clothed with thunder, with a large and flowing mane. The glory of his nostrils, when he snorts, flings up his head, and throws foam about, is terrible, v. 20. How frolicsome he is (v. 21): He paws in the valley. He goes on to meet the armed men, animated only by the sound of the trumpet, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting of the soldiers, v. 25. How fearless he is (v. 22): He mocks at fear, and makes a jest of it. High mettle is the praise of a horse rather than of a man, whom fierceness and rage ill become. This description of the war-horse will help to explain that character which is given of presumptous sinners, Jer. viii. 6.

The birds of the air are proofs of the wonderful power and providence of God. 1. The hawk, a noble bird of great strength and sagacity, and yet a bird of prey, v. 26. This bird is here taken notice of for her flight, which is swift and strong, and especially for the course she steers towards the south, whither she follows the sun in winter. This is her wisdom, and it was God that gave her this wisdom, not man. 2. The eagle, a royal bird is here taken notice of.

(1) For the height of her flight. No bird soars so high, has so strong a wing, nor can so well bear the light of the sun. Now, "Doth she mount at thy command? v. 27. No; it is by the natural power and instinct God has given her." (2) For the strength of her nest. Her house is her castle and stronghold; she makes it on high and on the rock, the crag of the rock (v. 28), which sets her and her young out of the reach of danger. (3) For her quicksightedness (v. 29): Her eyes behold afar off, not upwards, but downwards, in quest of her prey. In this she is an emblem of a hypocrite, who, while, in the profession of religion, he seems to rise towards heaven, keeps his eye and heart upon the prey on earth, some temporal advantage, some widow's house or other that he hopes to devour, under pretence of devotion. (4) For the way she has of maintaining herself and her young. She preys upon living animals, which she seizes and tears to pieces, and then carries to her young ones, which are taught to suck up blood; they do it by instinct, and know no better. Our Saviour refers to this instinct of the eagle, Matt. xxiv. 28. Wheresoever the carcase is, there will the eagles be gathered together.

CHAP. XL

Many humbling questions God had put to Job, now, in this chapter, I. He demands an answer to them, ver. 1, 2. II. Job submits in a humble silence, ver. 3–5. III God proceeds to reason with him, for his conviction, concerning the infinite distance and disproportion between him and God, showing that he was by no means an equal match for God He challenges him (ver. 6, 7) to vie with him, if he durst, for justice (ver. 8), power (ver. 9), majesty (ver. 10), and dominion over the proud (ver. 11–14), and he gives an instance of his power in one particular animal, here called "Behemoth," ver. 15–24.

I. A humbling challenge which God gave to Job. Job remained silent, and therefore God put him upon replying, v. 1, 2. Some think God said it in a still small voice, which wrought more upon Job than the whirlwind did, as upon Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 12, 13. 1. God puts a convincing question to him: "Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct him?" Those who quarrel with God do, in effect, go about to teach him how to mend his work. Some read it, Is it any wisdom to contend with the Almighty? 2. He demands a speedy reply to it: "He that reproaches God let him answer this question to his own conscience, and answer it thus, Far be it from me to contend with the Almighty or to instruct him."

II. Job's humble submission. Now Job came to himself, and began to melt into godly sorrow. When his friends reasoned with him he did not yield. They had condemned him for a wicked man; Elihu himself had been very sharp upon him (ch. xxxiv. 7, 8, 37); but God had not given him such hard words. We may expect better treatment from God than we meet with from our friends. This the good man is here overcome by, and yields himself a conquered captive to the grace of God. 1. He owns himself an offender (v. 4): "Behold, I am vile, and abominable in my own eyes." Repentance changes men's opinion of themselves. When God talked with him, he had nothing to say. What shall I answer thee? Here he gives the reason of his silence; it was not because he was sullen, but because he was convinced he had been in the wrong. 2. He promises not to offend any more. He enjoins himself silence (v. 4): "I will lay my hand upon my mouth, will keep that as with a bridle, to suppress all passionate thoughts which may arise in my mind, and keep them from breaking out in intemperate speeches." Job had suffered his evil thoughts to vent themselves: "Once have I spoken amiss, yea, twice," that is, "divers times, in one discourse and in another; but I have done: I will not answer; I will not stand to what I have said, nor say it again; I will proceed no further."

Job was greatly humbled for what God had already said, but not sufficiently; God here proceeds to reason with him as before, v. 6. God begins with a challenge (v. 7): "Gird up thy loins now like a man; if thou hast the courage and confidence thou hast pretended to, show them now."

I. We cannot vie with God for justice, the Lord is righteous and holy in his dealings with us, but we are unrighteous and unholy in our conduct towards him; we have a great deal to blame ourselves for, but nothing to blame him for (v. 8): "Wilt thou disannul my judgment?" "Wilt thou," says God, "condemn me, that thou mayest be righteous? Must my honour suffer for the support of thy reputation?"

II. We cannot vie with God for power; and therefore, as it is great impiety, so it is great impudence to contest with him: "Hast thou an arm like God, equal to his in length and strength? Or canst thou thunder with a voice like him, as he did (ch. xxxvii. 1, 2), or does now out of the whirlwind?" Man cannot speak so convincingly, so powerfully, nor with such a commanding conquering force as God can, who speaks, and it is done. His creating voice is called his thunder (Ps. civ. 7), so is that voice of his with which he terrifies and discomfits his enemies, 1 Sam. ii. 10. Out of heaven shall he thunder upon them.

III. We cannot vie with God for beauty and majesty, v. 10. "If thou wilt enter into a comparison with him, and appear more amiable, put on thy best attire: Deck thyself now with majesty and excellency. Appear in all the martial pomp, in all the royal pageantry that thou hast; make the best of everything that will set thee off: Array thyself with glory and beauty, such as may awe thy enemies and charm thy friends; but what is it all to the divine majesty and beauty? No more than the light of a glow-worm to that of the sun when he goes forth in his strength."

IV. We cannot vie with God for dominion over the proud, v. 11–14. If Job can humble and abase proud tyrants and oppressors as easily and effectually as God can, it shall be acknowledged that he has some colour to compete with God.

1. The justice Job is here challenged to do is to bring the proud low with a look.

(1) It is here supposed that God can do it and will do it himself, else he would not have put it thus upon Job. By this God proves himself to be God, that he resists the proud, sits Judge upon them, and is able to bring them to ruin. Proud people are wicked people, and pride is at the bottom of a great deal of the wickedness that is in this world. Proud people will certainly be abased and brought low; for pride goes before destruction. The wrath of God, scattered among the proud, will humble them, and break them, and bring them down. Who knows the power of his anger? God can and does easily abase proud tyrants; he can look upon them, and bring them low, by one angry look, as he can, by a gracious look, revive the hearts of the contrite ones. He can not only bring them to the dust, from which they might hope to arise, but hide them in the dust, like the proud Egyptian whom Moses slew and hid in the sand (Exod. ii. 12). They were proud of the figure they made, but they shall be buried in oblivion and be no more remembered than those that are hidden in the dust. They were linked in leagues and confederacies to do mischief, and are now bound in bundles. They are hidden together, ch. xvii. 16. He binds their faces in secret or as dead men. Thus complete will be the victory that God will gain, at last, over proud sinners that set themselves in opposition to him.

(2) It is here proposed to Job to do it. He had been passionately quarrelling with God and his providence. "Come," says God, "try thy hand first upon proud men, and thou wilt soon see how little they value the rage of thy wrath; and shall I then regard it, or be moved by it?" If God, and he only, has power enough to humble and bring down proud men, no doubt he has wisdom enough to know when and how to do it, and it is not for us to prescribe to him or to teach him how to govern the world.

2. The justice which is here promised to be done him if he can perform such mighty works as these (v. 14): "Then I will also confess unto thee that thy right hand is sufficient to save thee, though, after all, it would be too weak to contend with me."

God, for the further proving of his own power, concludes his discourse with the description of two mighty animals, far exceeding man in bulk and strength, one he calls behemoth, the other leviathan. In these verses we have the former described. "Behold now behemoth, and consider whether thou art able to contend with him who made that beast and gave him all the power he has, and whether it is not thy wisdom rather to submit to him and make thy peace with him." Behemoth signifies beasts in general, but must here be meant of some one particular species. Some understand it of the bull; others of an amphibious animal called the river-horse (hippopotamus), living in the river Nile.

I. The description here given of the behemoth.

1. His body is very strong and well built. His strength is in his loins, v. 16. His bones, compared with those of other creatures, are like bars of iron, v. 18. His back-bone is so strong that, though his tail be not large, yet he moves it like a cedar, with a commanding force, v. 17.

2. He feeds on the productions of the earth and does not prey upon other animals: He eats grass as an ox (v. 15), the mountains bring him forth food (v. 20), and the beasts of the field do not tremble before him nor flee from him, as from a lion, but they play about him, knowing they are in no danger from him.

3. He lodges under the shady trees (v. 21), which cover him with their shadow (v. 22), where he has a free and open air to breathe in, while lions, which live by prey, when they would repose themselves, are obliged to retire into a close and dark den, to live therein, and to abide in the covert of that, ch. xxxviii. 40. Those who are a terror to others cannot but be sometimes a terror to themselves too; but those will be easy who will let others be easy about them; and the reed and fens, and the willows of the brook, though a very weak and slender fortification, yet are sufficient for the defence and security of those who therefore dread no harm, because they design none.

4. He is a very great and greedy drinker. His size is prodigious, and therefore he must have supply accordingly, v. 23. His eye anticipates more than he can take; for, when he is very thirsty he trusts that he can drink up Jordan in his mouth, and even takes it with his eyes, v. 24. His nose has in it strength for, when he goes greedily to drink with it, he pierces through snares or nets.

II. This description of this mountain of a beast is an argument with us to humble ourselves before the great God. He made this vast animal; it is behemoth which I made, v. 15. This beast is here called the chief, in its kind, of the ways of God (v. 19), an eminent instance of the Creator's power and wisdom. "It is behemoth, which I made with thee; I made that beast as well as thee, and he does not quarrel with me; why then dost thou? He that made him can make his sword to approach to him (v. 19), that is, the same hand that made him, notwithstanding his great bulk and strength can unmake him again at pleasure and kill an elephant as easily as a worm or a fly, without any difficulty. God that gave to all the creatures their being may take away the being he gave; for may he not do what he will with his own? The behemoth perhaps is here intended (as well as the leviathan afterwards) to represent those proud tyrants and oppressors whom God had just now challenged Job to abase and bring down. He that framed the engine, and put the parts of it together, knows how to take it in pieces.

CHAP. XLI

The description here given of the leviathan, a very large, strong, formidable fish, or water-animal, is designed yet further to convince Job of his own impotency, and of God's omnipotence. I. To convince Job of his own weakness he is here challenged to subdue and take this leviathan (ver. 1–9). II. To convince Job of God's power and terrible majesty several particular instances are here given of the strength and terror of the leviathan, which is no more than what God has given him, nor more than he has under his check, ver. 11, 12. The face of the leviathan is here described to be terrible (ver. 13, 14), his scales close (ver. 15–17), his breath and neesings sparkling (ver. 18–21), his flesh firm (ver 22–24), his strength and spirit, when he is attacked, insuperable (ver. 25–30), his motions turbulent (ver. 31, 32), so that, upon the whole, he is a very terrible creature, and man is no match for him, ver. 33, 34.

Whether this leviathan be a whale or a crocodile is a great dispute among the learned. The whale is much larger and a nobler animal and the creation of whales was generally looked upon as a most illustrious proof of the eternal power of the Creator.

I. How unable Job was to master the leviathan. 1. He could not catch him with angling, v. 1, 2. He had no bait wherewith to deceive him, no hook wherewith to catch him, no fish-line wherewith to draw him out of the water, nor a thorn to run through his gills, on which to carry him home. 2. He could not force him to cry for quarter, v. 3, 4. "He knows his own strength too well to make many supplications to thee, and to make a covenant with thee to be thy servant on condition thou wilt save his life." 3. He could not entice him into a cage, and keep him there as a bird for the children to play with, v. 5. 4. He could not have him served up to his table; he and his companions could not make a banquet of him. 5. They could not enrich themselves with the spoil of him: Shall they part him among the merchants, the bones to one, the oil to another? If they can catch him, they will; but the art of fishing for whales was not brought to perfection then, as it has been since. 6. They could not destroy him, could not fill his head with fish-spears, v. 7. 7. It was to no purpose to attempt it: The hope of taking him is in vain, v. 9. Shall not one be cast down even at the sight of him? "Touch him if thou dare; remember the battle, how unable thou art to encounter such a force." Job is hereby admonished not to proceed in his controversy with God, but to make his peace with him.

II. Thence he infers how unable he was to contend with the Almighty. None is so fierce, none so foolhardy, that he dares to stir up the leviathan (v. 10), and who then is able to stand before God.

I. God's sovereign dominion and independency laid down, v. 11. 1. That he is indebted to none of his creatures. "Who has prevented me?" that is, "who has laid any obligations upon me by any services he has done me?" 2. That he is the rightful Lord and owner of all the creatures: "Whatsoever is under the whole heaven, animate or inanimate, is mine."

II. The proof and illustration of it, from the wonderful structure of the leviathan, v. 12.

1. The parts of his body, the power he exerts, are what God will not conceal. Though he is a creature of monstrous bulk, yet there is in him a comely proportion. (1) The leviathan, at first sight, appears formidable and inaccessible, v. 13, 14. Who dares come so near him while he is alive as to take a distinct view of the face of the garment, the skin with which he is clothed, so near him as to bridle him, or to be within reach of his jaws, which are like a double bridle? Who will venture to look into his mouth, as we do into a horse's mouth? He that opens the doors of his face will see his teeth terrible round about. (2) His scales are his beauty and strength, and therefore his pride, v. 15-17. The crocodile is indeed remarkable for his scales; if we understand it of the whale, we must understand by these shields (for so the word is) the several coats of his skin. (3) He scatters terror with his very breath; if he spout up water, it is like a light shining, either with the froth or the light of the sun shining through it, v. 18. The eyes of the whale are reported to shine in the night-time like the eye-lids of the morning; the same they say of the crocodile. Probably these hyperbolical expressions (v. 19–21) are used concerning the leviathan to intimate the terror of the wrath of God. (4) He is of invincible strength so that he frightens all that come in his way, but is not himself frightened by any. Take a view of his neck, and there remains strength, v. 22. Sorrow rejoices (or rides in triumph) before him, for he makes terrible work wherever he comes. His flesh is of brass, which Job had complained his was not, ch. vi. 12. His heart is as firm as a stone, v. 24. He has spirit equal to his bodily strength. When he raises up himself like a moving mountain in the great waters even the mighty are afraid lest he should overturn their ships. (5) All the instruments of slaughter that are used against him do him no hurt and therefore are no terror to him, v. 26–29. (6) His very motion in the water troubles it and puts it into a ferment, v. 31, 32.

2. He concludes with four things in general concerning this animal:—(1) Upon earth there is not his like, v. 33. No creature in this world is comparable to him for strength. It is well for man that he is confined to the waters and there has a watch set upon him (ch. vii. 12). (2) He is made without fear. (3) He is himself very proud; though lodged in the deep, yet he beholds all high things, v. 34. (4) He is a king over all the children of pride. Whatever bodily accomplishments men are proud of, and puffed up with, the leviathan excels them and is a king over them. Some read it so as to understand it of God: He that beholds all high things, even he, is King over all the children of pride; he can tame the behemoth (ch. xl. 15) and the leviathan. This discourse concerning those two animals was brought in to prove that it is God only who can look upon proud men and abase them (ch. xl. 11–13). He is King over all the children of pride, whether brutal or rational, and can make them all either bend or break before him, Isa. ii. 11.

CHAP. XLII

Solomon says, "Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof," Eccles. vii. 8. It was so here in the story of Job; at evening-time it was light. Three things we have met with in this book which, I confess, have troubled me very much; but we find all the three grievances redressed, in this chapter, every thing set to rights. I. It has been a great trouble to us to see such a holy man as Job so fretful, and especially to hear him quarrel with God. Here he recovers his temper, is sorry for what he has said amiss, unsays it, and humbles himself before God, ver. 1–6. II. It has been likewise a great trouble to us to see Job and his friends so much at variance, though they were all very wise and good men; but here we have this grievance redressed likewise, the differences between them happily adjusted, and all joining in sacrifices and prayers, mutually accepted of God, ver. 7–9. III. It has troubled us to see a man of such eminent piety and usefulness as Job so grievously afflicted, so poor, so slighted, and made the very centre of all the calamities of human life; but here we have this grievance redressed too, Job healed of all his ailments, more honoured and beloved than ever, enriched with an estate double to what he had before, surrounded with all the comforts of life, and as great an instance of prosperity as ever he had been of affliction and patience, ver. 10–17. All this is written, that we, under these and the like discouragements that we meet, through patience and comfort of this scripture may have hope.

The words of Job justifying himself were ended, ch. xxxi. 40. The words of Job judging and condemning himself began, ch. xl. 4, 5. Here he goes on with words to the same purport. Though his patience had not its perfect work, his repentance for his impatience had. He is here thoroughly humbled for his folly and unadvised speaking, and it was forgiven him. When God had said all that to him concerning his own greatness and power appearing in the creatures then Job answered the Lord (v. 1), by way of submission.

I. He subscribes to the truth of God's unlimited power, knowledge, and dominion, to prove which was the scope of God's discourse out of the whirlwind, v. 2. 1. He owns that God can do everything. What can be too hard for him that made behemoth and leviathan, and manages both as he pleases? He knew this before, and had himself discoursed very well upon the subject, but now he knew it with application. "Thou canst do everything, and therefore canst raise me out of this low condition, which I have so often foolishly despaired of as impossible: I now believe thou art able to do this." 2. No thought can be withholden from him. Not a fretful, discontented, unbelieving thought is in our minds at any time but God is a witness to it. Whatever the Lord pleased, that did he. Job had said this passionately, complaining of it (ch. xxiii. 13), What his soul desireth even that he doeth; now he says, with pleasure and satisfaction, that God's counsels shall stand. If God's thoughts concerning us be thoughts of good, to give us an unexpected end, he cannot be withheld from accomplishing his gracious purposes.

II. He owns himself to be guilty of that which God had charged him with in the beginning of his discourse, v. 3. "Lord, the first word thou saidst was, Who is this that darkens counsel by words without knowledge? That word convinced me. I own I am the man that has been so foolish. That word reached my conscience, and set my sin in order before me. I have ignorantly overlooked the counsels and designs of God in afflicting me, and therefore have quarrelled with God, and insisted too much upon my own justification: Therefore I uttered that which I understood not," that is, "I have passed a judgment upon the dispensations of Providence, though I was utterly a stranger to the reasons of them." He owns himself ignorant of the divine counsels; and so we are all. We see what God does, but we neither know why he does it nor what he will bring it to. The reason why we quarrel with Providence is because we do not understand it. He owns himself presumptuous in undertaking to discourse of that which he did not understand and to arraign that which he could not judge of. He that answereth a matter before he heareth it, it is folly and shame to him.

III. He will not answer, but he will make supplication to his Judge, as he had said, ch. ix. 15. "Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak (v. 4), not speak either as plaintiff or defendant (ch. xiii. 22), but as a humble petitioner."

IV. He puts himself into the posture of a penitent. In true repentance there must be not only conviction of sin, but contrition and godly sorrow for it, sorrow according to God, 2 Cor. vii. 9.

1. "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear. I have known something of thy greatness, and power, and sovereign dominion. But now thou hast by immediate revelation discovered thyself to me in thy glorious majesty; now my eyes see thee; and therefore now I repent, and unsay what I have foolishly said." It is a great mercy to have a good education, and to know the things of God by the instructions of his word and ministers. When the understanding is enlightened by the Spirit of grace our knowledge of divine things as far exceeds what we had before as that by ocular demonstration exceeds that by report and common fame. By the teachings of men God reveals his Son to us; but by the teachings of his Spirit he reveals his Son in us (Gal. i. 16), and so changes us into the same image, 2 Cor. iii. 18. God is pleased sometimes to manifest himself most fully to his people by the rebukes of his word and providence. Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest and teachest.

2. Job thought hardly of himself (v. 6): Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes. Even good people, that have no gross enormities to repent of, must be greatly afflicted in soul for the workings and breakings out of pride, passion, peevishness, and discontent, and all their hasty unadvised speeches. The more we see of the glory and majesty of God, and the more we see of the vileness and odiousness of sin and of ourselves because of sin, the more we shall abase and abhor ourselves for it. Let us leave it to God to govern the world, and make it our care, in the strength of his grace, to govern ourselves and our own hearts well.

While God was catechising Job out of the whirlwind one would have thought that he only was in the wrong, and that the cause would certainly go against him; but here we find the sentence given in Job's favour. Wherefore judge nothing before the time. Those who are truly righteous before God may have their righteousness clouded and eclipsed by great and uncommon affections, by the severe censures of men, by the sharp reproofs of conscience, and yet, in due time, these clouds shall all blow over, and God will bring forth their righteousness as the light and their judgment as the noon-day, Ps. xxxvii. 6.

I. Judgment given against Job's three friends, upon the controversy between them and Job. Elihu is not censured here, for he acted, not as a party, but as a moderator. Job is magnified and his three friends are mortified. Something of truth we thought they both had on their side, but it is well that the judgment is the Lord's and by it we will abide.

1. Job is greatly magnified and comes off with honour. When God appeared for him he had brought him to repentance for what he had said amiss, then he owned him in what he had said well. True penitents shall find favour with God, and what they have said and done amiss shall no more be mentioned against them. God calls him again and again his servant Job, four times in two verses, and he seems to take a pleasure in calling him so, as before his troubles (ch. i. 8), "Hast thou considered my servant Job? Though he is poor and despised, he is my servant notwithstanding, and as dear to me as when he was in prosperity. Though he has his faults, and has appeared to be a man subject to like passions as others, though he has contended with me, has gone about to disannul my judgment, and has darkened counsel by words without knowledge, yet he sees his error and retracts it, and therefore he is my servant Job still." If God says, Well done, good and faithful servant, it is of little consequence who says otherwise. He owns that he had spoken of him the thing that was right, beyond what his antagonists had done. Job had given a much better and truer account of the divine Providence than they had done. They had wronged God by making prosperity a mark of the true church and affliction a certain indication of God's wrath. Job had referred things to the future judgment, and the future state, more than his friends had done, and therefore he spoke of God that which was right, better than his friends had done. Though he had spoken some things amiss, even concerning God, yet he is commended for what he spoke that was right. Job was in the right, and his friends were in the wrong, and yet he was in pain and they were at ease—a plain evidence that we cannot judge of men by looking in their faces or purses. He only can do it infallibly who sees men's hearts. Notwithstanding all the wrong his friends had done him, he is so good a man, and of such a humble, tender, forgiving spirit, that he will very readily pray for them. My servant Job will pray for you. True penitents shall not only find favour as petitioners for themselves, but be accepted as intercessors for others also. And, as Job prayed and offered sacrifice for those that had grieved and wounded his spirit, so Christ prayed and died for his persecutors, and ever lives making intercession for the transgressors.

2. Job's friends are greatly mortified, and come off with disgrace. They were good men and belonged to God, and therefore he would not let them lie still in their mistake any more than Job, but, having humbled them by a discourse out of the whirlwind, he takes another course to humble them. In most disputes and controversies there is something amiss on both sides, either in the merits of the cause or in the management, if not in both; and it is fit that both sides should be told of it, and made to see their errors. God tells them plainly that they had not spoken of him the thing that was right, like Job, that is, they had censured and condemned Job upon a false hypothesis, had represented God fighting against Job as an enemy when really he was only trying him as a friend. Those do not say well of God who represent his fatherly chastisements of his own children as judicial punishments. It is a dangerous thing to judge uncharitably of the spiritual and eternal state of others, for in so doing we may perhaps condemn those whom God has accepted. My wrath is kindled against thee and thy two friends. He requires from them a sacrifice, to make atonement for what they had said amiss. They must bring each of them seven bullocks, and each of them seven rams, to be offered up to God for a burnt-offering. He orders them to go to Job, and beg of him to offer their sacrifices, and pray for them, otherwise they should not be accepted. They thought that they only were the favourites of Heaven, and that Job had no interest there; but God gives them to understand that he had a better interest there than they had. Job and his friends had differed in their opinion about many things, but now they were to be made friends. They must agree in a sacrifice and a prayer, and that must reconcile them. Those who differ in judgment about minor things are yet one in Christ the great sacrifice, and meet at the same throne of grace, and therefore ought to love and bear with one another. Our quarrels with God always begin on our part, but the reconciliation begins on his.

II. The acquiescence of Job's friends in this judgment given, v. 9. They were good men, and, as soon as they understood what the mind of the Lord was, they did as he commanded them. Peace with God is to be had only in his own way and upon his own terms, and they will never seem hard to those who know how to value the privilege. Job's friends had all joined in accusing Job, and now they join in begging his pardon. Those that have sinned together should repent together.

You have heard of the patience of Job (says the apostle, James v. 11) and have seen the end of the Lord, that is, what end the Lord, at length, put to his troubles. In the beginning of this book we had Job's patience under his troubles, for an example; here, in the close, for our encouragement to follow that example, we have the happy issue of his troubles and the prosperous condition to which he was restored.

Perhaps, too, the extraordinary prosperity which Job was crowned with after his afflictions was intended to be to us Christians a type and figure of the glory and happiness of heaven, which the afflictions of this present time are working for us. He that rightly endures temptation, when he is tried, shall receive a crown of life (James i. 12).

I. God returned in ways of mercy to him. This put a new face upon his affairs immediately, and everything now looked as pleasing and promising as before it had looked gloomy and frightful. God turned his captivity, that is, he redressed his grievances and took away all the causes of his complaints; he loosed him from the bond with which Satan had now, for a great while, bound him. What was more, he felt a very great alteration in his mind; the tumult was all over, and the consolations of God were now as much the delight of his soul as his terrors had been its burden. The tide thus turned, his troubles began to ebb as fast as they had flowed, just then when he was praying for his friends. We are really doing our business when we are praying for our friends, if we pray in a right manner, for in those prayers there is not only faith, but love. Christ has taught us to pray with and for others in teaching us to say, Our Father; and, in seeking mercy for others, we may find mercy ourselves. God doubled his possessions: Also the Lord gave Job twice as much as he had before. He suffered for the glory of God, and therefore God made it up to him with advantage, and allowed him more than interest upon interest. God will take care that none shall lose by him. Job's friends had often said, If thou wert pure and upright, surely now he would awake for thee, ch. viii. 6. But he does not awake for thee; therefore thou art not upright. "Well," says God, "though your argument be not conclusive, I will even by that demonstrate the integrity of my servant Job; his latter end shall greatly increase."

II. His old acquaintance, neighbours, and relations, were very kind to him, v. 11. They wept for his griefs, and rejoiced in his joys, and proved not such miserable comforters as his three friends, that, at first, were so forward and officious to attend him. These were not such great men nor such learned and eloquent men as those, but they proved much more skilful and kind in comforting Job. They made a collection among them for the repair of his losses and the setting of him up again. Every one gave him a piece of money and everyone an ear-ring of gold, which would be as good as money to him. When God was friendly to him they were all willing to be friendly too, Ps. cxix. 74, 79. Others of them, it may be, withdrew because he was poor, and sore, and a rueful spectacle, but now that he began to recover they were willing to renew their acquaintance with him. Swallow-friends, that are gone in winter, will return in the spring, though their friendship is of little value. Job prayed for his friends, and then they flocked about him, overcome by his kindness, and everyone desiring an interest in his prayers.

III. His estate strangely increased, by the blessing of God upon the little that his friends gave him. He thankfully received their courtesy, and did not think it below him to have his estate repaired by contributions. God gave him that which was far better than their money and ear-rings, and that was his blessing, v. 12. The Lord comforted him now according to the days wherein he had afflicted him, and blessed his latter end more than his beginning. The last days of a good man sometimes prove his best days, his last works his best works, his last comforts his best comforts; for his path, like that of the morning light, shines more and more to the perfect day. We know not what good times we may yet be reserved for in our latter end.

IV. His family was built up again, and he had great comfort in his children, v. 13-15. The number of his children was the same as before, seven sons and three daughters. Some give this reason why they were not doubled as his cattle were, because his children that were dead were not lost, but gone before to a better world; and therefore he has two fleeces of children (as I may say) mahanaim—two hosts, one in heaven, the other on earth. The names of his daughters are here registered (v. 14), because, in the significations of them, they seemed designed to perpetuate the remembrance of God's great goodness to him in the surprising change of his condition. He called the first Jemima—The day, because of the shining forth of his prosperity after a dark night of affliction. The next Kezia, a spice of a very fragrant smell. The third Keren-happuch (that is, Plenty restored, or A horn of paint), because (says he) God had wiped away the tears which fouled his face, ch. xvi. 16. Concerning these daughters, God adorned them with great beauty, no women so fair as the daughters of Job, v. 15. He made them co-heirs with their brethren.

V. His life was long. He lived to have much of the comfort of this life, for he saw his posterity to the fourth generation, v. 16. Though his children were not doubled to him, yet in his children's children (and those are the crown of old men) they were more than doubled. God has ways to repair the losses and balance the griefs of those who are written childless, as Job was when he had buried all his children. He died full of days, satisfied with living in this world, and willing to leave it; not peevishly so, as in the days of his affliction, but piously so, and thus, as Eliphaz had encouraged him to hope, he came to his grave like a shock of corn in his season.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE BOOK OF PSALMS

The History of Israel led us to camps and council-boards, and there instructed us in the knowledge of God. The book of Job brought us into the schools, and treated us with disputations concerning God and his providence. But this book brings us into the sanctuary, draws us off from converse with the politicians, philosophers, or disputers of this world, and directs us into communion with God, lifting up and letting out our hearts towards him. Thus may we be in the mount with God.

I. The title of this book. It is called, 1. The Psalms; under that title is it referred to, Luke xxiv. 44. The Hebrew calls it Tehillim, which properly signifies Psalms of praise, because many of them are such; but Psalms is a more general word, meaning all metrical compositions fitted to be sung, which may as well be historical, doctrinal, or supplicatory, as laudatory. Though singing be properly the voice of joy, yet the intention of songs is to assist the memory, and to express and excite all the other affections as well as this of joy. The priests had a mournful muse as well as joyful ones; and the divine institution of singing psalms is thus largely intended; for we are directed not only to praise God, but to teach and admonish ourselves and one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, Col. iii. 16. 2. It is called the Book of Psalms: so it is quoted by St. Peter, Acts i. 20. It is a collection of psalms, of all the psalms that were divinely inspired.

II. The author of this book. It is, no doubt, derived originally from the blessed Spirit. They are spiritual songs, words which the Holy Ghost taught. The penman of most of them was David the son of Jesse, who is therefore called the sweet psalmist of Israel, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1. Some that have not his name in their titles yet are expressly ascribed to him elsewhere, as Ps. ii. (Acts iv. 25) and Ps. xcvi. and cv. (1 Chron. xvi.). One psalm is expressly said to be the prayer of Moses (Ps. xc.); and that some of the psalms were penned by Asaph is intimated, 2 Chron. xxix. 30, where they are said to praise the Lord in the words of David and Asaph, who is there called a seer or prophet. Some of the psalms seem to have been penned long after, as Ps. cxxxvii, at the time of the captivity in Babylon; but the far greater part of them were certainly penned by David himself.

III. The scope of it. It is manifestly intended, 1. To assist the exercises of natural religion, and to kindle in the souls of men those devout affections which we owe to God as our Creator, owner, ruler, and benefactor. The book of Job helps to prove our first principles of the divine perfections and providence; but this helps to improve them in prayers and praises, and professions of dependence on him. Other parts of scripture show that God is infinitely above man, and his sovereign Lord; but this shows us that there are ways in which we may keep up communion with him in all the various conditions of human life. 2. To advance the excellencies of revealed religion, and in the most pleasing powerful manner to recommend it to the world. There is indeed little or nothing of the ceremonial law in the book of Psalms. Though sacrifice and offering were yet to continue many ages, yet they are here represented as things which God did not desire (Ps. xl. 6, li. 16), as things comparatively little, and which in time were to vanish away. But the word and law of God, those parts of it which are moral and of perpetual obligation, are here magnified and made honourable. And Christ, the crown and centre of revealed religion, the foundation, corner, and top-stone, of that blessed building, is here clearly spoken of in type and prophecy, his sufferings and the glory that should follow, and the kingdom that he should set up in the world.

IV. The use of it. All scripture is profitable to convey divine light into our understandings; but this book is of singular use to convey divine life and power, and a holy warmth, into our affections. 1. It is of use to be sung. What the rules of the Hebrew metre were even the learned are not certain. But these psalms ought to be rendered according to the metre of every language, at least so that they may be sung for the edification of the church. So rich, so well made, are these divine poems, that they can never be exhausted, can never be worn thread-bare. 2. It is of use to be read by the ministers of Christ, as containing excellent truths, and rules concerning good and evil. 3. It is of use to be read and meditated upon by all good people. The Psalmist's experiences are of great use for our direction, caution, and encouragement. In telling us, as he often does, what passed between God and his soul, he lets us know what we may expect from God, and what he will expect, and require, and graciously accept from us. Even the Psalmist's expressions too are of great use; and by them the Spirit helps our praying infirmities. If we make David's psalms familiar to us, whatever errand we have at the throne of grace, we may there find apt words wherewith to clothe it, sound speech which cannot be condemned. We may take sometimes one choice psalm and sometimes another, and pray it over, that is, enlarge upon each verse in our own thoughts, and offer up our meditations to God as they arise from the expressions we find there. Nor is it only our devotion that the book of Psalms assists, teaching us how to offer praise so as to glorify God, but it is also a directory to the actions of our lives and teaches us how to order our conversation aright, so as that, in the end, we may see the salvation of God, Ps. l. 23. The Psalms were thus serviceable to the Old Testament church, but to us Christians they may be of more use than they could be to those who lived before the coming of Christ; for, as Moses's sacrifices, so David's songs, are expounded and made more intelligible by the gospel of Christ, which lets us within the veil; so that if to David's prayers and praises we add St. Paul's prayers in his epistles, and the new songs in the Revelation, we shall be thoroughly furnished for this good work.

The seven penitential Psalms have been in a particular manner singled out by the devotions of many. They are reckoned to be Ps. vi., xxxii., xxxviii., li., cii., cxxx., and cxliii. The Psalms were divided into five books, each concluding with Amen, Amen, or Hallelujah; the first ending with Ps. xli., the second with Ps. lxxii., the third with Ps. lxxxix., the fourth with Ps. cvi., the fifth with Ps. cl. Let good Christians divide them for themselves, so as may best increase their acquaintance with them, that they may have them at hand upon all occasions and may sing them in the spirit and with the understanding.

PSALM I

This is a psalm of instruction concerning good and evil, setting before us life and death, the blessing and the curse, that we may take the right way which leads to happiness and avoid that which will certainly end in our misery and ruin This psalm shows us, I. The holiness and happiness of a godly man, ver 1-3. II. The sinfulness and misery of a wicked man, ver 4, 5 III. The ground and reason of both, ver. 6.

The psalmist begins with the character and condition of a godly man.

I. The Lord knows those that are his by name, but we must know them by their character. The character of a good man is here given by the rules he chooses to walk by.

1. A godly man (v. 1) walks not in the council of the ungodly, &c. This part of his character is put first, because departing from evil is that in which wisdom begins. (1) He sees evil-doers round about him; the world is full of them. They are here described by three characters, ungoldly, sinners, and scornful. They are ungodly first, casting off the fear of God. When the services of religion are laid aside, they come to be sinners, that is, they break out into open rebellion against God. Omissions make way for commissions, and by these the heart is so hardened that at length they come to be scorners, that is, they openly defy all that is sacred, scoff at religion, and make a jest of sin. The word which we translate ungodly signifies such as are unsettled, aim at no certain end and walk by no certain rule, but are at the command of every lust and at the beck of every temptation. These the good man sees with a sad heart. He does not do as they do. He does not walk in the counsel of the ungodly. He does not take his measures from their principles, nor act according to the advice which they give and take. He stands not in the way of sinners; he avoids doing as they do; their way shall not be his way. He sits not in the seat of the scornful. He does not associate with those that sit in close cabal to find out ways and means for the support and advancement of the devil's kingdom.

2. A godly man, that he may do that which is good and cleave to it, submits to the guidance of the word of God and makes that familiar to him, v. 2. All who are well pleased that there is a God must be well pleased that there is a Bible, a revelation of God, of his will, and of the only way to happiness in him. In that law doth he meditate day and night. To meditate in God's word is to discourse with ourselves concerning the great things contained in it, with a close application of mind, a fixedness of thought, till we be suitably affected with those things and experience the savour and power of them in our hearts.

II. An assurance given of the godly man's happiness. God blesses him, and that blessing will make him happy. Goodness and holiness are not only the way to happiness (Rev. xxii. 14) but happiness itself; supposing there were not another life after this, yet that man is a happy man that keeps in the way of his duty. He shall be like a tree, fruitful and flourishing. The divine blessing produces real effects. A good man is planted by the grace of God. These trees were by nature wild olives, and will continue so till they are grafted anew, and so planted by a power from above. Never any good tree grew of itself; it is the planting of the Lord, and therefore he must in it be glorified. Isa. lxi. 3. He is placed by the means of grace, here called the rivers of water; from these a good man receives supplies of strength and vigour, but in secret undiscerned ways. It is expected from those who enjoy the mercies of grace that, both in the temper of their minds and in the tenor of their lives, they comply with the intentions of that grace, and bring forth fruit. His leaf also shall not wither. As to those who bring forth only the leaves of profession, without any good fruit, even their leaf will wither; but, if the word of God rule in the heart, that will keep the profession green; the laurels thus won shall never wither.

I. The description of the ungodly given, v. 5. 1. In general, they are the reverse of the righteous, both in character and condition: they bring forth no fruit but grapes of Sodom; they cumber the ground. In particular, whereas the righteous are like valuable, useful, fruitful trees, they are like the chaff which the wind drives away, the very lightest of the chaff, the dust which the owner of the floor desires to have driven away, as not capable of being put to any use.

II. The doom of the ungodly read, v. 5. They shall not stand in the judgment, that is, they shall be found guilty. They shall not stand in the congregation of the righteous. The wicked shall not have a place in that congregation. Into the new Jerusalem none unclean nor unsanctified shall enter. Hypocrites in this world, under the disguise of a plausible profession, may thrust themselves into the congregation of the righteous and remain undisturbed and undiscovered there; but Christ cannot be imposed upon, though his ministers may.

III. The reason rendered of this different state of the godly and wicked, v. 6. The Lord approves and is well pleased with the way of the righteous, and therefore, under the influence of his gracious smiles, it shall prosper and end well; but he is angry at the way of the wicked, all they do is offensive to him, and therefore it shall perish, and they in it.

In singing these verses, and praying over them, let us possess ourselves with a holy dread of the wicked man's portion, and with a holy care to approve ourselves to God in everything, entreating his favour with our whole hearts.

PSALM II

As the foregoing psalm was moral, and showed us our duty, so this is evangelical, and shows us our Saviour. Under the type of David's kingdom (which was of divine appointment, met with much opposition, but prevailed at last) the kingdom of the Messiah, the Son of David, is prophesied. It is interpreted of Christ, Acts iv. 27; xiii. 33; Heb. i 5. The Holy Ghost here foretells, I. The opposition that should be given to the kingdom of the Messiah, ver. 1-3. II. The baffling and chastising of that opposition, ver. 4, 5. III. The setting up of the kingdom of Christ, notwithstanding that opposition, ver. 6. IV. The confirmation and establishment of it, ver. 7. V. A promise of the enlargement and success of it, ver. 8, 9. VI. A call and exhortation to kings and princes to yield themselves the willing subjects of this kingdom, ver. 10-12. Or thus: We have here, I. Threatenings denounced against the adversaries of Christ's kingdom, ver 1-6. II. Promises made to Christ himself, the head of this kingdom, ver. 7-9. III. Counsel given to all to espouse the interests of this kingdom, ver. 10-12.

We have here a very great struggle about the kingdom of Christ, hell and heaven contesting it; the seat of the war is this earth.

I. The mighty opposition that would be given to the Messiah and his kingdom, v. 1-3. One would have expected that so great a blessing to this world would be universally welcomed and embraced. Never were the notions of any sect of philosophers, nor the powers of any prince, opposed with so much violence as the doctrine and government of Christ. Princes and people, court and country, have sometimes separate interests, but here they are united against Christ. Though his kingdom is not of this world, nor in the least calculated to weaken their interests, yet the kings of the earth and rulers are up in arms immediately. As the Philistines and their lords, Saul and his courtiers, the disaffected party and their ringleaders, opposed David's coming to the crown, so Herod and Pilate, the Gentiles and the Jews, did their utmost against Christ and his interest in men, Acts iv. 27.

They quarrel against the Lord and against his anointed, that is, against all religion in general and the Christian religion in particular. The great author of our holy religion is here called the Lord's anointed, or Messiah, or Christ, in allusion to the anointing of David to be king. It is a most spiteful and malicious opposition. They rage and fret; they gnash their teeth for vexation at the setting up of Christ's kingdom. It is a deliberate and politic opposition. They imagine, that is, they contrive means to suppress the rising interests of Christ's kingdom. It is a resolute and obstinate opposition. They set themselves in defiance of reason. It is a combined and confederate opposition. They take counsel together, to assist and animate one another. They will be content to entertain such notions of the kingdom of God and the Messiah as will serve to support their own dominion. If the Lord and his anointed will make them rich and great in the world, they will bid them welcome; but if they will restrain their corrupt appetites and passions, they will not have this man to reign over them, Luke xix. 14. Christ has bands and cords for us; but they are cords of a man, agreeable to right reason, and bands of love, conductive to our true interest. Why do men oppose religion but because they are impatient of its restraints and obligations? They would break asunder the bands of conscience they are under and the cords of God's commandments. They are here reasoned with concerning it, v. 1. Why do they do this? They can show no good cause for opposing so just, holy, and gracious a government. They can hope for no good success in opposing so powerful a kingdom. It is a vain thing; when they have done their worst Christ will have a church in the world glorious and triumphant. It is built upon a rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

II. The mighty conquest gained over all this threatening opposition. The perfect repose of the Eternal Mind may be our comfort under all the disquietments of our mind. We are tossed on earth, and in the sea, but he sits in the heavens, where he has prepared his throne for judgment.

1. The attempts of Christ's enemies are easily ridiculed. God laughs at them as a company of fools.

2. They are justly punished, v. 5. Though God despises them as impotent, yet he is justly displeased with them. The enemies rage, but cannot vex God. His setting up this kingdom of his Son, in spite of them, is the greatest vexation to them that can be.

3. They are certainly defeated, and all their counsels turned headlong (v. 6): Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion. Jesus Christ is a King, and God is pleased to call him his King, because he is appointed by him, and entrusted by him with the sole administration of government and judgment. He is his King, for he is dear to the Father, and one in whom he is well pleased. Christ took not this honour to himself, but was called to it. Being called to this honour, he was confirmed in it: "I have set him, I have settled him."

We are to sing these verses with a holy exultation, triumphing in Jesus Christ as the great trustee of power; and we are to pray, in firm belief of the assurance here given, "Father in heaven, Thy kingdom come; let thy Son's kingdom come."

Let us now hear what the Messiah himself has to say for his kingdom.

I. The kingdom of the Messiah is founded upon a decree, an eternal decree, of God the Father. It was not a sudden resolve, it was not the trial of an experiment, but the result of the counsels of the divine wisdom.

II. There is a declaration of that decree, as far as is necessary for the satisfaction of all those who are called and commanded to yield themselves subjects to this king, and to leave those inexcusable who will not have him to reign over them. Christ here makes a twofold title to his kingdom:—1. A title by inheritance (v. 7): Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. This scripture the apostle quotes (Heb. i. 5) to prove that Christ has a more excellent name than the angels, but that he obtained it by inheritance, v. 4. He is the Son of God, and therefore of the same nature with the Father, has in him all the fulness of the godhead, infinite wisdom, power, and holiness. Upon this account we are to receive him as a King; for because the Father loveth the Son he hath given all things into his hand, John iii. 35 v. 20. Being a Son, he is heir of all things, and, the Father having made the worlds by him, it is easy to infer thence that by him also he governs them; for he is the eternal Wisdom and the eternal Word. Immediately after his resurrection he entered upon the administration of his mediatorial kingdom; it was then that he said, All power is given unto me. 2. A title by agreement, v. 8, 9. The agreement is, in short, this: the Son must undertake the office of an intercessor, and, upon that condition, he shall have the honour and power of a universal monarch. The Father will grant more than the half of the kingdom, even the kingdom itself. It is here promised him, he shall have the heathen for his inheritance, not the Jews only, but the Gentiles also. A great part of the Gentile world received the gospel when it was first preached, and it is to be yet further accomplished when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ, Rev. xi. 15. It shall be victorious: Thou shalt break them (those of them that oppose thy kingdom) with a rod of iron, v. 9. This was in part fulfilled when the nation of the Jews, those that persisted in unbelief and enmity to Christ's gospel, were destroyed by the Roman power. It had a further accomplishment in the destruction of the pagan powers, when the Christian religion came to be established; but it will not be completely fulfilled till all opposing rule, principality, and power, shall be finally put down, 1 Cor. xv. 24. See cx. 5, 6.

In singing this, and praying it over, we must give glory to Christ as the eternal Son of God and our rightful Lord, and must take comfort from this promise, and plead it with God, that the kingdom of Christ shall be enlarged and established and shall triumph over all opposition.

The practical application of this gospel doctrine concerning the kingdom of the Messiah, by way of exhortation to the kings and judges of the earth. They hear that it is in vain to oppose Christ's government; let them therefore be so wise for themselves as to submit to it. He that has power to destroy them shows that he has no pleasure in their destruction, for he puts them into a way to make themselves happy, v. 10. What is said to them is said to all. We are exhorted,

I. To reverence God and to stand in awe of him, v. 11. This is the great duty of natural religion. We must serve God in all ordinances of worship, with a holy fear. We must rejoice in God, but still with a holy trembling. Our salvation must be wrought out with fear and trembling, Phil. ii. 12.

II. To welcome Jesus Christ and to submit to him, v. 12. This is the great duty of the Christian religion.

1. The command given to this purport: Kiss the Son. Christ is called the Son because so he was declared (v. 7), Thou art my Son. He is the Son of God by eternal generation, and, upon that account, he is to be adored by us. Our duty to Christ is here expressed figuratively: Kiss the Son, not with a betraying kiss, as Judas kissed him, but with a believing kiss.

With a kiss of affection and sincere love: "Kiss the Son; enter into a covenant of friendship with him, and let him be very dear and precious to you; love him above all, love him in sincerity, love him much, as she did to whom much was forgiven, and, in token of it, kissed his feet," Luke vii. 38. With a kiss of allegiance and loyalty, submit to his government, take his yoke upon you.

2. The reasons to enforce this command;

(1) The certain ruin we run upon if we refuse and reject Christ: "Kiss the Son; for it is at your peril if you do not." Do it, lest he be angry.

(2) The happiness we are sure of if we yield ourselves to Christ. Blessed will those be in the day of wrath, who, by trusting in Christ, have made him their refuge and patron; when the hearts of others fail them for fear they shall lift up their heads with joy.

In singing this, and praying it over, we should have our hearts filled with a holy awe of God, but at the same time borne up with a cheerful confidence in Christ, in whose mediation we may comfort and encourage ourselves and one another.

PSALM III

As the foregoing psalm, in the type of David in preferment, showed us the royal dignity of the Redeemer, so this, by the example of David in distress, shows us the peace and holy security of the redeemed under the divine protection. David, being now driven out from his palace, from the royal city, from the holy city, by his rebellious son Absalom, I. Complains to God of his enemies, ver. 1, 2. II. Confides in God, and encourages himself in him as his God, notwithstanding, ver. 3. III. Recollects the satisfaction he had in the gracious answers God gave to his prayers, and his experience of his goodness to him, ver. 4, 5. IV. Triumphs over his fears (ver. 6) and over his enemies, ver. 7. V. Gives God the glory and takes to himself the comfort of the divine blessing and salvation which are sure to all the people of God, ver. 8.

A psalm of David, when he fled from Absalom his son.

The title of this psalm and many others is as a key hung ready at the door, to open it. When we know upon what occasion a psalm was penned we know the better how to expound it. 1. David was in great grief; when, in his flight, he went up the Mount of Olives, he wept greatly, with his head covered, and marching bare-foot; yet then he composed this comfortable psalm. He wept and prayed, wept and sung, wept and believed. Is any afflicted with undutiful disobedient children? David was; and yet that did not hinder his joy in God, nor put him out of tune for holy songs. 2. He was in great danger; the plot against him was laid deep, the party that sought his ruin was very formidable, and his own son at the head of them, so that his affairs seemed to be at the last extremity; yet then he kept hold of his interest in God and improved that. Perils and frights should drive us to God, not drive us from him. 3. He had now a great deal of provocation given him by those from whom he had reason to expect better things, from his son, whom he had been indulgent of, from his subjects, whom he had been so great a blessing to. 4. He was suffering for his sin in the matter of Uriah; this was the evil which, for that sin, God threatened to raise up against him out of his own house (2 Sam. xii. 11). Yet he did not therefore cast away his confidence in the divine power and goodness, nor despair of succour. Even our sorrow for sin must not hinder either our joy in God or our hope in God. 5. He seemed cowardly in fleeing from Absalom, and quitting his royal city, before he had had one struggle for it; and yet, by this psalm, it appears he was full of true courage arising from his faith in God.

In these three verses he applies to God. Whither else should we go but to him when anything grieves us or frightens us?

I. With a representation of his distress, v. 1, 2. He looks round, and as it were takes a view of his enemies' camp. David had had the hearts of his subjects as much as ever any king had, and yet now, of a sudden, he had lost them. They rose up against him; they aimed to trouble him; but that was not all: they said of his soul, There is no help for him in God. They put a spiteful and invidious construction upon his troubles, as Job's friends did upon his, concluding that, because his servants and subjects forsook him thus and did not help him, God had deserted him and abandoned his cause, and he was therefore to be looked on, or rather to be looked off, as a hypocrite and a wicked man. They endeavoured to shake his confidence in God and drive him to despair of relief from him: "They have said it to my soul"; so it may be read; compare xi. 1; xlii. 10. David comes to God, and tells him what his enemies said of him. "They say, There is no help for me in thee; but, Lord, if it be so, I am undone. They say to my soul, There is no salvation" (for so the word is) "for him in God; but, Lord, do thou say unto my soul, I am thy salvation (xxxv. 3) and that shall satisfy me, and in due time silence them." To this complaint he adds Selah. Some refer it to the music with which, in David's time, the psalms were sung; others to the sense, and that it is a note commanding a solemn pause. Selah—Mark that, or, "Stop there, and consider a little." As here, they say, There is no help for him in God, Selah.

II. With a profession of his dependence upon God, v. 3. David here, when his enemies said, There is no help for him in God, cries out with so much the more assurance, "But thou, O Lord! art a shield for me. Thou art a shield for me, a shield about me" (so some), "to secure me on all sides, since my enemies surrounded me." Thou art my glory Thou art the lifter up of my head. If, in the worst of times, God's people can lift up their heads with joy, knowing that all shall work for good to them, they will own it is God that is the lifter up of their head, that gives them both cause to rejoice and hearts to rejoice.

Verse 4–8

David, having stirred up himself by the irritations of his enemies to take hold on God as his God, and so gained comfort in looking upward when, if he looked round about him, nothing appeared but what was discouraging, here looks back with pleasing reflections and looks forward with pleasing expectations of a happy issue to which the dark dispensation he was now under would shortly be brought.

1. David had been exercised with many difficulties, often oppressed and brought very low; but still he had found God all-sufficient.

1. His troubles had always brought him to his knees, and, in all his difficulties and dangers, he had been enabled to acknowledge God and to lift up his heart to him, and his voice too: I cried unto God with my voice.

2. He had always found God ready to answer his prayers: He heard me out of his holy hill, from heaven, the high and holy place, from the ark on Mount Sion, whence he used to give answers to those that sought to him. Christ was set King upon the holy hill of Zion (ii. 6), and it is through him, whom the Father hears always, that our prayers are heard.

3. He had always been very safe and very easy under the divine protection (v. 5): "I laid myself down and slept, composed and quiet; and awaked refreshed, for the Lord sustained me." (1) This is applicable to the common mercies of every night, which we ought to give thanks for alone, and with our families, every morning. (2) It seems here to be meant of the wonderful quietness and calmness of David's spirit, in the midst of his dangers. Having by prayer committed himself and his cause to God, and being sure of his protection, his heart was fixed, and he was easy.

4. God had often broken the power and restrained the malice of his enemies, had smitten them upon the cheek-bone (v. 7), had silenced them and spoiled their speaking.

II. See with what confidence he looks forward to the dangers he had yet in prospect. 1. His fears were all stilled and silenced, v. 6. "I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people, that either in a foreign invasion or an intestine rebellion set themselves, or encamp, against me round about." When David, in his flight from Absalom, bade Zadok carry back the ark, he spoke doubtfully of the issue of his present troubles, and concluded, like a humble penitent, Here I am; let him do to me what seemeth to him good, 2 Sam. xv. 26. But now, like a strong believer, he speaks confidently, and has no fear concerning the event. 2. His prayers were quickened and encouraged, v. 7. He believed God was his Saviour, and yet prays: nay, he therefore prays, Arise, O Lord! save me, O my God! 3. His faith became triumphant. He began the psalm with complaints of the strength and malice of his enemies, but concludes it with exultation in the power and grace of his God, and now sees more with him than against him, v. 8. Two great truths he here builds his confidence upon. (1) That salvation belongeth unto the Lord; he has power to save, be the danger ever so great. (2) That his blessing is upon his people; he not only has power to save them, but he has assured them of his gracious intentions. He has, in his word, pronounced a blessing upon his people; and we are bound to believe that that blessing does accordingly rest upon them, though there be not the visible effects of it.

PSALM IV

David was a preacher and many of his psalms are doctrinal and practical as well as devotional. The greatest part of this psalm is so. Here, I. David begins with a short prayer (ver. 1) and that prayer preaches. II. He directs his speech to the children of men, and, 1. In God's name reproves them for the dishonour they do to God and the damage they do their own souls, ver. 2. 2. He sets before them the happiness of godly people, for their encouragement to be religious, ver. 3. 3. He calls upon them to consider their ways, ver. 4. III. He exhorts them to serve God and trust in him, ver. 5. IV. He gives an account of his own experiences of the grace of God working in him.

To the chief musician on Neginoth. A psalm of David.

The title of the psalm acquaints us that David, having penned it by divine inspiration for the use of the church, delivered it to the chief musician. We have a particular account of the constitution, the modelling of the several classes of singers, each with a chief, and the share each bore in the work, 1 Chron. xxv.

I. David addresses himself to God, v. 1. All the notice God is pleased to take of our prayers, and all the returns he is pleased to make to them, must be ascribed, not to our merit, but purely to his mercy. "Hear me for thy mercy-sake" is our best plea. Two things David here pleads further:—1. "Thou art the God of my righteousness; not only a righteous God thyself, but the author of my righteous dispositions, who hast by thy grace wrought that good that is in me, hast made me a righteous man; therefore hear me." 2. "Thou hast formerly enlarged me when I was in distress, enlarged my heart in holy joy and comfort under my distresses, enlarged my condition by bringing me out of my distresses; therefore now, Lord, have mercy upon me, and hear me." "Thou hast; wilt thou not? For thou art God, and changest not; thy work is perfect."

II. He addresses himself to the children of men, for the conviction and conversion of those that are yet strangers to God, and that will not have the Messiah, the Son of David, to reign over them.

1. He endeavours to convince them of the folly of their impiety (v. 2). "You debase yourselves, for you are sons of men" (the word signifies man as a noble creature); "consider the dignity of your nature, and do not act thus irrationally and unbecoming yourselves." "You dishonour your Maker, and turn his glory into shame." Those that profane God's holy name, that ridicule his word and ordinances, and, while they profess to know him, in works deny him, do what in them lies to turn his glory into shame. "You set your hearts upon that which will prove, at last, but vanity and a lie." Those that love the world, and seek the things that are beneath, love vanity, and seek lies.

2. He shows them the peculiar favour which God has for good people, the special protection they are under, and the singular privileges to which they are entitled, v. 3. It is at their peril if they offend one of these little ones, whom God has set apart for himself, Matt. xviii. 6. God reckons that those who touch them touch the apple of his eye; and he will make their persecutors to know it, sooner or later. They shall be mine, saith the Lord, in that day when I make up my jewels. Know this; let godly people know it, and let wicked people know it, and take heed how they hurt those whom God protects.

3. He warns them against sin, and exhorts them both to frighten and to reason themselves out of it (v. 4): "Stand in awe and sin not" (be angry and sin not, so the LXX). One good means of preventing sin, and preserving a holy awe, is to be frequent and serious in communing with our own hearts: "Talk with your hearts; you have a great deal to say to them; they may be spoken with at any time; let it not be unsaid." A thinking man is in a fair way to be a wise and a good man. "Choose a solitary time; do it when you lie awake upon your beds. Before you turn yourself to go to sleep at night" (as some of the heathen moralists have directed) "examine your consciences with respect to what you have done that day, particularly what you have done amiss, that you may repent of it. When you awake in the night meditate upon God, and the things that belong to your peace."

4. He counsels them to make conscience of their duty (v. 5): Offer to God the sacrifice of righteousness. We must not only cease to do evil, but learn to do well. "Offer sacrifices to him, your own selves first, and your best sacrifices." "Let all your devotions come from an upright heart; let all your alms be sacrifices of righteousness." Honour him, by trusting in him only, and not in your wealth nor in an arm of flesh; trust in his providence, and lean not to your own understanding; trust in his grace, and go not about to establish your own righteousness or sufficiency.

Verses 6–8

1. The foolish wish of worldly people: There be many that say, Who will show us any good? Who will make us to see good? What good they meant is intimated, v. 7. It was the increase of their corn and wine; all they desired was plenty of the wealth of this world, that they might enjoy abundance of the delights of sense. They enquire for good that may be seen, and they show no concern for the good things that are out of sight and are the objects of faith only. As we must be taught to worship an unseen God, so to seek an unseen good, 2 Cor. iv. 18. We look with an eye of faith further than we can see with an eye of sense. All they want is outward good, present good, partial good, good meat, good drink, a good trade, and a good estate; and what are all these worth without a good God and a good heart? Any good will serve the turn of most men, but a gracious soul will not be put off so.

II. The wise choice which godly people make. David, and the pious few that adhered to him, joined in this prayer, Lord lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us. He and his friends agree in their choice of God's favour as their felicity; it is this which in their account is better than life and all the comforts of life. Though David speaks of himself only in the 7th and 8th verses, he speaks, in this prayer, for others also,—"upon us," as Christ taught us to pray, "Our Father." All the saints come to the throne of grace on the same errand, and in this they are one, they all desire God's favour as their chief good. We should beg it for others as well as for ourselves, for in God's favour there is enough for us all and we shall have never the less for others sharing in what we have. This is what, above anything, they rejoice in (v. 7): "Thou hast hereby often put gladness into my heart." When God puts grace in the heart he puts gladness in the heart; inward, solid, substantial joy. "I will lay myself down (having the assurance of thy favour) in peace, for thou only makest me to dwell in safety." When he comes to sleep the sleep of death, he will then, with good old Simeon, depart in peace (Luke ii. 29), being assured that God will receive his soul. He commits all his affairs to God, and contentedly leaves the issue of them with him.

PSALM V

This psalm is a prayer, a solemn address to God, at a time when the psalmist was brought into distress by the malice of his enemies. I. David settles a correspondence between his soul and God, promising to pray, and promising himself that God would certainly hear him, ver. 1-3. II. He gives to God the glory, and takes to himself the comfort, of God's holiness, ver. 4-6. III. He declares his resolution to keep close to the public worship of God, ver. 7. IV. He prayed, 1. For himself, that God would guide him, ver. 8. 2. Against his enemies, that God would destroy them, ver. 9, 10. 3. For all the people of God, that God would give them joy, and keep them safe, ver. 11, 12.

To the chief musician upon Nehiloth. A psalm of David.

In these verses David prays to God,

1. As a prayer-hearing God; such he has always been ever since men began to call upon the name of the Lord, and yet is still as ready to hear prayer as ever. David here styles him: O Lord (v. 1, 3), Jehovah, a self-existent, self-sufficient, Being, whom we are bound to adore, and, "my King and my God (v. 2), to whom I have sworn allegiance, and under whose protection I have put myself as my King." We believe that the God we pray to is a King and a God. The most powerful plea in prayer, is to look upon him as our King and our God.

1. What David here prays for, which may encourage our faith and hopes in all our addresses to God. Give ear to my words, O Lord! Men perhaps will not or cannot hear us; our enemies are so haughty that they will not, our friends at such a distance that they cannot; but God, though high, though in heaven, can, and will. Consider my meditation. David's prayers were not his words only, but his meditations. Meditation and prayer should go together, xix. 14.

2. Four things David here promises, and so must we:—(1) That he will pray, that he will make conscience of praying. The assurances God has given us of his readiness to hear prayer should confirm our resolution to live and die praying. (2) That he will pray in the morning. Morning prayer is our duty; we are the fittest for prayer when we are in the most fresh, and lively, and composed frame, got clear of the slumbers of the night, revived by them, and not yet filled with the business of the day. We have then most need of prayer. (3) That he will have his eye single: I will direct my prayer, as a marksman directs his arrow to the white; with such a fixedness and steadiness of mind should we address ourselves to God. Let our first petition be, Hallowed, glorified, be thy name, and then we may be sure of the same gracious answer to it that was given to Christ himself: I have glorified it, and I will glorify it yet again. (4) That he will patiently wait for an answer of peace: "I will look up, will look after my prayers, and hear what God the Lord will speak (lxxxv. 8; Hab. ii. 1), that, if he grant what I asked, I may be thankful—if he deny, I may be patient—if he defer, I may continue to pray and wait and may not faint."

II. As a sin-hating God, v. 4–6. David takes notice of this. As the God with whom we have to do is gracious and merciful, so he is pure and holy; though he is ready to hear prayer, yet, if we regard iniquity in our heart, he will not hear our prayers, lxvi. 18. God has no pleasure in wickedness, though covered with a cloak of religion. Let those therefore who delight in sin know that God has no delight in them. Those whom thou hatest thou shalt destroy; particularly two sorts of sinners, who are here marked for destruction: Those that are fools, that speak leasing or lying, and that are deceitful. Those that are cruel: Thou wilt abhor the bloody man; for inhumanity is no less contrary, no less hateful, to the God of mercy, whom mercy pleases.

In these verses David gives three characters—of himself, of his enemies, and of all the people of God, and subjoins a prayer to each of them.

I. He gives an account of himself and prays for himself, v. 7, 8.

1. He is steadfastly resolved to keep closely to God and to his worship. (1) To worship God, to pay his homage to him, and give unto God the glory due unto his name. (2) To worship him publicly: "I will come into thy house, the courts of thy house, to worship there with other faithful worshippers." David was much in secret worship, prayed often alone (v. 2, 3), and yet was very constant and devout in his attendance on the sanctuary. (3) To worship him reverently and with a due sense of the infinite distance there is between God and man. (4) To take his encouragement in worship, from God himself only. The mercy of God should ever be both the foundation of our hopes and the fountain of our joy in everything wherein we have to do with him.

2. He earnestly prays that God by his grace, would guide and preserve him always in the way of his duty (v. 8): Lead me in thy righteousness, because of my enemies—Heb. "Because of those who observe me, who watch for my halting and seek occasion against me."

II. He gives an account of his enemies, and prays against them, v. 9, 10. He had spoken (v. 6) of God's hating the bloody and deceitful man. "Now, Lord," says he, "that is the character of my enemies: they are deceitful; there is no trusting them, for there is no faithfulness in their mouth." "They have by their sins deserved destruction; there is enough to justify God in their utter rejection: Cast them out in the multitude of their transgressions, by which they have filled up the measure of their iniquity and have become ripe for ruin." He pleads, "They have rebelled against thee. Had they been only my enemies, I could safely have forgiven them; but they are rebels against God, his crown and dignity; they oppose his government, and will not repent, to give him glory, and therefore I plainly foresee their ruin." His prayer for their destruction comes not from a spirit of revenge, but from a spirit of prophecy, by which he foretold that all who rebel against God will certainly be destroyed by their own counsels.

III. He gives an account of the people of God, and prays for them, concluding with an assurance of their bliss. They are the righteous (v. 12); for they put their trust in God, are well assured of his power and all-sufficiency, venture their all upon his promise, and are confident of his protection. Let them rejoice; let them have cause to rejoice and hearts to rejoice; fill them with joy, with great joy and unspeakable. Let all that are entitled to God's promises have a share in our prayers; grace be with all that love Christ in sincerity. "They are safe under the protection of thy favour; with that thou wilt crown him." A shield, in war, guards only one side, but the favour of God is to the saints a defence on every side; like the hedge about Job, round about, so that, while they keep themselves under the divine protection, they are entirely safe and ought to be entirely satisfied.

PSALM VI

David was a weeping prophet as well as Jeremiah, and this psalm is one of his lamentations: it was penned at a time of great trouble, both outward and inward. Is any afflicted? Is any sick? Let him sing this psalm. He begins with doleful complaints, but ends with joyful praises. Three things the psalmist is here complaining of:—1. Sickness of body. 2. Trouble of mind. 3. The insults of his enemies upon occasion of both. Now here, I. He pours out his complaints before God, deprecates his wrath, and begs earnestly for the return of his favour, ver. 1–7. II. He assures himself of an answer of peace, shortly, to his full satisfaction, ver. 8–10. This psalm is like the book of Job.

To the chief musician on Neginoth upon Sheminith. A psalm of David.

These verses speak the language of a heart truly humbled under humbling providences, of a broken and contrite spirit under great afflictions.

I. The representation he makes to God of his grievances. He pours out his complaint before him. Whither else should a child go with his complaints, but to his father? He complains of bodily pain and sickness (v. 2): My bones are vexed. His bones and his flesh, like Job's, were touched. He complains of inward trouble: My soul is also sorely vexed; and that is much more grievous than the vexation of the bones. It is a sad thing for a man to have his bones and his soul vexed at the same time. Thou, O Lord! how long? To the living God we must, at such a time, address ourselves, who is the only physician both of body and mind, and not to the Assyrians, not to the god of Ekron.

II. The impression which his troubles made upon him. They lay very heavily; he groaned till he was weary. David had more courage and consideration than to mourn thus for any outward affliction; but, when sin sat heavily upon his conscience then he thus grieved and mourned in secret, and even his soul refused to be comforted. True penitents weep in their retirements. David mourned in the night upon the bed where he lay communing with his own heart, and no eye was a witness to his grief, but the eye of him who is all eye. Peter went out, covered his face, and wept. David's eye waxed old because of his enemies, who rejoiced in his afflictions and put bad constructions upon his tears.

III. The petitions which he offers up to God in this sorrowful and distressed state. That which he dreads as the greatest evil is the anger of God. Therefore he prays (v. 1), O Lord! rebuke me not in thy anger, though I have deserved it, neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure. He can bear the rebuke and chastening well enough if God, at the same time, lift up the light of his countenance upon him and by his Spirit make him to hear the joy and gladness of his loving-kindness; the affliction of his body will be tolerable if he have but comfort in his soul. That which he desires as the greatest good, and which would be to him the restoration of all good, is the favour and friendship of God. He prays, That God would pity him and look upon him with compassion. That God would pardon his sins. That God would put forth his power for his relief: Lord, heal me (v. 2), save me (v. 4). That he would be at peace with him: Return, O Lord! receive me into thy favour again, and be reconciled to me. That he would especially preserve the inward man and the interests of that, whatever might become of the body: "O Lord! deliver my soul."

IV. The pleas with which he enforces his petitions, not to move God but to move himself. He pleads his own misery. He pleads God's mercy. He pleads God's glory (v. 5): "For in death there is no remembrance of thee."

What a sudden change is here for the better! He that was groaning, and weeping, and giving up all for gone (v. 6, 7), here looks and speaks very pleasantly.

I. He distinguishes himself from the wicked and ungodly, and fortifies himself against their insults (v. 8): Depart from me, all you workers of iniquity. The workers of iniquity had teased him, and taunted him, and asked him, "Where is thy God?" triumphing in his despondency and despair; but now he had wherewith to answer those that reproached him, for God had now comforted his spirit and would shortly complete his deliverance. But now, "depart from me: I will never lend an ear to your counsel; you would have had me to curse God and die, but I will bless him and live." When God has done great things for us, this would put us upon studying what we shall do for him.

II. He assures himself that God was, and would be, propitious to him, notwithstanding the present intimations of wrath which he was under. He is confident of a gracious answer to this prayer which he is now making. While he is yet speaking, he is aware that God hears and therefore speaks of it with an air of triumph, "The Lord hath heard." (v. 8), and again (v. 9), "The Lord hath heard." Thence he infers the like favourable audience of all his other prayers: "He has heard the voice of my supplication, and therefore he will receive my prayer."

III. He either prays for the conversion or predicts the destruction of his enemies and persecutors, v. 10. 1. It may very well be taken as a prayer for their conversion: "Let them all be ashamed of the censures they have passed upon me. Let them be (as all true penitents are) vexed at themselves for their own folly; let them return to a better temper and disposition of mind." 2. If they be not converted, it is a prediction of their confusion and ruin. They shall be ashamed and sorely vexed (so it may be read), and that justly. They rejoiced that David was vexed (v. 2, 3), and therefore, as usually happens, the evil returns upon themselves; they also shall be sorely vexed.

PSALM VII

It appears by the title that this psalm was penned with a particular reference to the malicious imputations that David was unjustly laid under by some of his enemies. Being thus wronged, I. He applies to God for favour, ver. 1, 2. II. He appeals to God concerning his innocency, ver. 3–5. III. He prays to God to plead his cause and judge for him against his persecutors, ver. 6–9. IV. He expresses his confidence in God that he would do so, ver. 10–16. V. He promises to give God the glory of his deliverance, ver. 17.

Shiggaion of David, which he sang unto the Lord concerning the words of Cush the Benjamite.

Shiggaion is a song or psalm (the word is used so only here and Hab. iii. 1)—a wandering song (so some), the matter and composition of the several parts being different, but artificially put together—a charming song (so others), very delightful. David not only penned it, but sang it himself in a devout religious manner unto the Lord, concerning the words or affairs of Cush the Benjamite, that is, of some kinsman of Saul named Cush, who was an inveterate enemy to David, and made mischief between him and Saul. David, thus basely abused, has recourse to the Lord. His spirit was not ruffled by it, and it did not occasion one jarring string in his harp. Thus let the injuries we receive from men, instead of provoking our passions, kindle and excite our devotions.

I. He puts himself under God's protection (v. 1): "Lord, save me, and deliver me from the power and malice of all those that persecute me, that they may not have their will against me." He pleads, 1. His relation to God. "Thou art my God, and therefore whither else should I go but to thee?" 2. His confidence in God: "Lord, save me, for I depend upon thee: In thee do I put my trust, and not in any arm of flesh." 3. The rage and malice of his enemies, and the imminent danger he was in of being swallowed up by them: "Lord, save me, or I am gone; he will tear my soul like a lion tearing his prey." 4. The failure of all other helpers: "Lord, be thou pleased to deliver me, for otherwise there is none to deliver," v. 2.

II. He makes a solemn protestation of his innocency as to those things whereof he was accused, and by a dreadful imprecation appeals to God, the searcher of hearts, concerning it, v. 3 5. David had no court on earth to appeal to. But he had the court of heaven, and a righteous Judge there, whom he could call his God. He was charged with a traitorous design against Saul's crown and life. This he utterly denies. I have delivered him that without cause is my enemy, v. 4. David had no design against Saul's life—Providence so ordered it that Saul lay at his mercy, and there were those about him that would soon have dispatched him, but David prevented it, when he cut off his skirt (1 Sam. xxiv. 4) and afterwards when he took away his spear (1 Sam. xxvi. 12), to attest for him what he could have done. If he were guilty (v. 5): Let the enemy persecute my soul to the death, and my good name when I am gone: let him lay my honour in the dust. With such an oath, or imprecation, David here ratifies the protestation of his innocency.

III. Having this testimony of his conscience concerning his innocency, he humbly prays to God to appear for him against his persecutors, and backs every petition with a proper plea.

1. He prays that God would manifest his wrath against his enemies. "Lord, they are unjustly angry at me, be thou justly angry with them and let them know that thou art so, v. 6. In thy anger lift up thyself to the seat of judgment, because of the rage of my enemies."

2. He prays that God would plead his cause. Awake for me to judgment (that is, let my cause have a hearing), to the judgment which thou hast commanded; He prays (v. 7), "Return thou on high that it may be universally acknowledged that heaven itself owns and pleads David's cause." He prays again (v. 8), "Judge me, judge for me, give sentence on my side" The Lord shall judge the people, v. 8. It is his place; it is his promise. God is the judge; "Therefore, Lord, judge me." It would be much for the glory of God and the edification and comfort of his people if God would appear for him: "So shall the congregation of the people compass thee about; therefore do it for their sakes, that they may attend thee with their praises and services in the courts of thy house."

3. He prays, in general, for the conversion of sinners and the establishment of saints (v. 9): "O let the wickedness, not only of my wicked enemies, but of all the wicked, come to an end! but establish the just." Here are two things which every one of us must desire and may hope for:— (1) The destruction of sin, that it may be brought to an end in ourselves and others. And this is that which all that love God, and for his sake hate evil, desire and pray for. (2) The perpetuity of righteousness: But establish the just. As we pray that the bad may be made good, so we pray that the good may be made better.

David having lodged his appeal with God by prayer and a solemn profession of his integrity, does, as it were, take out judgment upon the appeal, by faith in the word of God, and the assurance it gives of the happiness and safety of the righteous and the certain destruction of wicked people that continue impenitent.

I. David is confident that he shall find God his powerful protector and Saviour, and the patron of his oppressed innocency (v. 10): "My defence is of God. My shield is upon God (so some read it); there is that in God which gives an assurance of protection to all that are his. Two things David builds this confidence upon:—1. The particular favour God has for all that are sincere: He saves the upright in heart, and therefore will preserve them to his heavenly kingdom; he saves them out of their present troubles, as far as is good for them. 2. The general respect he has for justice and equity: God judgeth the righteous; he owns every righteous cause, and will maintain it in every righteous man, and will protect him. God is a righteous Judge (so some read it), who not only doeth righteousness himself, but will take care that righteousness be done by the children of men and will avenge and punish all unrighteousness.

II. He is no less confident of the destruction of all his persecutors, even as many of them as would not repent, to give glory to God. He reads their doom here, for their good, if possible, that they might cease from their enmity, or, however, for his own comfort, that he might not be afraid of them nor aggrieved at their prosperity and success for a time. God is angry with the wicked even in the merriest and most prosperous of their days. The destruction of sinners may be prevented by their conversion, for it is threatened with that proviso: If he turn not from his evil way, if he do not let fall his enmity against the people of God, then let him expect it will be his ruin; but, if he turn, it is implied that his sin shall be pardoned and all shall be well. Thus even the threatenings of wrath are introduced with a gracious implication of mercy. While God is preparing his instruments of death, he gives the sinners timely warning of their danger, and space to repent and prevent it. He is slow to punish, and longsuffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish. Of all sinners persecutors are set up as the fairest marks of divine wrath; against them, more than any other, God has ordained his arrows. They set God at defiance, but cannot set themselves out of the reach of his judgments. They will destroy themselves, v. 14–16. The sinner is here described as taking a great deal of pains to ruin himself. The sinner's head with its politics conceives mischief, contrives it with a great deal of art, lays the plot deep, and keeps it close; the sinner's heart with its passions travails with iniquity, and is in pain to be delivered of the malicious projects it is hatching against the people of God. But what does it come to when it comes to the birth? It is falsehood; it is a cheat upon himself; it is a lie in his right hand. A labouring man works hard to dig a pit, and then falls into it and perishes in it. This is true, in a sense, of all sinners. They prepare destruction for themselves by preparing themselves for destruction.

PSALM VIII

This psalm is a solemn meditation on the glory and greatness of God. It begins and ends with the same acknowledgment of the transcendent excellency of God's name. For the proof of God's glory the psalmist gives instances of his goodness to man; for God's goodness is his glory. God is to be glorified, I. For making known himself and his great name to us, ver. 1. II. For making use of the weakest of the children of men, by them to serve his own purposes, ver. 2. III. For making even the heavenly bodies useful to man, ver. 3, 4. IV. For making him to have dominion over the creatures in this lower world, and thereby placing him but little lower than the angels, ver. 5–8. This psalm is, in the New Testament, applied to Christ and the work of our redemption which he wrought out; the honour given by the children of men to him (ver. 2, compared with Matt. xxi. 16) and the honour put upon the children of men by him, both in his humiliation, when he was made a little lower than the angels, and in his exaltation, when he was crowned with glory and honour. Compare ver. 5, 6, with Heb. ii. 6–8, 1 Cor. xv. 27.

To the chief musician upon Gittith, A psalm of David.

The psalmist here sets himself to give to God the glory due to his name. Two things David here admires:—

I. How plainly God displays his glory himself, v. 1. He addresses himself to God with all humility and reverence, as the Lord and his people's Lord: O Lord our Lord! If we believe that God is the Lord, we must avouch and acknowledge him to be ours. 1. How brightly God's glory shines even in this lower world: How excellent is thy name in all the earth! The works of creation and Providence evince and proclaim to all the world that there is an infinite Being. There is no speech or language but the voice of God's name either is heard in it or may be. 2. How much more brightly it shines in the upper world: Who hast set thy glory above the heavens. (1) God is infinitely more glorious and excellent than the noblest of creatures and those that shine most brightly. (2) Whereas we, on this earth, only hear God's excellent name, and praise that, the angels and blessed spirits above see his glory, and praise that, and yet he is exalted far above even their blessing and praise. (3) In the exaltation of the Lord Jesus to the right hand of God, who is the brightness of his Father's glory and the express image of his person, God set his glory above the heavens, far above all principalities and powers.

II. How powerfully he proclaims it by the weakest of his creatures (v. 2): Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength, or perfected praise, the praise of thy strength, Matt. xxi. 16. This intimates the glory of God, 1. In the kingdom of nature. The care God takes of little children (when they first come into the world the most helpless of all animals), the special protection they are under, and the provision nature has made for them, ought to be acknowledged by every one of us, to the glory of God, as a great instance of his power and goodness, and the more because we have all had the benefit of it. 2. In the kingdom of Providence. In the government of this lower world he makes use of the children of men. 3. In the kingdom of grace, the kingdom of the Messiah. It is here foretold that by the apostles, who were looked upon but as babes, unlearned and ignorant men (Acts iv. 13), mean and despicable, and by the foolishness of their preaching, the devil's kingdom should be thrown down, as Jericho's walls were by the sound of rams' horns. The gospel is called the arm of the Lord and the rod of his strength; this was ordained to work wonders, not out of the mouth of philosophers or orators, politicians or statesmen, but of a company of poor fishermen. We hear children crying, Hosanna to the Son of David, when the chief priests and Pharisees owned him not. Sometimes the grace of God appears wonderfully in young children, and he teaches those knowledge and makes those to understand doctrine, who are but newly weaned from the milk and drawn from the breasts, Isa. xxviii. 9. Sometimes the power of God brings to pass great things in his church by very weak and unlikely instruments.

David here goes on to magnify the honour of God by recounting the honours he has put upon man, especially the man Christ Jesus. The condescensions of the divine grace call for our praises as much as the elevations of the divine glory. See here,

I. What it is that leads him to admire the condescending favour of God to man; it is his consideration of the lustre and influence of the heavenly bodies, which are within the view of sense (v. 3): I consider thy heavens, and there, particularly, the moon and the stars. It is our duty to consider the heavens. We see them, we cannot but see them. By this, among other things, man is distinguished from the beasts, that, while they are so framed as to look downwards to the earth, man is made erect to look upwards towards heaven. The heavens, even the heavens, are the Lord's (cxv. 16), because they are the work of his fingers. He made them; he made them easily. The stretching out of the heavens needed not any outstretched arm; it was done with a word; it was but the work of his fingers. Even the inferior lights, the moon and stars, show the glory and power of the Father of lights, and furnish us with matter for praise. God not only made them, but ordained them, and the ordinances of heaven can never be altered. When we consider how the glory of God shines in the upper world we may well wonder that he should take cognizance of such a mean creature as man. When we consider of what great use the heavens are to men on earth, we may well say, "Lord, what is man that thou shouldst settle the ordinances of heaven with an eye to him and to his benefit, and that his comfort and convenience should be so consulted in the making of the lights of heaven and directing their motions!"

II. How he expresses this admiration (v. 4): "Lord, what is man (enosh, sinful, weak, miserable man, a creature so forgetful of thee and his duty to thee) that thou art thus mindful of him, that thou takest cognizance of him and of his actions and affairs, that in the making of the world thou hadst a respect to him! What is the son of man, that thou visitest him as one friend visits another, art pleased to converse with him and concern thyself for him!"

1. To mankind in general. Though man is a worm (Job xxv. 6), yet God puts a respect upon him, and shows him abundance of kindness; man is, above all the creatures in this lower world, the favourite and darling of Providence. We may be sure he takes precedence of all the inhabitants of this lower world, for he is made but a little lower than the angels (v. 5), lower indeed, because by his body he is allied to the earth and to the beasts that perish, and yet by his soul, which is spiritual and immortal, he is so near akin to the holy angels that he may be truly said to be but a little lower than they, and is, in order, next to them. He is but for a little while lower than the angels, while his great soul is cooped up in a house of clay, but the children of the resurrection shall be ἰσάγγελοι—angels' peers (Luke xx. 36) and no longer lower than they. He is endued with noble faculties and capacities: Thou hast crowned him with glory and honour. Man's reason is his crown of glory; let him not profane that crown by disturbing the use of it nor forfeit that crown by acting contrary to its dictates. God has put all things under man's feet, that he might serve himself, not only of the labour, but of the productions and lives of the inferior creatures; they are all delivered into his hand, nay, they are all put under his feet. He specifies some of the inferior animals (v. 7, 8), not only sheep and oxen, which man takes care of and provides for, but the beasts of the field, as well as those of the flood, yea, and those creatures which are most at a distance from man, as the fowl of the air, yea, and the fish of the sea, which live in another element and pass unseen through the paths of the seas. Man has arts to take these; though many of them are much stronger and many of them much swifter than he.

2. But this refers, in a particular manner, to Jesus Christ. Of him we are taught to expound it, Heb. ii. 6–8, where the apostle, to prove the sovereign dominion of Christ both in heaven and in earth, shows that he is that man, that son of man, here spoken of, whom God has crowned with glory and honour and made to have dominion over the works of his hands. We have reason humbly to value ourselves by it and thankfully to admire the grace of God in it, (1) That Jesus Christ assumed the nature of man, and, in that nature, humbled himself. He was, for a little while (so the apostle interprets it), made lower than the angels, when he took upon him the form of a servant and made himself of no reputation. (2) That, in that nature, he is exalted to be Lord of all. God the Father exalted him, because he had humbled himself, crowned him with glory and honour, the glory which he had with him before the worlds were. All the creatures are put under his feet; and, even in the days of his flesh, he gave some specimens of his power over them, as when he commanded the winds and the seas.

PSALM IX

In this psalm, I. David praises God for pleading his cause, and giving him victory over the enemies of his country (ver. 1–6), and calls upon others to join with him in his songs of praise, ver. 11, 12. II. He prays to God that he might have still further occasion to praise him, ver. 13, 14, 19, 20. III. He triumphs in the assurance he had of God's judging the world (ver. 7, 8), protecting his oppressed people (ver. 9, 10, 18), and bringing his and their implacable enemies to ruin, ver. 15–17.

To the chief musician upon Muth-labben. A psalm of David.

The title of this psalm gives a very uncertain sound concerning the occasion of penning it. It is upon Muth-labben, which some make to refer to the death of Goliath, others of Nabel, others of Absolom; but I incline to think it signifies only some tune, or some musical instrument, to which this psalm was intended to be sung; and that the enemies are the Philistines, and other neighbouring nations, 2 Sam. v. 8.

I. David praises God for his mercies and the great things he had of late done for him and his government, v. 1, 2. Holy joy is the life of thankful praise, as thankful praise is the language of holy joy: I will be glad and rejoice in thee. The triumphs of the Redeemer ought to be the triumphs of the redeemed; see Rev. xii. 10; xix. 5; xv. 3, 4.

II. He acknowledges the almighty power of God as that which the strongest and stoutest of his enemies were no way able to contest with or stand before, v. 3. They are forced to turn back. When once they turn back, they fall and perish; even their retreat will be their ruin, and they will save themselves no more by flying than by fighting. The presence of the Lord and the glory of his power, are sufficient for the destruction of his and his people's enemies. This was fulfilled when our Lord Jesus, with one word, I am he, made his enemies to fall back at his presence (John xviii. 6).

III. He gives to God the glory of his righteousness, in his appearing on his behalf (v. 4): "Thou hast maintained my right and my cause, that is, my righteous cause; when that came on, thou satest in the throne, judging right."

IV. He records, with joy, the triumphs of the God of heaven over all the powers of hell and attends those triumphs with his praises, v. 5. "Thou hast rebuked the heathen, hast given them real proofs of thy displeasure against them." Thou hast destroyed the wicked. He had buried them in oblivion.

V. He exults over the enemy whom God thus appears against (v. 6): Thou hast destroyed cities. Either, "Thou, O enemy! hast destroyed our cities, at least in intention and imagination," or "Thou, O God! hast destroyed their cities by the desolation brought upon their country." It may be taken either way.

VI. He comforts himself and others in God, and pleases himself with the thoughts of him. 1. With the thoughts of his eternity. On this earth we see nothing durable, even strong cities are buried in rubbish and forgotten; but the Lord shall endure for ever, v. 7. 2. With the thoughts of his sovereignty both in government and judgment: He has prepared his throne, has fixed it by his infinite wisdom, has fixed it by his immutable counsel. 3. With the thoughts of his justice and righteousness in all the administrations of his government. He shall judge the world, all persons and all controversies, shall minister judgment to the people (shall determine their lot both in this and in the future state) in righteousness and in uprightness, so that there shall not be the least colour of exception against it. 4. With the thoughts of that peculiar favour which God bears to his own people and the special protection which he takes them under. He will be a refuge for the oppressed, a high place, a strong place, for the oppressed, in times of trouble. 5. With the thoughts of that sweet satisfaction and repose of mind which those have that make God their refuge (v. 10): "Those that know thy name will put their trust in thee, as I have done, and then they will find, as I have found, that thou dost not forsake those that seek thee." The better God is known the more he is trusted. Those who know him to be a God of infinite wisdom will trust him further than they can see him (Job xxxv. 14); those who know him to be a God of almighty power will trust him when creature-confidences fail and they have nothing else to trust to (2 Chron. xx. 12); and those who know him to be a God of infinite grace and goodness will trust him though he slay them, Job xiii. 15. Those who know him to be a God of inviolable truth and faithfulness will rejoice in his word of promise, and rest upon that. Those who know him to be the Father of spirits, and an everlasting Father, will trust him with their souls even to the end.

I. David, having praised God himself, calls upon and invites others to praise him likewise, v. 11. Sing praises to the Lord who dwelleth in Zion. As the special residence of his glory is in heaven, so the special residence of his grace is in his church, of which Zion was a type. Let them particularly take notice of the justice of God in avenging the blood of his people Israel on the Philistines and their other wicked neighbours, who had, in making war upon them, used them barbarously and given them no quarter, v. 12.

II. David, having praised God for former mercies and deliverances, earnestly prays that God would still appear for him; for he sees not yet all things put under him. "Have mercy upon me, who, having misery only, and no merit, to speak for me, must depend upon mere mercy for relief. Lord, consider my trouble, and do for me as thou thinkest fit." The experience he had had of divine succours and the expectation he now had of the continuance of them: "O thou that liftest me up, that canst do it, that hast done it, that wilt do it, whose prerogative it is to lift up thy people from the gates of death!" We are never brought so low, so near to death, but God can raise us up. If he has saved us from spiritual and eternal death, we may thence take encouragement to hope that in all our distresses he will be a very present help to us. His sincere purpose to praise God when his victories should be completed (v. 14).

III. David by faith foresees and foretells the certain ruin of all wicked people, both in this world and in that to come. God executes judgment upon them when the measure of their iniquities is full, for they sink into the pit which they themselves digged (vii. 15). Drunkards kill themselves; prodigals beggar themselves, the contentious bring mischief upon themselves. In these judgments the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. The wicked shall be turned into hell, as captives into the prison-house, even all the nations that forget God. Forgetfulness of God is the cause of all the wickedness of the wicked.

IV. David encourages the people of God to wait for his salvation, though it should be long deferred, v. 18. The needy may think themselves, and others may think them, forgotten for a while, and their expectation of help from God may seem to have perished. But he that believes does not make haste; the vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak. We may build upon it as undoubtedly true that God's people shall not always be forgotten, nor shall they be disappointed of their hopes from the promise.

V. He concludes with prayer that God would humble the pride, break the power, and blast the projects, of all the wicked enemies of his church: "Arise, O Lord! (v. 19), stir up thyself, exert thy power, take thy seat, and deal with all these proud and daring enemies of thy name, and cause, and people. Let not man prevail, consult thy own honour, and let not weak and mortal men prevail against the kingdom and interest of the almighty and immortal God. Shall mortal man be too hard for God, too strong for his Maker?" It is a very desirable thing, much for the glory of God and the peace and welfare of the universe, that men should know and consider themselves to be but men, depending creatures, mutable, mortal, and accountable.

PSALM X

The Septuagint translation joins this psalm with the ninth, and makes them but one; but the Hebrew makes it a distinct psalm, and the scope and style are certainly different. In this psalm, I. David complains of the wickedness of the wicked, and notices the delay of God's appearing against them, ver. 1–11. II. He prays to God to appear against them for the relief of his people and comforts himself with hopes that he would do so in due time, ver. 12–18.

David, in these verses, discovers,

I. A very great affection to God and his favour; for, in the time of trouble, that which he complains of most feelingly is God's withdrawing his gracious presence (v. 1): "Why standest thou afar off, as one unconcerned in the indignities done to thy name and the injuries done to the people?" It is because we judge by outward appearance; we stand afar off from God by our unbelief, and then we complain that God stands afar off from us.

II. A very great indignation against sin. He beholds the transgressors and is grieved, is amazed, and brings to his heavenly Father their evil report. Passionate and satirical invectives against bad men do more hurt than good; if we will speak of their badness, let it be to God in prayer, for he alone can make them better. This long representation of the wickedness of the wicked is here summed up in the first words of it (v. 2), The wicked in his pride doth persecute the poor, where two things are laid to their charge, pride and persecution, the former the cause of the latter. Tyranny, both in state and church, owes its origin to pride. The psalmist, having begun this description, presently inserts a short prayer, a prayer in a parenthesis. Let them be taken, as proud people often are, in the devices that they have imagined, v. 2. The sinner proudly glories in his power and success. He boasts of his heart's desire, boasts that he can do what he pleases. He proudly contradicts the judgment of God, which, we are sure, is according to truth; for he blesses the covetous, whom the Lord abhors. See how God and men differ in their sentiments of persons: God abhors covetous worldlings who make money their God and idolise it; he looks upon them as his enemies, and will have no communion with them. The friendship of the world is enmity to God. But proud persecutors bless them, and approve their sayings, xlix. 13. He proudly casts off the thoughts of God (v. 4). God is not in all his thoughts, not in any of them. All his thoughts are that there is no God. The cause of this impiety and irreligion is pride. Men will not seek after God because they think they have no need of him, their own hands are sufficient for them. He proudly makes light of God's commandments and judgments (v. 5): His ways are always grievous. Tell him of God's judgments which will be executed upon those that go on still in their trespasses, and he will not be convinced that there is any reality in them; they are far above out of his sight, and therefore he thinks they are mere bugbears. He proudly sets trouble at defiance and is confident of the continuance of his own prosperity (v. 6): He hath said in his heart, and pleased himself with the thought, I shall not be moved, my goods are laid up for many years, and I shall never be in adversity: like Babylon, that said, I shall be a lady for ever, Isa. xlvii. 7; Rev. xviii. 7. Those are nearest ruin who thus set it furthest from them. For the gratifying of their pride and covetousness, and in opposition to God and religion, they are very oppressive to all within their reach. They are very bitter and malicious (v. 7): His mouth is full of cursing. They are very false and treacherous. Like Esau, that cunning hunter, he sits in the lurking places, in the secret places, and his eyes are privily set to do mischief (v. 8), not because he is ashamed of what he does (if he blushed, there were some hopes he would repent), nor because he is afraid of the wrath of God, for he imagines God will never call him to an account (v. 11), but because he is afraid lest the discovery of his designs should be the breaking of them. Those that have power ought to protect the innocent and provide for the poor; yet these will be the destroyers of those whose guardians they ought to be. And what do they aim at? It is to catch the poor, and draw them into their net, that is, get them into their power, not to strip them only, but to murder them. They hunt for the precious life. It is God's poor people that they are persecuting, against whom they bear a mortal hatred for his sake whose they are and whose image they bear. He lies in wait as a lion that thirsts after blood, and feeds with pleasure upon the prey. He crouches and humbles himself, as beasts of prey do, that they may get their prey within their reach. This intimates that the sordid spirits of persecutors and oppressors will stoop to anything, though ever so mean, for the compassing of their wicked designs. They could not thus break through all the laws of justice and goodness towards man if they had not first shaken off all sense of religion, and risen up in rebellion against the light of its most sacred and self-evident principles: He hath said in his heart, God has forgotten.

David, upon the foregoing representation of the inhumanity and impiety of the oppressors, grounds an address to God.

I. What he prays for. 1. That God would himself appear (v. 12): "Arise, O Lord! O God! lift up thy hand, manifest thy presence and providence in the affairs of this lower world. Arise, O Lord! to the confusion of those who say that thou hidest thy face." 2. That he could appear for his people: "Forget not the humble, the afflicted, that are poor, that are made poorer, and are poor in spirit. Their oppressors, in their presumption, say that thou hast forgotten them; and they, in their despair, are ready to say the same. Lord, make it to appear that they are both mistaken." 3. That he would appear against their persecutors, v. 15. Break thou the arm of the wicked, take away his power, that the hypocrite reign not, lest the people be ensnared, Job xxxiv. 30.

II. What he pleads for the encouraging of his own faith in these petitions.

1. He pleads the great affronts which these proud oppressors put upon God himself (v. 13): "Wherefore do the wicked contemn God?" He does so; for he says, "Thou wilt not require it; thou wilt never call us to an account for what we do," than which they could not put a greater indignity upon the righteous God. Wherefore do the wicked thus contemn God? It is because they do not know him. Why are they suffered thus to contemn God? It is because the day of reckoning is yet to come.

2. He pleads the notice God took of the impiety and iniquity of these oppressors (v. 14).

3. He pleads the dependence which the oppressed had upon him: "The poor commits himself unto thee, each of them does so, I among the rest. They leave themselves with thee" (so some read it), "not prescribing, but subscribing, to thy wisdom and will. They are thy willing subjects, and put themselves under thy protection; therefore protect them."

4. He pleads the relation in which God is pleased to stand to us, (1) As a great God. He is King for ever and ever, v. 16. "Lord, let all that pay homage and tribute to thee as their King have the benefit of thy government and find thee their refuge." (2) As a good God. He is the helper of the fatherless (v. 14), of those who have no one else to help them and have many to injure them.

5. He pleads the experience which God's church and people had had of God's readiness to appear for them. "The heathen have perished out of this land; the remainders of the Canaanites, the seven devoted nations, which have long been as thorns in the eyes and goads in the sides of Israel, are now, at length, utterly rooted out; and this is an encouragement to us to hope that God will, in like manner, break the arm of the oppressive Israelites, who were, in some respects, worse than heathens." He had heard and answered their prayers (v. 17): "Lord, thou hast many a time heard the desire of the humble, and never saidst to a distressed suppliant, Seek in vain. Why may not we hope for the continuance and repetition of the wonders, the favours, which our father told us of?" Thou art the same, and thy power, and promise, and relation to thy people are the same, and the work and workings of grace are the same in them; why therefore may we not hope that he who has been will still be, will ever be, a God hearing prayer? He prepares the heart for prayer by kindling holy desires, and strengthening our most holy faith, fixing the thoughts and raising the affections and then he graciously accepts the prayer. He will plead the cause of the persecuted, will judge the fatherless and oppressed, clear up their innocency, restore their comforts, and recompense them for all the loss and damage. He will put an end to the fury of the persecutors. See how light the psalmist now makes of the power of that proud persecutor whom he had been describing in this psalm. He is but a man of the earth, a man out of the earth (so the word is), sprung out of the earth, and therefore mean, and weak. He is but man that shall die, a son of man that shall be as grass? Isa. li. 12. He that protects us is the Lord of heaven; he that persecutes us is but a man of the earth.

PSALM XI

In this psalm we have David's struggle with and triumph over a strong temptation to distrust God. It is supposed to have been penned when he began to feel the resentments of Saul's envy, and had had the javelin thrown at him once and again. He was then advised to run his country. "No," says he, "I trust in God, and therefore will keep my ground." Observe, I. How he represents the temptation, and perhaps parleys with it, ver. 1–2. II. How he answers it, and puts it to silence with the consideration of God's dominion and providence (ver. 4), his favour to the righteous, and the wrath which the wicked are reserved for, ver. 5–7. In times of public fear, when the insults of the church's enemies are daring and threatening, it will be profitable to meditate on this psalm.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

I. David's fixed resolution to make God his confidence: In the Lord put I my trust, v. 1. The psalmist before he gives an account of the temptation he was in to distrust God, records his resolution to trust in him, as that which he was resolved to live and die by.

II. His resentment of a temptation to the contrary: "How say you to my soul, Flee as a bird to your mountain, to be safe there out of the reach of the fowler?" This may be taken either,

1. As the serious advice of his timorous friends: some that were hearty wellwishers to David, when they saw how Saul maliciously sought his life, pressed him by all means to flee. (1) Because he could not be safe where he was, v. 2. "Observe," say they, "how the wicked bend their bow; Saul and his instruments aim at thy life, and the uprightness of thy heart will not be thy security." (2) Because he could be no longer useful where he was. "For," say they, "if the foundations be destroyed" (as they were by Saul's mal-administration), "if the civil state and government be unhinged and all out of course" (lxxv. 3; lxxxii. 5), "what canst thou do with thy righteousness to redress the grievances?"

2. It may be taken as a taunt wherewith his enemies bantered him, upbraiding him with the professions he used to make of confidence in God, and scornfully bidding him try what stead that would stand him in now. "You say, God is your mountain; flee to him now, and see what the better you will be." Taking it thus, the two following verses are David's answer to this sarcasm, in which, (1) He complains of the malice of those who did thus abuse him (v. 2): They bend their bow and make ready their arrows; and we are told (lxiv. 3) what their arrows are, even bitter words, by which they endeavour to discourage hope in God. (2) He resists the temptation with a gracious abhorrence, v. 3. The principles of religion are the foundations on which the faith and hope of the righteous are built.

The shaking of a tree (they say) makes it take the deeper and faster root. The attempt of David's enemies to discourage his confidence in God engages him to cleave so much the more closely to his first principles. That which was shocking to his faith, and has been so to the faith of many, was the prosperity of wicked people in their wicked ways, and the straits and distresses which the best men are sometimes reduced to: hence an evil thought was apt to arise, Surely it is vain to serve God. But, in order to stifle and shame all such thoughts, consider,

I. That there is a God in heaven: The Lord is in his holy Temple above, where, though he is out of our sight, we are not out of his. Or, He is in his holy temple, that is, in his church; he is a God in covenant and communion with his people.

II. That this God governs the world. The Lord has not only his residence, but his throne, in heaven, and he has set the dominion thereof in the earth (Job xxxviii. 33). Let us by faith see God on his throne, on his throne of glory—on his throne of government, giving law, giving motion, and giving aim, to all the creatures—on his throne of judgment—and on his throne of grace, to which his people may come boldly for mercy and grace; we shall then see no reason to be discouraged by the pride and power of oppressors, or any of the afflictions that attend the righteous.

III. That this God perfectly knows every man's true character: His eyes behold, his eyelids try, the children of men; he not only sees them, but he sees through them, not only knows all they say and do, but knows what they think, what they design, whatever they pretend.

IV. That, if he afflict good people, it is for their trial and therefore for their good, v. 5. The Lord tries all the children of men that he may do them good in their latter end, Deut. viii. 16.

V. That, however persecutors and oppressors may prosper and prevail awhile, they now lie under, and will for ever perish under, the wrath of God. The wicked and him that loveth violence, his soul hateth. Their prosperity is so far from being an evidence of God's love that their abuse of it does certainly make them the objects of his hatred. He that hates nothing that he has made, yet hates those who have thus ill-made themselves. Upon the wicked he shall rain snares. Here is a double metaphor, to denote the unavoidableness of the punishment of wicked men. It shall surprise them as a sudden shower sometimes surprises the traveller in a summer's day. It shall be as snares upon them, to hold them fast, and keep them prisoners, till the day of reckoning comes. It is fire, and brimstone, and a horrible tempest, which plainly alludes to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah.

VI. That, though honest good people may be run down, yet God does and will own them, and favour them, and that is the reason why God will severely reckon with persecutors and oppressors, because those whom they oppress and persecute are dear to him; so that whosoever toucheth them toucheth the apple of his eye, v. 7. He looks graciously upon them: His countenance doth behold the upright. He, like a tender father, looks upon them with pleasure, and they, like dutiful children, are pleased and abundantly satisfied with his smiles. They walk in the light of the Lord.

PSALM XII

It is supposed that David penned this psalm in Saul's reign, when there was a general decay of piety, which he here complains of to God, and very feelingly, for he himself suffered by the treachery of his false friends and his sworn enemies. I. He begs help of God, because there were none among men whom he durst trust, ver. 1, 2. II. He foretells the destruction of his proud and threatening enemies, ver. 3, 4. III. He assures himself and others that, how ill soever things went now (ver. 8), God would preserve and secure to himself his own people (ver. 5, 7), and would certainly make good his promises to them, ver 6.

To the chief musician upon Sheminith. A psalm of David.

This psalm furnishes us with good thoughts for bad times.

I. Let us see here what it is that makes the times bad, and when they may be said to be so. Scarcity of money, decay of trade, and the desolations of war, make the times bad. But the scripture lays the badness of the times upon causes of another nature. 2 Tim. iii. 1, Perilous times shall come, for iniquity shall abound; and that is the thing David here complains of. The times are bad:—

1. When there is a general decay of piety and honesty among men the times are then truly bad (v. 1): When the godly man ceases and the faithful fail. Observe how these two characters are here put together, the godly and the faithful. As there is no true policy, so there is no true piety, without honesty. Godly men are faithful men, fast men, so they have sometimes been called; they make conscience of being true both to God and man. They are here said to cease and fail. Those that were godly and faithful were taken away, and those that were left had sadly degenerated and were not what they had been.

2. When men are so spiteful as to design against their neighbours the worst of mischiefs, and yet so base as to cover the design with plausible professions of friendship. Thus they speak vanity (that is, falsehood and a lie) everyone to his neighbour, with flattering lips and a double heart. They will kiss and kill. This is the devil's image complete, a complication of malice and falsehood. The times are bad indeed when there is no such thing as sincerity to be met with.

3. The times are very bad, when proud sinners have arrived at such a pitch of impiety as to say, "With our tongue will we prevail against the cause of virtue; our lips are our own and we may say what we will; who is lord over us, either to restrain us or to call us to an account?" v. 4. Our lips are our own (an unjust pretension, for who made man's mouth, in whose hand is his breath, and whose is the air he breathes in?) and as if he had no authority either to command them or to judge them: Who is Lord over us? Like Pharaoh, Exod. v. 2.

4. When the poor and needy are oppressed, and abused, and puffed at, then the times are very bad. This is implied (v. 5) where God himself takes notice of the oppression of the poor and the sighing of the needy.

5. When wickedness abounds, and goes barefaced under the protection and countenance of those in authority, then the times are very bad, v. 8. When the vilest men are exalted to places of trust and power then the wicked walk on every side. When the wicked bear rule the people mourn.

II. When times are thus bad it is comfortable to think,

1. That we have a God to go to, from whom we may ask and expect the redress of all our grievances. This he begins with (v. 1): "Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth. It is time for thee, Lord, to work."

2. That God will certainly reckon with false and proud men, and will punish and restrain their insolence. Men cannot discover the falsehood of flatterers, nor humble the haughtiness of those that speak proud things; but the righteous God will cut off all flattering lips (v. 3). Some translate it as a prayer, "May God cut off those false and spiteful lips."

3. That God will, in due time, work deliverance for his oppressed people, and shelter them from the malicious designs of their persecutors (v. 5): Now, will I arise, saith the Lord. When the oppressors are in the height of their pride and insolence—when they say, Who is lord over us?—then is God's time to let them know, to their cost, that he is above them. When the oppressed are in the depth of their distress and despondency, then is God's time to appear for them, as for Israel when they were most dejected and Pharaoh was most elevated. Now will I arise. I will set him in safety, or in salvation, not only protect him, but restore him to his former prosperity, will bring him out into a wealthy place (lxvi. 12), so that, upon the whole, he shall lose nothing by his sufferings.

4. That, though men are false, God is faithful; the words of the Lord are pure words (v. 6), not only all true, but all pure, like silver tried in a furnace of earth or a crucible.

5. That God will secure his chosen remnant to himself, how bad soever the times are (v. 7): Thou shalt preserve them from this generation for ever. In times of general apostasy the Lord knows those those that are his, and they shall be enabled to keep their integrity.

PSALM XIII

This psalm is the deserted soul's case and cure. Whether it was penned upon any particular occasion does not appear, but in general, I. David sadly complains that God had long withdrawn from him and delayed to relieve him, ver. 1, 2. II. He earnestly prays to God to consider his case and comfort him, ver. 3, 4. III. He assures himself of an answer of peace, and therefore concludes the psalm with joy and triumph, because he concludes his deliverance to be as good as wrought, ver. 5, 6.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

David, in affliction, is here pouring out his soul before God.

I. It is some ease to a troubled spirit to give vent to its griefs, especially to give vent to them at the throne of grace, where we are sure to find one who is afflicted in the afflictions of his people. Thither we have boldness of access by faith, and there we have παρρησία—freedom of speech. David thought God had forgotten him. Not that any good man can doubt the omniscience, goodness, and faithfulness of God; but it is a peevish expression of prevailing fear, which yet, when it arises from a high esteem and earnest desire of God's favour, though it be indecent and culpable, shall be passed by and pardoned, for the second thought will retract it and repent of it. He was racked with care, which filled his head: I take counsel in my soul; "I am at a loss, and am without a friend that I can put any confidence in. I have sorrow in my heart daily." The bread of sorrow is sometimes the saint's daily bread. Our Master himself was a man of sorrows. His enemies' insolence added to his grief. He expostulates with God "How long shall it be thus?" And, "Shall it be thus for ever?" It is a common temptation, when trouble lasts long, to think it will last always; despondency then turns into despair, and those that have long been without joy begin, at last, to be without hope.

II. His complaints stir up his prayers, v. 3, 4. We should never allow ourselves to make any complaints but what are fit to be offered up to God and what drive us to our knees. "Consider my case, hear my complaints and enlighten my eyes. Strengthen my faith"; for faith is the eye of the soul, with which it sees above, and sees through, the things of sense. "Lord, enable me to look beyond my present troubles and to foresee a happy issue of them." If his eyes were not enlightened quickly he must perish: "I shall sleep the sleep of death; I cannot live under the weight of all this care and grief." It would gratify the pride of his enemy: He will say, "I have prevailed, I have gotten the day, and been too hard for him and his God."

III. His prayers are soon turned into praises (v. 5, 6): But my heart shall rejoice and I will sing to the Lord. What a surprising change is here in a few lines! In the beginning of the psalm we have him drooping, trembling, and ready to sink into melancholy and despair; but, in the close of it, rejoicing in God, and elevated and enlarged in his praises. See the power of faith, the power of prayer, and how good it is to draw near to God. "In former distresses I have trusted in the mercy of God, and I never found that it failed me. Even in the depth of this distress, when God hid his face from me, when without were fightings and within were fears, yet I trusted in the mercy of God and that was as an anchor in a storm, by the help of which, though I was tossed, I was not overset." And still I do trust in thy mercy; so some read it. His faith in God's mercy filled his heart with joy in his salvation; for joy and peace come by believing, Rom. xv. 13. Believing, you rejoice, 1 Pet. i. 8. "I will sing unto the Lord, sing in remembrance of what he has done formerly; though I should never recover the peace I have had, I will die blessing God that ever I had it. He has dealt bountifully with me formerly, and he shall have the glory of that, however he is pleased to deal with me now. I will sing in hope of what he will do for me at last, being confident that all will end well, will end everlastingly well."

PSALM XIV

It does not appear upon what occasion this psalm was penned. Some say David penned it when Saul persecuted him; others, when Absalom rebelled against him. But they are mere conjectures, which have not certainty enough to warrant us to expound the psalm by them. The apostle, in quoting part of this psalm (Rom. iii. 10, &c.) to prove that Jews and Gentiles are all under sin (ver. 9) and that all the world is guilty before God (ver. 19), leads us to understand it, in general, as a description of the depravity of human nature. In all the psalms from the 3rd to this (except the 8th) David had been complaining of those that hated and persecuted him, insulted him and abused him; now here he traces all those bitter streams to the fountain, the general corruption of nature, and sees that not his enemies only, but all the children of men, were thus corrupted. Here is, I. A charge exhibited against a wicked world, ver. 1. II. The proof of the charge, ver. 2, 3. III. A serious expostulation with sinners, especially with persecutors, upon it, ver. 4–6. IV. A believing prayer for the salvation of Israel and a joyful expectation of it, ver. 7.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

Verses 1–3

Sin is the disease of mankind, and it appears here to be malignant and epidemic.

1. See how malignant it is (v. 1) in two things:—

(1) The contempt it puts upon the honour of God: for there is something of practical atheism at the bottom of all sin. The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. We are sometimes tempted to think, "Surely there never was so much atheism and profaneness as there is in our days"; but we see the former days were no better. The sinner is one that saith in his heart, There is no God; he is an atheist. He cannot be sure there is one, and therefore he is willing to think there is none. He is a fool; he is simple and unwise, and this is an evidence of it; he is wicked and profane, and this is the cause of it.

(2) The disgrace and debasement it puts upon the nature of man. Sinners are corrupt, quite degenerated from what man was in his innocent estate: They have become filthy (v. 3), putrid. They are corrupt indeed; for they do God no service, bring him no honour, nor do themselves any real kindness. They do a great deal of hurt. They have done abominable works, for such all sinful works are. This follows upon their saying, There is no God; for those that profess they know God, but in works deny him, are abominable, and to every good work reprobate, Titus. i. 16.

2. See how epidemic this disease is; it has infected the whole race of mankind. God himself is here brought in for a witness, v. 2, 3. The Lord looked down from heaven, he took a view of all the children of men, and the question was, Whether there were any among them that did understand themselves aright, their duty and interests, and did seek God and set him before them. The result of this enquiry, v. 3. Upon his search, it appeared, They have all gone aside, the apostasy is universal, there is none that doeth good, no, not one, till the free and mighty grace of God has wrought a change. When God had made the world he looked upon his own work, and all was very good (Gen. i. 31); but, some time after, he looked upon man's work, and, behold, all was very bad (Gen. vi. 5).

In these verses the psalmist endeavours,

I. To convince sinners of the evil and danger of the way they are in, how secure soever they are in that way. Three things he shows them, which, it may be, they are not very willing to see—their wickedness, their folly, and their danger.

1. Their wickedness. This is described in four instances:—(1) They are themselves workers of iniquity; and take as much pleasure in it as ever any man did in his business. (2) They eat up God's people with as much greediness as they eat bread because they really hate God, whose people they are. It is meat and drink to persecutors to be doing mischief. (3) They call not upon the Lord. What good can be expected from those that live without prayer? (4) They shame the counsel of the poor, and upbraid them with making God their refuge, as David's enemies upbraided him, xi. 1.

2. Their folly: They have no knowledge.

3. Their danger (v. 5): There were they in great fear. Many instances there have been of proud and cruel persecutors who have been made terrors to themselves and all about them.

II. He endeavours to comfort the people of God. They have God's presence (v. 5): He is in the generation of the righteous. They have his protection (v. 6): The Lord is their refuge. When David was driven out by Absalom and his rebellious accomplices, he comforted himself with an assurance that God would in due time turn again his captivity. But surely this pleasing prospect looks further. He had, in the beginning of the psalm, lamented the general corruption of mankind; and, in the melancholy view of that, wishes for the salvation which in the fulness of time was to come out of Zion—salvation from sin, that great salvation which should be wrought out by the Redeemer, who was expected to come to Zion, to turn away ungodliness from Jacob, Rom. xi. 26.

PSALM XV

The scope of this short but excellent psalm is to show us the way to heaven, and to convince us that, if we would be happy, we must be holy and honest. Christ, who is himself the way, and in whom we must walk as our way, has also shown us the same way that is here prescribed, Matt. xix. 17. "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." In this psalm, I. By the question (ver. 1) we are directed and excited to enquire for the way. II. By the answer to that question, in the rest of the psalm, we are directed to walk in that way, ver. 2–5. III. By the assurance given in the close of the psalm of the safety and happiness of those who answer these characters we are encouraged to walk in that way, ver. 5.

I. A very serious and weighty question concerning the character of a citizen of Zion (v. 1): "Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? Let me know who shall go to heaven." Not, who by name (in this way the Lord only knows those that are his), but who by description: "What kind of people are those whom thou wilt own and crown with distinguishing and everlasting favours?" It concerns us all to put this question to ourselves, Lord, what shall I be, and do, that I may abide in thy tabernacle? Luke xviii. 18; Acts xvi. 30. 1. Observe to whom this enquiry is addressed—to God himself. 2. How it is expressed in Old Testament language. (1) By the tabernacle we may understand the church militant, typified by Moses's tabernacle, fitted to a wilderness-state, mean and movable. There God manifests himself, and there he meets his people, as of old in the tabernacle of the testimony, the tabernacle of meeting. (2) By the holy hill we may understand the church triumphant, alluding to Mount Zion, on which the temple was to be built by Solomon. It concerns us to know who shall dwell there, that we may make it sure to ourselves that we shall have a place among them.

II. A very plain and particular answer to this question of the particular character of a citizen of Zion.

1. He is one that is sincere and entire in his religion: He walketh uprightly, according to the condition of the covenant (Gen. xvii. 1), "Walk before me, and be thou perfect" (it is the same word that is here used) "and then thou shalt find me a God all-sufficient." He is really what he professes to be, is sound at heart, and can approve himself to God, in his integrity, in all he does. His eye perhaps is weak, but it is single; he has his spots indeed, but he does not paint; he is an Israelite indeed in whom is no guile, John i. 47; 2 Cor. i. 12. I know no religion but sincerity.

2. He is one that is conscientiously honest and just in all his dealings, faithful and fair to all with whom he has to do: He worketh righteousness. He reckons that that cannot be a good bargain, nor a saving one, which is made with a lie, and that he who wrongs his neighbour, though ever so plausibly, will prove, in the end, to have done the greatest injury to himself.

3. He is one that contrives to do all the good he can to his neighbours, but is very careful to do hurt to no man, and is, in a particular manner, tender of his neighbour's reputation, v. 3. He makes the best of everybody, and the worst of nobody. If an ill-natured character of his neighbour be given him, or an ill-natured story be told him, he will disprove it if he can; if not, it shall die with him and go no further. His charity will cover a multitude of sins.

4. He is one that values men by their virtue and piety, and not by the figure they make in the world, v. 5. He thinks the worse of no man's piety for his poverty and meanness, but he knows those that fear the Lord. He reckons that serious piety, wherever it is found, puts an honour upon a man, and makes his face to shine, more than wealth, or wit, or a great name among men, does or can. He honours such.

5. He is one that always prefers a good conscience before any secular interest or advantage whatsoever; for, if he has promised upon oath to do anything, though afterwards it appear much to his damage and prejudice in his worldly estate, yet he adheres to it and changes not, v. 4.

6. He is one that will not increase his estate by any unjust practices, v. 5. He putteth not out his money to usury, that he may live at ease upon the labours of others. Not that it is any breach of the law of justice or charity for the lender to share in the profit which the borrower makes of his money, any more than for the owner of the land to demand rent from the occupant, money being, by art and labour, as improvable as land. But a citizen of Zion will freely lend to the poor, according to his ability, and not be rigorous and severe in recovering his right from those that are reduced by Providence. He will not take a reward against the innocent; if he be any way employed in the administration of public justice, he will not, for any gain, or hope of it, to himself, do anything to the prejudice of a righteous cause.

III. The psalm concludes with a ratification of this character of the citizen of Zion. He is like Zion-hill itself, which cannot be moved. Every true living member of the church, like the church itself, is built upon a rock, which the gates of hell cannot prevail against: He that doeth these things shall never be moved.

PSALM XVI

This psalm has something of David in it, but much more of Christ. It begins with such expressions of devotion as may be applied to Christ; but concludes with such confidence of a resurrection as must be applied to Christ, to him only, and cannot be understood of David, as both St. Peter and St. Paul have observed, Acts ii.

24; xiii. 36. I David speaks the language of all good Christians, professing his confidence in God (ver. 1), his consent to him (ver. 2), his affection to the people of God (ver. 3), his adherence to the true worship of God. II. He speaks of himself as a type of Christ, and so he speaks the language of Christ himself, to whom all the rest of the psalm is expressly and at large applied, Acts ii. 25, &c. He spoke, 1. Of the special presence of God with the Redeemer in his services and sufferings, ver. 8. 2. Of the prospect which the Redeemer has of his own resurrection and the glory that should follow, which carried him cheerfully through his undertaking, ver. 9–11.

Michtam of David.

This psalm is entitled Michtam, which some translate a golden psalm, more to be valued than much fine gold, because it speaks so plainly of Christ and his resurrection, who is the true treasure hidden in the field of the Old Testament.

I. David here flies to God's protection: "Preserve me, O God! from the deaths, and especially from the sins, to which I am continually exposed: for in thee, and in thee only, do I put my trust." This is applicable to Christ, who prayed, Father, save me from this hour, and trusted in God that he would deliver him.

II. He recognises his solemn dedication of himself to God as his God (v. 2): "O my soul! thou hast said unto the Lord, Thou art my Lord, and therefore thou mayest venture to trust him." Adonai signifies My stayer, the strength of my heart.

III. He devotes himself to the honour of God in the service of the saints (v. 2, 3): My goodness extends not to thee, but to the saints. If God be ours, we must, for his sake, extend our goodness to those that are his, to the saints in the earth; for what is done to them he is pleased to take as done to himself, having constituted them his receivers. Those that are renewed by the grace of God, and devoted to the glory of God, are saints on earth. Christ delights even in the saints on earth, notwithstanding their weaknesses and manifold infirmities, which is a good reason why we should (John xvii. 19).

IV. He disclaims the worship of all false gods and all communion with their worshippers, v. 4. He reads the doom of idolaters. Their sorrows shall be multiplied, both by the judgments they bring upon themselves from the true God whom they forsake and by the disappointment they will meet with in the false gods they embrace. "Their drink-offerings of blood will I not offer, not only because the gods they are offered to are a lie, but because the offerings themselves are barbarous." At God's altar, because the blood made atonement, the drinking of it was most strictly prohibited, and the drink-offerings were of wine; but the devil prescribed to his worshippers to drink of the blood of the sacrifices, to teach them cruelty. Some make this also applicable to Christ and his undertaking, showing the nature of the sacrifice he offered (it was not the blood of bulls and goats, which was offered according to the law; that was never named, nor did he ever make any mention of it, but his own blood).

V. He repeats the solemn choice he had made of God for his portion and happiness (v. 5), takes to himself the comfort of the choice (v. 6), and gives God the glory of it, v. 7. Heaven is an inheritance. We must take that for our home, our rest, our everlasting good, and look upon this world to be no more ours than the country through which our road lies when we are on a journey. Confiding in him for the securing of this portion: "Thou maintainest my lot. Thou that hast by promise made over thyself to me, wilt graciously make good what thou hast promised. The lines have fallen to me in pleasant places. Those have reason to say so that have God for their portion. What can they desire more? Return unto thy rest, O my soul! and look no further. Those whose lot is cast, as David's was, in a land of light, in a valley of vision, where God is known and worshipped, have, upon that account, reason to say, The lines have fallen to me in pleasant places; much more those who have not only Immanuel's land, but Immanuel's love.

"I will bless the Lord who has given me counsel, this counsel, to take him for my portion and happiness." If we have the pleasure of it, let God have the praise of it. God having given him counsel by his word and Spirit, his own reins also (his own thoughts) instructed him in the night-season; when he was silent and solitary, and retired from the world, then his own conscience (which is called the reins, Jer. xvii. 10) not only reflected with comfort upon the choice he had made, but instructed or admonished him concerning the duties arising out of this choice.

All this may be applied to Christ, who made the Lord his portion and was pleased with that portion, made his Father's glory his highest end. We may also apply it to ourselves, in singing it, renewing our choice of God as ours, with a holy complacency and satisfaction.

All these verses are quoted by St. Peter in his first sermon, after the pouring out of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 25–28); and he tells us expressly that David in them speaks concerning Christ and particularly of his resurrection. Something we may allow here of the workings of David's own pious and devout affections towards God, but in these holy elevations towards God and heaven he was carried by the spirit of prophecy quite beyond the consideration of himself and his own case, to foretell the glory of the Messiah. The New Testament furnishes us with a key to let us into the mystery of these lines.

1. These verses must certainly be applied to Christ; of him speaks the prophet this, as did many of the Old Testament prophets, who testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow (1 Pet. i. 11), and that is the subject of this prophecy here.

1. That he should suffer and die. When he says, "My flesh shall rest," it is implied that he must put off the body, that he should not only die, but be buried and abide for some time under the power of death.

2. That he should be wonderfully borne up by the divine power in suffering and dying. That he should not be moved till he could say, It is finished. That his heart should rejoice and his glory be glad, that he should go on with his undertaking, not only resolutely, but cheerfully. By his glory is meant his tongue, as appears, Acts ii. 26. Now there were three things which carried him on thus cheerfully:—(1) The respect he had to his Father's will and glory in what he did: I have set the Lord always before me. (2) The assurance he had of his Father's presence with him in his sufferings: He is at my right hand, a present help to me, nigh at hand in the time of need. (3) The prospect he had of a glorious issue of his sufferings. It was for the joy set before him that he endured the cross, Heb. xii. 2. He rested in hope, and that made his rest glorious, Isa. xi. 10. See John xiii. 31, 32.

3. That he should be brought through his sufferings, and brought from under the power of death by a glorious resurrection.

4. That he should be abundantly recompensed for his sufferings, with the joy set before him, v. 11. "Thou wilt show me the path of life, and lead me to that life through this darksome valley." In confidence of this, when he gave up the ghost, he said, Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit; and, a little before, Father, glorify me with thy own self.

II. Christ being the Head of the body, the church, these verses may, for the most part, be applied to all good Christians, who are guided and animated by the Spirit of Christ; and, in singing them, when we have first given glory to Christ, we may then encourage and edify ourselves and one another with them. Dying Christians, as well as a dying Christ, may cheerfully put off the body, in a believing expectation of a joyful resurrection: My flesh also shall rest in hope.

PSALM XVII

David, being in great distress and danger by the malice of his enemies, does, in this psalm, by prayer address himself to God, his tried refuge, and seeks shelter in him. I. He appeals to God concerning his integrity, ver. 1–4. II. He prays to God still to be upheld in his integrity and preserved from the malice of his enemies, ver. 5–8, 13. III. He gives a character of his enemies, using that as a plea with God for his preservation, ver. 9–12, 14. IV. He comforts himself with the hopes of his future happiness, ver. 15.

A prayer of David.

This psalm is a prayer. A time for praise and a time for prayer. David was now persecuted, probably by Saul. He addresses himself to God in these verses both by way of appeal (Hear the right, O Lord! let my righteous cause have a hearing before thy tribunal, and give judgment upon it) and by way of petition (Give ear unto my prayer, v. 1, and again (v. 6), Incline thy ear unto me and hear my speech). He was sincere, and did not dissemble with God in his prayer: It goeth not out of feigned lips. Feigned prayers are fruitless. "I have called upon thee formerly (v. 6); therefore, Lord, hear me now." It will be a great comfort to us if trouble, when it comes, find the wheels of prayer a-going, for then we may come with the more boldness to the throne of grace. He was encouraged by his faith to expect God would take notice of his prayers: "I know thou wilt hear me, and therefore, O God, incline thy ear to me."

I. He makes his appeal to the court of heaven. "Lord, do thou hear the right, for Saul is so passionate, so prejudiced, that he will not hear it. Lord, let my sentence come forth from thy presence, v. 2. Men sentence me to be pursued and cut off as an evil-doer. Lord, I appeal from them to thee." Sincerity dreads no scrutiny, no, not that of God himself, according to the tenor of the covenant of grace: Let thy eyes behold the things that are equal. Thou hast proved my heart. He knew God had tried him, by his own conscience, which is God's deputy in the soul. The spirit of a man is the candle of the Lord, with this God had searched him, and visited him in the night, when he communed with his own heart upon his bed. God had tried him by the fair opportunity he had, once and again, to kill Saul. He had a fixed resolution against all sins of the tongue: "I have purposed and fully determined, in the strength of God's grace, that my mouth shall not transgress." He had been as careful to refrain from sinful actions as from sinful words (v. 4): "Concerning the common works of men, the actions and affairs of human life, I have, by the direction of thy word, kept myself from the paths of the destroyer." Some understand it particularly, that he had not been himself a destroyer of Saul, when it lay in his power. But it may be taken more generally; he kept himself from all evil works, and endeavoured, according to the duty of his place, to keep others from them too.

II. His petition is that he might experience the good work of God in him, as an evidence of and qualification for the goodwill of God towards him: this is grace and peace from God the Father. 1. He prays for the work of God's grace in him (v. 5): "Hold up my goings in thy paths. Lord, I have, by thy grace, kept myself from the paths of the destroyer; by the same grace let me be kept in thy paths. 2. He prays for the tokens of God's favour to him, v. 7. O thou that savest by thy right hand (by thy own power, and needest not the agency of any other) those who put their trust in thee from those that rise up against them. Those that trust in God have many enemies, but they have one friend that is able to deal with them all. The margin reads it, O thou that savest those who trust in thee from those that rise up against thy right hand. Those that are enemies to the saints are rebels against God and his right hand. Show thy marvellous loving-kindness. "Set apart thy loving-kindnesses for me; put me not off with common mercies, but be gracious to me, as thou usest to do to those who love thy name."

I. What David prays for. This prayer is both a prediction of the preservation of Christ through all the hardships and difficulties of his humiliation, and a pattern to Christians to commit the keeping of their souls to God, trusting him to preserve them to his heavenly kingdom. He prays,

1. That he himself might be protected (v. 8): "Keep me safe, hide me close, where I may not be found, where I may not be come at. Deliver my soul, not only my mortal life from death, but my immortal spirit from sin." He prays that God would keep him as a man keeps the apple of his eye, which nature has wonderfully fenced and teaches us to guard. If we keep God's law as the apple of our eye (Prov. vii. 2), we may expect that God will so keep us; for it is said concerning his people that whoso touches them touches the apple of his eye, Zech. ii. 8. He prays that God would keep him with as much tenderness as the hen gathers her young ones under her wings. Christ uses the similitude, Matt. xxiii. 37. "Hide me under the shadow of thy wings, where I may be both safe and warm." Or, perhaps, it rather alludes to the wings of the cherubim shadowing the mercy-seat: "Let me be taken under the protection of that glorious grace which is peculiar to God's Israel." David further prays, "Lord, keep me from the wicked, from men of the world."

2. That all the designs of his enemies to bring him either into sin or into trouble might be defeated (v. 13): "Arise, O Lord! appear for me, disappoint him, and cast him down in his own eyes by the disappointment." While Saul persecuted David, how often did he miss his prey, when he thought he had him sure! And how were Christ's enemies disappointed by his resurrection, who thought they had gained their point when they had put him to death!

II. For the encouraging of his own faith in these petitions, he pleads,

1. The malice and wickedness of his enemies: They are my deadly enemies, enemies against the soul, so the word is. They are sensual, insolent and haughty (v. 10): They are enclosed in their own fat, wrap themselves, hug themselves, in their own honour, and power, and plenty, and then make light of God, and set his judgments at defiance, lxxiii. 7; Job xv. 27. They compass me about, v. 9. "They are watchful and intent upon it, to do us a mischief; they are down-looked, and never let slip any opportunity of compassing their design." "The ringleader of them (that was Saul) is in a special manner bloody and barbarous (v. 12), like a lion that lives by prey and is therefore greedy of it." This is fitly applied to Saul, who sought David on the rocks of the wild goats (1 Sam. xxiv. 2) and in the wilderness of Ziph (ch. xxvi. 2), where lions used to lurk for their prey.

2. The power God had over them, to control and restrain them. Lord, they are thy sword—God's sword, which he can manage as he pleases, which cannot move without him, and which he will sheathe when he has done his work with it. "They are thy hand, by which thou dost chastise thy people and make them feel thy displeasure."

3. Their outward prosperity (v. 14). They are men of the world, actuated by the spirit of the world, in love with the wealth and pleasure of this world. They have their portion in this life. They have abundance of the world. Their bellies thou fillest with thy hidden treasures. The things of this world are called treasures, because they are so accounted; otherwise, to a soul, and in comparison with eternal blessings, they are but trash. Those that fare deliciously every day have their bellies filled with these hidden treasures; and they will but fill the belly (1 Cor. vi. 13); they will not fill the soul. They have numerous families, and a great deal to leave to them: They are full of children, and they have enough for them all, and leave the rest of their substance to their babes, to their grand-children.

4. He pleads his own dependence upon God as his portion and happiness. "They have their portion in this life, but as for me (v. 15) I am none of them, I have but little of the world." When the soul awakes, at death, out of its slumber in the body, and when the body awakes, at the resurrection, out of its slumber in the grave blessedness will consist in three things:—(1) The immediate vision of God and his glory: I shall behold thy face, not, as in this world, through a glass darkly. (2) The participation of his likeness. When he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. (3) A complete and full satisfaction resulting from all this: I shall be satisfied, abundantly satisfied with it.

PSALM XVIII

This psalm we met with before, in the history of David's life, 2 Sam. xxii. That was the first edition of it; here we have it revived, altered a little, and fitted for the service of the church. It is David's thanksgiving for the many deliverances God had wrought for him. The poetry is very fine, the images are bold, the expressions lofty, and every word is proper and significant; but the piety far exceeds the poetry. Holy faith, and love, and joy, and praise, and hope, are here lively, active, and upon the wing. I. He triumphs in God, ver. 1–3. II. He magnifies the deliverances God had wrought for him, ver. 4–19. III. He takes the comfort of his integrity, which God had thereby cleared up, ver. 20–28. IV. He gives to God the glory of all his achievements, ver. 29–42. V. He encourages himself with the expectation of what God would further do for him and his, ver. 43–50.

To the chief musician, A psalm of David, the servant of the Lord, who spoke unto the Lord the words of this song, in the day that the Lord delivered him from the hand of all his enemies, and from the hand of Saul.

This psalm we had before (2 Sam. xxii. 1), only here we are told that the psalm was delivered to the chief musician, or precentor, in the temple-songs. David is here called the servant of the Lord, as Moses was. It was more his honour that he was a servant of the Lord than that he was king of a great kingdom; and so he himself accounted it (cxvi. 16): O Lord! truly I am thy servant.

I. He triumphs in God and his relation to him. The first words of the psalm, I will love thee, O Lord! my strength, are here prefixed as the scope and contents of the whole. An interest in the person loved is the lover's delight; this string therefore he touches, and on this he harps with much pleasure (v. 2): "The Lord Jehovah is my God; and then he is my rock, my fortress, all that I need and can desire in my present distress."

II. He sets himself to magnify the deliverances God had wrought for him, that he might be the more affected in his returns of praise.

1. The more imminent and threatening the danger was out of which we were delivered the greater is the mercy of the deliverance. David now remembered how the forces of his enemies poured in upon him, which he calls the floods of Belial.

2. The more earnest we have been with God for deliverance, and the more direct answer it is to our prayers, the more we are obliged to be thankful. David's deliverances were so, v. 6. David was found a praying man, and God was found a prayer-hearing God.

3. The more wonderful God's appearances are in any deliverance the greater it is: such were the deliverances wrought for David, in which God's manifestation of his presence and glorious attributes is most magnificently described, v. 7, &c. Little appeared of man, but much of God, in these deliverances. He moved even the foundations of the hills (v. 7), as of old at Mount Sinai. He showed his anger and displeasure against the enemies and persecutors of his people: He was wroth, v. 7. His wrath smoked (v. 8), and coals were kindled by it. He showed his readiness to plead his people's cause and work deliverance for them; for he rode upon a cherub and did fly, for the maintaining of right and the relieving of his distressed servants, v. 10. No opposition, no obstruction, can be given to him who rides upon the wings of the wind, who rides on the heavens, for the help of his people, and, in his excellency, on the skies. He showed his condescension, in taking cognizance of David's case: He bowed the heavens and came down (v. 9), did not send an angel, but came himself, as one afflicted in the afflictions of his people. He wrapped himself in darkness, and yet commanded light to shine out of darkness for his people, Isa. xlv. 15. He made darkness his pavilion, v. 11. His glory is invisible; we know not the way that he takes, even when he is coming towards us in ways of mercy; but, when his designs are secret, they are kind; for, though he hide himself, he is the God of Israel, the Saviour. And, at his brightness, the thick clouds pass (v. 12).

4. The greater the difficulties are that lie in the way of deliverance the more glorious the deliverance is. For the rescuing of David, the waters were to be divided till the very channels were seen; the earth was to be cloven till the very foundations of it were discovered, v. 15. There were waters deep and many, waters out of which he was to be drawn (v. 16), as Moses, who had his name from being drawn out of the water literally, as David was figuratively. His enemies were too quick for him; for they prevented him in the day of his calamity, v. 18. But, in the midst of his troubles, the Lord was his stay, so that he did not sink. Note, God will not only deliver his people out of their troubles in due time, but he will sustain them and bear them up under their troubles in the mean time.

5. That which especially magnified the deliverance was that his comfort was the fruit of it. "He brought me forth also out of my straits into a large place, where I had room, not only to turn, but to thrive in." "He delivered me because he delighted in me, not for my merit, but for his own grace and goodwill."

In singing this we may apply it to Christ the Son of David. The sorrows of death surrounded him; in his distress he prayed (Heb. v. 7); God made the earth to shake and tremble, and the rocks to cleave, and brought him out, in his resurrection, into a large place, because he delighted in him and in his undertaking.

I. David reflects with comfort upon his own integrity, and rejoices in the testimony of his conscience that he had had his conversation in godly sincerity and not with fleshly wisdom, 2 Cor. i. 12. His deliverances were an evidence of this, and this was the great comfort of his deliverances. His deliverances cleared his innocency before men, and acquitted him from those crimes which he was falsely accused of.

This he calls rewarding him according to his righteousness (v. 20, 24). They confirmed the testimony of his own conscience for him, which he here reviews with a great deal of pleasure, v. 21–23. Though we are conscious of many a stumble, and many a false step taken, yet if we recover ourselves by repentance, and go on in the way of our duty, it shall not be construed into a departure, for it is not a wicked departure, from our God. He had kept his eye upon the rule of God's commands (v. 22): All his judgments were before me.

II. He takes occasion thence to lay down the rules of God's government and judgment, that we may know not only what God expects from us, but what we may expect from him, v. 25, 26. Those that show mercy to others shall find mercy with God, Matt. v. 7. Wherever God finds an upright man, he will be found an upright God.

III. Hence he speaks comfort to the humble "Thou wilt save the afflicted people, that are wronged and bear it patiently", terror to the proud "Thou wilt bring down high looks, that aim high, and expect great things for themselves, and look with scorn and disdain upon the poor and pious", and encouragement to himself—"Thou wilt light my candle, that is, thou wilt revive and comfort my sorrowful spirit, and not leave me melancholy. Thou wilt light my candle to work by, and give me an opportunity of serving thee and the interests of thy kingdom among men."

I. David looks back, with thankfulness, upon the great things which God had done for him. When we set ourselves to praise God for one mercy we must be led by that to observe the many more with which we have been compassed about, and followed, all our days. Many things had contributed to David's advancement, and he owns the hand of God in them all, to teach us to do likewise. 1. God had given him all his skill and understanding in military affairs, which he was not bred up to nor designed for, his genius leading him more to music, and poetry, and a contemplative life: He teaches my hands to war, v. 34. 2. God had given him bodily strength to go through the business and fatigue of war: God girded him with strength (v. 32, 39) to such a degree that he could break even a bow of steel, v. 34. What service God designs men for he will be sure to fit them for. 3. God had likewise given him great swiftness, not to flee from the enemies but to fly upon them (v. 33): He makes my feet like hinds' feet, v. 36. "Thou hast enlarged my steps under me; but" (whereas those that take large steps are apt to tread awry) "my feet did not slip." 4. God had made him very bold. If a troop stood in his way, he made nothing of running through them; if a wall, he made nothing of leaping over it (v. 29); if ramparts and bulwarks, he soon mounted them, and by divine assistance set his feet upon the high places of the enemy, v. 33. 5. God had protected him, and kept him safe, in the midst of the greatest perils. "Thou hast given me the shield of thy salvation (v. 35), and that has compassed me on every side. By that I have been delivered from the strivings of the people who aimed at my destruction (v. 43), particularly from the violent man" (v. 48), that is, Saul, who more than once threw a javelin at him. 6. God had prospered him in his designs; he it was that made his way perfect (v. 32) and it was his right hand that held him up, v. 35. 7. Those whom God has abandoned are easily vanquished: Then did I beat them small as the dust, v. 42. But those whose cause is just he avenges (v. 47), and those whom he favours will certainly be lifted up above those that rise up against them, v. 48. 8. God had raised him to the throne, and not only delivered him and kept him alive but dignified him and made him great (v. 35): Thy gentleness has increased me—thy discipline and instruction; so some. The good lessons David learned in his affliction prepared him for the dignity and power that were intended him; and the lessening of him helped very much to increase his greatness.

II. David looks up with humble and reverent adorations of the divine glory and perfection. He endeavours, with his praises, to magnify God, to bless him and exalt him, v. 46. He gives honour to him, 1. As a living God: The Lord liveth, v. 46. The gods of the heathen were dead gods. But God lives, lives for ever, and will not fail those that trust in him, but, because he lives, they shall live also; for he is their life. 2. As a finishing God: As for God, he is not only perfect himself, but his way is perfect, v. 30. What God begins to build he is able to finish. 3. As a faithful God: The word of the Lord is tried. "I have tried it" (says David), "and it has not failed me." David, in God's providences concerning him, takes notice of the performance of his promises to him, which, as it puts sweetness into the providence, so it puts honour upon the promise. 4. As the protector and defender of his people. David had found him so to him: "He is the God of my salvation (v. 46), by whose power and grace I am and hope to be saved; but not of mine only: he is a buckler to all those that trust in him (v. 30); he shelters and protects them all, is both able and ready to do so."

III. David looks forward, with a believing hope that God would still do him good. He promises himself his enemies should be completely subdued, and that his government should be extensive, so that even a people whom he had not known should serve him (v. 43). As soon as they hear of me they shall obey me, v. 44. His seed should be for ever continued in the Messiah, who, he foresaw, should come from his loins, v. 50. He shows mercy to his anointed, his Messiah, to David himself, the anointed of the God of Jacob in the type, and to his seed for evermore.

PSALM XIX

There are two excellent books which the great God has published for the instruction and edification of the children of men; this psalm treats of them both, and recommends them both to our diligent study. I. The book of the creatures, in which we may easily read the power and godhead of the Creator, ver. 1–6. II. The book of the scriptures, which makes known to us the will of God concerning our duty. He shows the excellency and usefulness of that book (ver. 7–11) and then teaches us how to improve it, ver. 12–14.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

From the things that are seen every day by all the world the psalmist, in these verses, leads us to the consideration of the invisible things of God, whose glory shines transcendently bright in the visible heavens, the structure and beauty of them, and the order and influence of the heavenly bodies. This instance of the divine power serves not only to show the folly of atheists, who see there is a heaven and yet say, "There is no God," who see the effect and yet say, "There is no cause," but to show the folly of idolaters also, and the vanity of their imagination, who, though the heavens declare the glory of God, yet gave that glory to the lights of heaven which those very lights directed them to give to God only, the Father of lights.

I. What that is which the creatures notify to us. They are in many ways useful and serviceable to us, but in nothing so much as in this, that they declare the glory of God, by showing his handiworks, v. 1. They plainly speak themselves to be God's handiworks; all succession and motion must have had a beginning; they could not make themselves, that is a contradiction; they could not be produced by a casual hit of atoms, that is an absurdity, fit rather to be bantered than reasoned with: therefore they must have a Creator, who can be no other than an eternal mind, infinitely wise, powerful, and good. From the excellency of the work we may easily infer the infinite perfection of its great author. From the brightness of the heavens we may collect that the Creator is light; their vastness of extent bespeaks his immensity, their height his transcendency and sovereignty, their influence upon this earth his dominion, and providence, and universal beneficence: and all declare his almighty power.

II. What are some of those things which notify this? 1. The heavens and the firmament—the vast expanse of air and ether, and the spheres of the planets and fixed stars. Man has this advantage above the beasts, in the structure of his body, that whereas they are made to look downwards, as their spirits must go, he is made erect, to look upwards, because upwards his spirit must shortly go and his thoughts should now rise. 2. The constant and regular succession of day and night (v. 2): Day unto day, and night unto night, speak the glory of that God who first divided between the light and the darkness. He not only glorifies himself, but gratifies us, by this constant revolution; for, as the light of the morning befriends the business of the day, so the shadows of the evening befriend the repose of the night; every day and every night speak the goodness of God, and, when they have finished their testimony, leave it to the next day, to the next night, to say the same. 3. The light and influence of the sun do, in a special manner, declare the glory of God; for of all the heavenly bodies that is the most conspicuous in itself and most useful to this lower world, which would be all dungeon, and all desert, without it. In the heavens God has set a tabernacle for the sun. The heavenly bodies are called hosts of heaven, and therefore are fitly said to dwell in tents, as soldiers in their encampments. That glorious creature was not made to be idle, but his going forth (at least as it appears to our eye) is from one point of the heavens, and his circuit thence to the opposite point, and thence (to complete his diurnal revolution) to the same point again; and this with such steadiness and constancy that we can certainly foretell the hour and the minute at which the sun will rise at such a place, any day to come. The brightness wherein he appears. He is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, richly dressed and adorned, as fine as hands can make him, looking pleasantly himself and making all about him pleasant. The cheerfulness wherewith he makes his tour. For the service of man he rejoices as a strong man to run a race.

III. To whom this declaration is made of the glory of God. It is made to all parts of the world (v. 3, 4): There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard. Their line has gone through all the earth (the equinoctial line suppose) and with it their words to the end of the world, proclaiming the eternal power of the God of nature, v. 4. They have no speech or language (so some read it) and yet their voice is heard. All people may hear these natural immortal preachers speak to them in their own tongue the wonderful works of God.

God's glory (that is, his goodness to man) appears much in the works of creation, but much more in and by divine revelation. The holy scripture, as it is a rule both of our duty to God and of our expectation from him, is of much greater use and benefit to us than day or night, than the air we breathe in, or the light of the sun.

I. The psalmist gives an account of the excellent properties and uses of the word of God, in six sentences (v. 7–9), in each of which the name Jehovah is repeated. Here are six several titles of the word of God, to take in the whole of divine revelation, precepts, and promises, and especially the gospel. 1. The law of the Lord is perfect. It is perfectly free from all corruption, perfectly filled with all good, and perfectly fitted for the end for which it is designed, 2 Tim. iii. 17. Nothing is to be added to it nor taken from it. It is of use to convert the soul, to bring us back to ourselves, to our God, to our duty. 2. The testimony of the Lord is sure. It is a sure fountain of living comforts and a sure foundation of lasting hopes. It will make even the simple wise for their souls and eternity. Those that are humbly simple, sensible of their own folly and willing to be taught, shall be made wise by the word of God, xxv. 9. 3. The statutes of the Lord are right, exactly agreeing with the eternal rules and principles of good and evil. Because they are right, they rejoice the heart. The law, as we see it in the hands of Christ, gives cause for joy; and, when it is written in our hearts, it lays a foundation for lasting joy, by restoring us to our right mind. 4. The commandment of the Lord is pure. It is the ordinary means which the Spirit uses in enlightening the eyes; it brings us to a sight and sense of our sin and misery, and directs us in the way of duty. 5. The fear of the Lord will cleanse our way, cxix. 9. And it endureth for ever. The ceremonial law is long since done away, but the law concerning the fear of God is ever the same. Time will not alter the nature of moral good and evil. 6. The judgments of the Lord (all his precepts, which are framed in infinite wisdom) are true altogether. They are all of a piece.

II. He expresses the great value he had for the word of God, and the great advantage he had, and hoped to have, from it, v. 10, 11. He prized the commandments of God before all the wealth of the world. Gold is of the earth, earthly; but grace is the image of the heavenly. Gold is only for the body and the concerns of time; but grace is for the soul and the concerns of eternity. The word of God, received by faith, is sweet to the soul, sweeter than honey and the honeycomb. The pleasures of sense are deceitful, will soon surfeit, and yet never satisfiy; but those of religion are substantial and satisfying, and there is no danger of exceeding in them. The word of God is a word of warning to the children of men; it warns us of the duty we are to do, the dangers we are to avoid. There is a reward, not only after keeping, but in keeping, God's commandments, a present great reward of obedience in obedience.

III. The excellency of the word of God.

1. He takes occasion to make a penitent reflection upon his sins; for by the law is the knowledge of sin. "Is the commandment thus holy, just, and good? Then who can understand his errors? I cannot, whoever can." From the rectitude of the divine law he learns to call his sins his errors. Every transgression of the commandment is an error, a deviation from the rule we are to work by. God knows a great deal more evil of us than we do of ourselves.

2. He takes occasion hence to pray against sin. Finding himself unable to specify all the particulars of his transgressions, he cries out, Lord, cleanse me from my secret faults; not secret to God, so none are, nor only such as were secret to the world, but such as were hidden from his own observation of himself. Having prayed that his sins of infirmity might be pardoned, he prays that presumptuous sins might be prevented, v. 13. His plea: "So shall I be upright; and I shall be innocent from the great transgression"; so he calls a presumptuous sin, because no sacrifice was accepted for it, Num. xv. 28–30.

3. He takes occasion humbly to beg the divine acceptance of his thoughts and affections, v. 14, and then begs he would accept his performances. His services were—the words of his mouth and the meditations of his heart, his holy affections offered up to God. His care that they might be acceptable with God; for, if our services be not acceptable to God, what do they avail us?

PSALM XX

This psalm is a prayer, and the next a thanksgiving, for the king. In this psalm we may observe, I. What it is they beg of God for the king, ver. 1–4. II. With what assurance they beg it. The people triumph (ver. 5), the prince (ver. 6), both together (ver. 7, 8), and so he concludes with a prayer to God for audience, ver. 9.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

This prayer for David is entitled a psalm of David. It is very proper for those who desire the prayers of their friends to tell them particularly what they would have to be asked of God for them. Paul often begged of his friends to pray for him.

I. What it is that they are taught to ask of God for the king. The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble (v. 1), and the Lord fulfil all thy petitions, v. 5. It was often a day of trouble with David himself, of disappointment and distress, of treading down and of perplexity. Neither the crown on his head nor the grace in his heart would exempt him from trouble. The prayers of others for us must be desired, not to supersede, but to second, our own for ourselves. "The name of the God of Jacob defend thee, and set thee out of the reach of thy enemies." Mercies out of the sanctuary are the sweetest mercies, v. 2. The Lord remember all thy offerings and accept thy burnt-sacrifices (v. 3) or turn them to ashes; that is, "The Lord give thee the victory and success which thou didst by prayer with sacrifices ask of him, and thereby give as full proof of his acceptance of the sacrifice as ever he did by kindling it with fire from heaven." By this we may now know that God accepts our spiritual sacrifices, if by his Spirit he kindles in our souls a holy fire of pious and divine affection and with that makes our hearts burn within us. The Lord grant thee according to thy own heart. This they might in faith pray for, because they knew David was a man after God's own heart, and would design nothing but what was pleasing to him.

II. What confidence they had of an answer of peace to these petitions for themselves and their good king (v. 5): "We will rejoice in thy salvation. We that are subjects will rejoice in the preservation and prosperity of our prince." In the name of our God will we set up our banners. These prayers for David are prophecies concerning Christ the Son of David, and in him they were abundantly answered; he undertook the work of our redemption, and made war upon the powers of darkness. In the day of trouble, when his soul was exceedingly sorrowful, the Lord heard him, heard him in that he feared (Heb. v. 7), sent him help out of the sanctuary.

I. Holy David himself triumphs in the interest he had in the prayers of good people (v. 6): "Now know I that the Lord saveth his anointed, because he hath stirred up the hearts of the seed of Jacob to pray for him." He will hear him from his holy heaven, of which the sanctuary was a type (Heb. ix. 23), from the throne he hath prepared in heaven, of which the mercy-seat was a type. He will hear him with the saving strength of his right hand; not by letter, nor by word of mouth, but by his right hand, by the saving strength of his right hand. He will make it to appear that he hears him by what he does for him.

II. His people triumph in God and their relation to him, and his revelation of himself to them. The children of this world trust in second causes, and think all is well if those do but smile upon them; they trust in chariot and in horses, and the more of them they can bring into the field the more sure they are of success in their wars. "But," say the Israelites, "we will not trust in chariots and horses to trust to nor do we think them, nor, if we had them, would we build our hopes of success upon that; but we will remember, and rely upon, the name of the Lord our God. Those that trusted in their chariots and horses are brought down and fallen, and their chariots and horses were so far from saving them that they helped to sink them, and made them the easier and the richer prey to the conqueror, 2 Sam. viii. 4. But we that trust in the name of the Lord our God not only stand upright, and keep our ground, but have risen, and have got ground against the enemy, and have triumphed over them.

III. They conclude their prayer for the king with a Hosanna, "Save now, we beseech thee, O Lord!" v. 9. As we read this verse, it may be taken as a prayer that God would not only bless the king, "Save, Lord, give him success," but that he would make him a blessing to them, "Let the king hear us when we call to him for justice and mercy." Those that would have good of their magistrates must thus pray for them, for they, as all other creatures, are that to us (and no more) which God makes them to be.

PSALM XXI

As the foregoing psalm was a prayer for the king that God would protect and prosper him, so this is a thanksgiving for the success God had blessed him with. They are here taught, I. To congratulate him on his victories, and the honour he had achieved, ver. 1–6. II. To confide in the power of God for the completing of the ruin of the enemies of his kingdom, ver. 7–13.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

David here speaks professing that his joy was in God's strength and in his salvation, and not in the strength or success of his armies. He also directs his subjects herein to rejoice with him, and to give God all the glory of the victories he had obtained. They congratulate the king on his joys: "The king rejoices, and so do we." They give God all the praise of those things which were the matter of their king's rejoicing. Thou hast given him his heart's desire. Thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness. The psalmist here reckons that these blessings were given in a preventing way. When God's blessings come sooner and prove richer than we imagine, when they are given before we prayed for them, before we were ready for them, nay, when we feared the contrary, then it may be truly said that he prevented us with them. "Thou hast set a crown of pure gold upon his head and kept it there, when his enemies attempted to throw it off." When he went forth upon a perilous expedition he asked his life of thee, and thou not only gavest him that, but withal gavest him length of days for ever and ever, didst not only prolong his life far beyond his expectation, but didst assure him of a blessed immortality in a future state and of the continuance of his kingdom in the Messiah that should come of his loins. "His glory is great, far transcending that of all the neighbouring princes, in the salvation thou hast wrought for him and by him." The glory which every good man is ambitious of is to see the salvation of the Lord. God had given him the satisfaction of being the channel of all bliss to mankind (v. 6): "Thou hast set him to be blessings for ever" (so the margin reads it), "thou has made him to be a universal everlasting blessing to the world, in whom the families of the earth are, and shall be, blessed." See how the spirit of prophecy gradually rises here to that which is peculiar to Christ, for none besides is blessed for ever, much less a blessing for ever.

The psalmist, having taught his people to look back with joy and praise on what God had done for them, here teaches them to look forward with faith, and hope, and prayer, upon what God would further do for them: The king rejoices in God (v. 1), and therefore we will be thankful; the king trusteth in God (v. 7), therefore will we be encouraged. The joy and confidence of Christ our King is the ground of all our joy and confidence.

I. They are confident of the stability of David's kingdom. Through the mercy of the Most High, and not through his own merit or strength, he shall not be moved.

II. They are confident of the destruction of all the impenitent implacable enemies of David's kingdom. The success with which God had blessed David's arms hitherto was an earnest of the rest which God would give him from all his enemies round about. They hated David because God had set him apart for himself, hated Christ because they hated the light; but both were hated without any just cause, and in both God was hated, John xv. 23, 25. They intended evil against thee, and imagined a mischievous device; they pretended to fight against David only, but their enmity was against God himself. Those that aimed to un-king David aimed, in effect, to un-God Jehovah. "They devise what they are not able to perform," v. 11. Their malice is impotent, and they imagine a vain thing, ii. 1. The discovery of them (v. 8): "Thy hand shall find them out. Though ever so artfully disguised by the pretences and professions of friendship, though mingled with the faithful subjects of this kingdom and hardly to be distinguished from them, though flying from justice and absconding in their close places, yet thy hand shall find them out wherever they are." Their fruit and their seed shall be destroyed, v. 10.

III. In this confidence they beg of God that he would still appear for his anointed (v. 13), that he would act for him in his own strength, by the immediate operations of his power as Lord of hosts and Father of spirits.

PSALM XXII

The Spirit of Christ, which was in the prophets, testifies in this psalm, as clearly and fully as any where in all the Old Testament, "the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow" (1 Pet. i. 11); of him, no doubt, David here speaks, and not of himself, or any other man. Much of it is expressly applied to Christ in the New Testament, all of it may be applied to him, and some of it must be understood of him only. I. Of the humiliation of Christ (ver. 1–21). 1. He complains, and mixes comforts with his complaints; he complains (ver. 1, 2), but comforts himself (ver. 3–5), complains again (ver. 6–8), but comforts himself again, ver. 9, 10. 2. He complains, and mixes prayers with his complaints; he complains of the power and rage of his enemies (ver. 12, 13, 16, 18), of his bodily weakness and decay (ver. 14, 15, 17); but prays that God would not be far from him, (ver. 11, 19), that he would save and deliver him, ver. 19–21. II. Of the exaltation of Christ, that his undertaking should be for the glory of God (ver. 22–25), for the salvation and joy of his people (ver. 26–29), and for the perpetuating of his own kingdom, ver. 30, 31. In singing this psalm we must keep our thoughts fixed upon Christ.

To the chief musician upon Aijeleth Shahar. A psalm of David.

I. A sad complaint of God's withdrawings, v. 1, 2.

1. This may be applied to David, or any other child of God, apprehending himself forsaken of God, unhelped, unheard, yet calling him, again and again, "My God," and continuing to cry day and night earnestly desiring his gracious return. Spiritual desertions are the saints' sorest afflictions. To cry out, "My God, why am I sick? Why am I poor?" would give cause to suspect discontent and worldliness. But, Why hast thou forsaken me? is the language of a heart binding up its happiness in God's favour. When we want the faith of assurance we must live by a faith of adherence. "However it be, yet God is good, and he is mine; though he slay me, yet will I trust in him."

2. But it must be applied to Christ; for, in the first words of this complaint, he poured out his soul before God when he was upon the cross (Matt. xxvii. 46); and, some think, repeated the whole psalm, if not aloud yet to himself. Christ, in his sufferings, cried earnestly to his Father in the daytime, upon the cross, and in the night season, when he was in his agony in the garden. But, Christ having made himself sin for us, in conformity thereunto the Father laid him under the present impressions of his wrath and displeasure against sin. It pleased the Lord to bruise him and put him to grief, Isa. liii. 10.

II. Encouragement taken, in reference hereunto, v. 3–5. "But thou art holy, not unjust, untrue, nor unkind, in any of thy dispensations. Though thou dost not immediately come in to the relief of thy afflicted people, yet thou lovest them, art true to thy covenant with them, and dost not countenance the iniquity of their persecutors, Hab. i. 13. Thou inhabitest the praises of Israel; thou art pleased to manifest thy glory, and grace, and special presence with thy people, in the sanctuary, where they attend thee with their praises. There thou art always ready to receive their homage, and of the tabernacle of meeting thou hast said, This is my rest for ever." Though God seem, for a while, to turn a deaf ear yet he is so well pleased with his people's praises that he will, in due time, give them cause to change their note: Hope in God, for I shall yet praise him. He will take comfort from the experiences which the saints in former ages had of the benefit of faith and prayer (v. 4, 5): "Our fathers trusted in thee, cried unto thee, and thou didst deliver them; therefore thou wilt, in due time, deliver me, for never any that hoped in thee were made ashamed of their hope, never any that sought thee sought thee in vain. And thou art still the same in thyself."

III. The complaint renewed of another grievance, and that is the contempt and reproach of men. This complaint is by no means so bitter as that before of God's withdrawings; but, as that touches a gracious soul, so this a generous soul, in a very tender part, v. 6–8. Man, at the best, is a worm; but he became a worm, and no man. If he had not made himself a worm, he could not have been trampled upon as he was. He was reproached as a bad man, as a blasphemer, a sabbath-breaker, a wine-bibber, a false prophet, an enemy to Caesar, a confederate with the prince of the devils. He was despised of the people as a mean contemptible man, not worth taking notice of, his country in no repute, his relations poor mechanics, his followers none of the rulers, or the Pharisees, but the mob. He was ridiculed as a foolish man, and one that not only deceived others, but himself too. David was sometimes taunted for his confidence in God; but in the sufferings of Christ this was literally and exactly fulfilled. He trusted in God; let him deliver him.

IV. Encouragement taken as to this also (v. 9, 10): Men despise me, but thou art he that took me out of the womb. David and other good men have often, for direction to us, encouraged themselves with this, that God was not only the God of their fathers, as before (v. 4) but the God of their infancy, who began betimes to take care of them, as soon as they had a being, and therefore, they hope, will never cast them off. He that did so well for us in that helpless useless state will not leave us when he has reared us and nursed us up into some capacity of serving him. See the early instances of God's providential care for us: He took us also out of the womb, else we had died there, or been stifled in the birth. "Then didst thou make me hope"; that is, "thou didst that for me, in providing sustenance for me and protecting me from the dangers to which I was exposed, which encourages me to hope in thee all my days." The blessings of the breasts, as they crown the blessings of the womb, so they are earnests of the blessings of our whole lives; surely he that fed us then will never starve us, Job iii. 12. I was cast upon thee from the womb, which perhaps refers to his circumcision on the eighth day; he was then by his parents committed and given up to God as his God in covenant; for circumcision was a seal of the covenant; and this encouraged him to trust in God. In the experience we have had of God's goodness to us all along ever since, drawn out in a constant uninterrupted series of preservations and supplies: Thou art my God, providing for me and watching over me for good, from my mother's belly, that is, from my coming into the world unto this day. This is applicable to our Lord Jesus, over whose incarnation and birth the divine Providence watched with a peculiar care, when he was born in a stable, laid in a manger, and immediately exposed to the malice of Herod, and forced to flee into Egypt.

1. Here is Christ suffering. David indeed was often in trouble, and beset with enemies; but many of the particulars here specified are such as were never true of David, and therefore must be appropriated to Christ in the depth of his humiliation.

1. He is here deserted by his friends: Trouble and distress are near, and there is none to help, none to uphold, v. 11. He trod the wine-press alone; for all his disciples forsook him and fled.

2. He is here insulted and surrounded by his enemies, who, for their strength and fury, are compared to bulls, strong bulls of Bashan (v. 12), such were the chief priests and elders that persecuted Christ; and others who are compared to dogs (v. 16), filthy and greedy, and unwearied in running him down. There was an assembly of the wicked plotting against him (v. 16); for the chief priests sat in council, to consult of ways and means to take Christ. They have enclosed me, v. 16. They are formidable and threatening (v. 13): They gaped upon me with their mouths, to show me that they would swallow me up.

3. He is here crucified. The very manner of his death is described, though never in use among the Jews: They pierced my hands and my feet (v. 16), which were nailed to the accursed tree.

4. He is here dying (v. 14, 15), dying in pain and anguish, because he was to satisfy for sin. I am poured out like water. My heart is like wax. My strength is dried up. My tongue cleaveth to my jaws. "Thou hast brought me to the dust of death; I am just ready to drop into the grave"; for nothing less would satisfy divine justice. The life of the sinner was forfeited, and therefore the life of the sacrifice must be the ransom for it. The sentence of death passed upon Adam was thus expressed: Unto dust thou shalt return. And therefore Christ, in his obedience to death, here uses a similar expression: Thou hast brought me to the dust of death.

5. He was stripped. The shame of nakedness was the immediate consequence of sin; and therefore our Lord Jesus was stripped of his clothes, when he was crucified, that he might clothe us with the robe of his righteousness, and that the shame of our nakedness might not appear. Now here we are told, (1) How his body looked when it was thus stripped: I may tell all my bones, v. 17. They look and stare upon me, "the standers by, the passers by, are amazed to see my bones start out thus; and, instead of pitying me, are pleased even with such a rueful spectacle." (2) What they did with his clothes, which they took from him (v. 18): They part my garments among them, to ever soldier a part, and upon my vesture, the seamless coat, do they cast lots. This very circumstance was exactly fulfilled, John xix. 23, 24. And, though it was no great instance of Christ's suffering, yet it is a great instance of the fulfilling of the scripture in him. Thus it was written, and therefore thus it behoved Christ to suffer.

II. Christ, in his agony, prayed that the cup might pass from him. And of that David's praying here was a type. He calls God his strength, v. 19. He prays, Be thou not far from me (v. 11), and again, v. 19. "Whoever stands aloof from my sore, Lord, do not thou." And the Father heard him in that he feared (Heb. v. 7) and enabled him to go through with his work. The psalmist here calls his soul his darling, his only one (so the word is): "My soul is my only one. I have but one soul to take care of, and therefore the greater is my shame if I neglect it." He prays to be delivered, from the sword, the flaming sword of divine wrath, which turns every way. "O deliver my soul from that. Lord, though I lose my life, let me not lose thy love. Save me from the power of the dog, and from the lion's mouth." This seems to be meant of Satan, that old enemy. "Lord, save me from being overpowered by his terrors." He pleads, "Thou hast formerly heard me from the horns of the unicorn," that is, "saved me from him in answer to my prayer." Has God delivered us from the horns of the unicorn, that we be not tossed? Let that encourage us to hope that we shall be delivered from the lion's mouth, that we be not torn. This prayer of Christ was answered, for the Father suffered him not to see corruption, but, the third day, raised him out of the dust of death, which was a greater instance of God's favour to him than if he had helped him down from the cross; for that would have hindered his undertaking, whereas his resurrection crowned it.

Verses 22-30

As the first words of the complaint were used by Christ himself upon the cross, so the first words of the triumph are expressly applied to him (Heb. ii. 12) and are made his own words: I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midst of the church will I sing praise unto thee.

Five things are here spoken of the satisfaction and triumph of Christ in his sufferings:—

I. That he should have a church in the world. This is implied here; that he should see his seed, Isa. liii. 10. By the declaring of God's name, by the preaching of the everlasting gospel in its plainness and purity, many should be effectually called to him and to God by him. Those who are thus called in should be brought into a very near and dear relation to him as his brethren; not the believing Jews only, but those of the Gentiles also who became fellow-heirs and of the same body, Heb. ii. 11. These his brethren should be incorporated into a great congregation; such is the universal church, the whole family that is named from him, into which all the children of God that were scattered abroad are collected, and in which they are united (John xi. 52, Eph. i. 10), and that they should also be incorporated into smaller societies, members of that great body. These should be accounted the seed of Jacob and Israel (v. 23), that on them, though Gentiles, the blessing of Abraham might come (Gal. iii. 14). The gospel church is called the Israel of God, Gal. vi. 16.

II. That God should be greatly honoured and glorified in him by that church. He foresees with pleasure, 1. That God would be glorified by the church that should be gathered to him. All that fear the Lord will praise him (v. 23), even every Israelite indeed. See cxviii. 2–4; cxxxv. 19, 20. 2. That God would be glorified in the Redeemer and in his undertaking. Therefore Christ is said to praise God in the church. All our praises must centre in the work of redemption.

III. That all humble gracious souls should have a full satisfaction and happiness in him, v. 26. Those that are much in praying shall be much in thanksgiving: Those shall praise the Lord that seek him, because through Christ they are sure of finding him, in the hopes of which they have reason to praise him even while they are seeking him. The souls that are devoted to him shall be for ever happy with him: "Your heart shall live for ever."

IV. That the church of Christ, and with it the kingdom of God among men, should extend itself to all corners of the earth (v. 27, 28). Whereas the Jews had long been the only professing people of God, now all the ends of the world should come into the church, and, the partition-wall being taken down, the Gentiles should be taken in. It is here prophesied, they should be converted: They shall remember, and turn to the Lord. Serious reflection is the first step, and a good step it is, towards true conversion. We must consider and turn. The prodigal came first to himself, and then to his father. Then they should be admitted into communion with God and with the assemblies that serve him: They shall worship before thee, for in every place incense shall be offered to God, Mal. i. 11; Isa. lxvi. 23. For (v. 28) the kingdom is the Lord's. 1. The kingdom of nature is the Lord Jehovah's, and his providence rules among the nations. 2. The kingdom of grace is the Lord Christ's, and he, as Mediator, is appointed governor among the nations, head over all things to his church. High and low, rich and poor, bond and free, meet in Christ. Christ shall have the homage of many of the great ones. Those that are fat upon the earth, that shall eat and worship. The poor also shall receive his gospel: Those that go down to the dust, that sit in the dust (cxiii. 7), that can scarcely keep life and soul together, shall bow before him, before the Lord Jesus, who reckons it his honour to be the poor man's King (lxxii. 12). Seeing we cannot keep alive our own souls, it is our wisdom, by an obedient faith, to commit our souls to Jesus Christ, who is able to save them and keep them alive for ever.

V. That the church of Christ, and with it the kingdom of God among men, should continue through all the ages of time. A seed shall serve him; there shall be a remnant, enough to preserve the entail. They shall be accounted to him for a generation; he will be the same to them that he was to those who went before them. They shall come, shall rise up in their day, not only to keep up the virtue of the generation that is past, but to serve the welfare of souls in the generations to come; they shall transmit to them the gospel of Christ.

In singing this we must triumph in the name of Christ, rejoice in the honours others do him, and in the assurance we have that there shall be a people praising him on earth when we are praising him in heaven.

PSALM XXIII

A psalm which has been sung by good Christians, and will be while the world stands, with a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction. I. The psalmist here claims relation to God, as his shepherd, ver. 1. II. He recounts his experience of the kind things God had done for him as his shepherd, ver. 2, 3, 5. III. Hence he infers that he should want no good (ver. 1), that he needed to fear no evil (ver. 4), that God would never leave nor forsake him in a way of mercy; and therefore he resolves never to leave nor forsake God in a way of duty, ver. 6. And, as in the foregoing psalm he represented Christ dying for his sheep, so here he represents Christians receiving the benefit of all the care and tenderness of that great and good shepherd.

I. From God's being his shepherd he infers that he shall not want anything that is good for him, v. 1. Time was when David was himself a shepherd; he was taken from following the ewes great with young (lxxviii. 70, 71), and so he knew by experience the cares and tender affections of a good shepherd towards his flock. He remembered what need they had of a shepherd, and he once ventured his life to rescue a lamb. By this therefore he illustrates God's care of his people; and to this our Saviour seems to refer when he says, I am the shepherd of the sheep; the good shepherd, John x. 11. He takes them into his fold, and provides for them. We must know the shepherd's voice, and follow him. When David considers that God is his shepherd, he can boldly say, I shall not want. More is implied than is expressed, not only, I shall not want, but, "I shall be supplied with whatever I need; and, if I have not everything I desire, I may conclude it is either not fit for me or not good for me, or I shall have it in due time."

II. From his performing the office of a good shepherd to him he infers that he needs not fear any evil in the greatest dangers and difficulties he could be in, v. 2–4. See the happiness of the saints as the sheep of God's pasture. (1) They are well placed, well laid: He maketh me to lie down in green pastures. We have the comforts of this life from God's good hand, our daily bread from him as our Father. The greatest abundance is but a dry pasture to a wicked man, who relishes that only in it which pleases the senses; but to a godly man, who tastes the goodness of God in all his enjoyments, though he has but little of the world, it is a green pasture, xxxvii. 16; Prov. xv. 16, 17. God makes his saints to lie down; he gives them quiet and contentment in their own minds, whatever their lot is; their souls dwell at ease in him, and that makes every pasture green. (2) They are well guided, well led. He leadeth me beside the still waters. Those that feed on God's goodness must follow his direction; he directs their eye, their way, and their heart, into his love. God provides for his people not only food and rest, but refreshment also and pleasure. God leads his people, not to the standing waters which corrupt and gather filth, nor to the troubled sea, nor to the rapid rolling floods, but to the silent purling waters; for the still but running waters agree best with those spirits that flow out towards God and yet do it silently. He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness, in the way of my duty; in that he instructs me by his word and directs me by conscience and providence. The way of duty is the truly pleasant way. In these paths we cannot walk unless God both lead us into them and lead us in them. (3) They are well helped when anything ails them: He restoreth my soul. When, after one sin, David's heart smote him, and, after another, Nathan was sent to tell him, Thou art the man, God restored his soul. Though God may suffer his people to fall into sin, he will not suffer them to lie still in it. "Having had such experience of God's goodness to me all my days, in six troubles and in seven, I will never distrust him, no, not in the last extremity." "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, that is, though I am in peril of death, though in the midst of dangers, deep as a valley, yet I am easy." But, even in the supposition of the distress, there are four words which lessen the terror. It is but the shadow of death; there is no substantial evil in it; the shadow of a serpent will not sting nor the shadow of a sword kill. It is the valley of the shadow, deep indeed, and dark, and dirty; but the valleys are fruitful, and so is death itself fruitful of comforts to God's people. It is but a walk in this valley, a gentle pleasant walk. It is a walk through it; they shall not be lost in this valley, but get safely to the mountain of spices on the other side of it. There is no evil in it to a child of God; death cannot separate us from the love of God; it kills the body, but cannot touch the soul. The good shepherd will not only conduct, but convoy, his sheep through this valley. His presence shall comfort them: Thou art with me. His word and Spirit shall comfort them—his rod and staff, alluding to the shepherd's crook, or the rod under which the sheep passed when they were counted (Lev. xxvii. 32), or the staff with which the shepherds drove away the dogs that would worry the sheep.

III. From the good gifts of God's bounty to him now he infers the constancy and perpetuity of his mercy, v. 5, 6. "Thou preparest a table before me; thou hast provided for me all things requisite both for body and soul, for time and eternity": food convenient, a table spread, a cup filled, meat for his hunger, drink for his thirst. "My cup runs over, enough for myself and my friends too." Thou anointest my head with oil. He had said (v. 1), I shall not want; but now he speaks more positively, Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life. His hope rises, and his faith is strengthened, by being exercised. It shall follow me, as the water out of the rock followed the camp of Israel through the wilderness. It shall follow me all my life long, even to the last; for whom God loves he loves to the end. Surely it shall. "Goodness and mercy having followed me all the days of my life on this earth, when that is ended I shall remove to a better world, to dwell in the house of the Lord for ever, in our Father's house above, where there are many mansions."

PSALM XXIV

This psalm is concerning the kingdom of Jesus Christ, I His providential kingdom, by which he rules the world, ver. 1, 2. II. The kingdom of his grace, by which he rules in his church. 1. Concerning the subjects of that kingdom, their character (ver. 4, 6), their charter, ver. 5. 2. Concerning the King of that kingdom; and a summons to all to give him admission, ver. 7–10.

I. We are not to think that the heavens, even the heavens only, are the Lord's, and that this earth, being so small and inconsiderable a part of the creation, is neglected, and that he claims no interest in it. No, even the earth is his. 1. When God gave the earth to the children of men he still reserved to himself the property, and only let it out to them as tenants: The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof. The mines, the fruits it produces, all the beasts of the forest and the cattle upon a thousand hills, our lands and houses, and all the improvements that are made of this earth by the skill and industry of man, are all his. These indeed, in the kingdom of grace, are justly looked upon as emptiness; for they are vanity of vanities, nothing to a soul; but, in the kingdom of providence, they are fulness. The earth is full of God's riches, so is the great and wide sea also. 2. The habitable part of this earth (Prov. viii. 31) is his in a special manner—the world and those that dwell therein. We ourselves are not our own, our bodies, our souls, are not.

II. The earth is his by an indisputable title, for he hath founded it upon the seas and established it upon the floods, v. 2. He made it and fitted it for the use of man. The matter is his, for he made it out of nothing; the form is his, for he made it according to the eternal counsels and ideas of his own mind. He continues it, he has established it, fixed it, so that, though one generation passes and another comes, the earth abides, Eccles. i. 4. And his providence is a continued creation, cxix. 90.

From this world, and the fulness thereof, the psalmist's meditations rise, of a sudden, to the great things of another world, the foundation of which is not on the seas, nor on the floods.

I. This earth is God's footstool; we must be here but a while, must shortly go hence, and Who then shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? Who shall go to heaven hereafter, and, as an earnest of that, have communion with God in holy ordinances now? A soul that knows and considers its own nature, origin, and immortality, when it has viewed the earth and the fulness thereof, will sit down unsatisfied; "What shall I do to rise to that high place, that hill, where the Lord dwells, that I may abide in that happy holy place where he meets his people?"

II. An answer to this enquiry. The properties of God's peculiar people, who shall have communion with him in grace and glory. They are such as keep themselves from all the gross acts of sin. They have clean hands. The hands lifted up in prayer must be pure hands, no blot of unjust gain cleaving to them, nor anything else that defiles the man and is offensive to the holy God. They are such as make conscience of being inwardly good as they seem to be outwardly. They have pure hearts. That is a pure heart which is sincere, purified by faith, and conformed to the image and will of God; see Matt. v. 8. They are such as do not set their affections upon the things of this world, do not lift up their souls unto vanity. They are such as deal honestly both with God and man. They are a praying people (v. 6): This is the generation of those that seek him. In every age there is a remnant of such as these, men of this character, who are accounted to the Lord for a generation, xxii. 30. It is to the hill of the Lord that we must ascend, and, the way being up-hill, we have need to put forth ourselves to the utmost, as those that seek diligently. They join themselves to the people of God, to seek God with them. They seek God's face, as Jacob, who was therefore surnamed Israel, because he wrestled with God and prevailed, sought him and found him. As soon as ever Paul was converted he joined himself to the disciples, Acts ix. 26. Thy face, O God of Jacob! so our margin supplies it, and makes it easy. They shall be made truly and for ever happy. They shall be justified and sanctified. These are the spiritual blessings in heavenly things which they shall receive, even righteousness, the very thing they hunger and thirst after, Matt. v. 6. They shall be saved; for God himself will be the God of their salvation.

What is spoken once is spoken a second time; such repetitions are usual in songs. Entrance once and again demanded for the King of glory; the doors and gates are to be thrown open. Who is this King of glory? It is the Lord, strong and mighty, the Lord, mighty in battle, the Lord of hosts, v. 8, 10.

I. This splendid entry here described probably refers to the solemn bringing in of the ark into the tent David pitched for it or the temple Solomon built for it; for, when David prepared materials for the building of it, it was proper for him to prepare a psalm for the dedication of it. The doors are called everlasting doors, because much more durable than the door of the tabernacle, which was but a curtain. God, in his word and ordinances, is thus to be welcomed by us. The doors and gates must be thrown open to him.

II. Doubtless it points at Christ, of whom the ark, with the mercy-seat, was a type. We may apply it to the ascension of Christ into heaven and the welcome given to him there. The gates of heaven must then be opened to him, those doors that may be truly called everlasting. Our Redeemer found them shut, but, having by his blood made atonement for sin and gained a title to enter into the holy place (Heb. ix. 12), as one having authority, he demanded entrance, not for himself only, but for us; for, as the forerunner, he has for us entered and opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. We may apply it to Christ's entrance into the souls of men by his word and Spirit, that they may be his temples. Christ's presence in them is like that of the ark in the temple; it sanctifies them. Behold, he stands at the door and knocks, Rev. iii. 20. It is required that the gates and doors of the heart be opened to him, not only as admission is given to a guest, but as possession is delivered to the rightful owner. This is the gospel call and demand, that we let Jesus Christ, the King of glory, come into our souls, and welcome him with hosannas, Blessed is he that cometh.

PSALM XXV

This psalm is full of devout affection to God, the out-goings of holy desires towards his favour and grace and the lively actings of faith in his promises. We may learn out of it, I. What it is to pray, ver. 1, 15. II. What we must pray for, the pardon of sin (ver. 6, 7, 18), direction in the way of duty (ver. 4, 5), the favour of God (ver. 16), deliverance out of our troubles (ver. 17, 18), preservation from our enemies (ver. 20, 21), and the salvation of the church of God, ver. 22. III. What we may plead in prayer, our confidence in God (ver. 2, 3, 5, 20, 21), our distress and the malice of our enemies (ver. 17, 19), our sincerity, ver. 21. IV. What precious promises we have to encourage us in prayer, of guidance and instruction (ver. 8, 9, 12), the benefit of the covenant (ver. 10), and the pleasure of communion with God, ver. 13, 14.

A psalm of David.

David's professions of desire towards God and dependence on him. He often begins his psalms with such professions, not to move God, but to move himself.

I. He professes his desire towards God: Unto thee, O Lord! do I lift up my soul, v. 1. In worshipping God we must lift up our souls to him. Prayer is the ascent of the soul to God. Sursum corda—Up with your hearts, was anciently used as a call to devotion.

II. He professes his dependence upon God (v. 2): O my God! I trust in thee. His conscience witnessed for him that he had no confidence in himself nor in any creature. He pleases himself with this profession of faith in God. "Let me not be ashamed of my confidence in thee; let me not be shaken from it by any prevailing fears, and let me not be, in the issue, disappointed of what I depend upon thee for; but, Lord, keep what I have committed unto thee." Let those be ashamed that transgress without cause, or vainly, as the word is. The weaker the temptation is by which men are drawn to sin the stronger the corruption is by which they are driven to it. Those are the worst transgressors that sin for sinning-sake.

III. He begs direction from God in the way of his duty, v. 4, 5. Once and again he here prays to God to teach him. "Teach me, not fine words or fine notions, but thy ways, thy paths, thy truth, the ways in which thou walkest towards me, which are all mercy and truth (v. 10), and the ways in which thou wouldst have me to walk towards thee. Show me thy way, and so teach me." In doubtful cases we should pray earnestly that God would make it plain to us what he would have us to do. "Lead me, and so teach me." Thou art the God of my salvation. If God save us, he will teach us and lead us. He that gives salvation will give instruction. On thee do I wait all the day. Whence should a servant expect direction but from his own master, on whom he waits all the day?

IV. He appeals to God's infinite mercy, not pretending to any merit of his own (v. 6): "Remember, O Lord! thy tender mercies, and, for the sake of those mercies, lead me, and teach me; for they have been ever of old."

V. He is earnest for the pardon of his sins (v. 7): "O remember not the sins of my youth. Lord, remember thy mercies (v. 6), which speak for me, and not my sins, which speak against me." When God pardons sin he is said to remember it no more, which denotes a plenary remission; he forgives and forgets.

Verses 8–14

God's promises are here mixed with David's prayers. Many petitions there were in the former part of the psalm, and many we shall find in the latter; and here, in the middle of the psalm, he meditates upon the promises. The promises of God are not only the best foundation of prayer, telling us what to pray for, but they are a present answer to prayer. Let the prayer be made according to the promise, and then the promise may be read as a return to the prayer; and we are to believe the prayer is heard because the promise will be performed. But, in the midst of the promises, we find one petition which seems to come in somewhat abruptly, and should have followed upon v. 7. It is (v. 11), Pardon my iniquity. He enforces this petition with a double plea. "For thy name's sake pardon my iniquity. Pardon my iniquity, for it is great, and therefore I am undone, if infinite mercy do not interpose for the pardon of it."

Let us now view the great and precious promises which we have in these verses,

I. These promises are sure to those who, though they have been sinners, yet now keep God's word. Though, through the infirmity of the flesh, they sometimes break the command, yet by a sincere repentance when at any time they do amiss, and a constant adherence by faith to God as their God, they keep the covenant and do not break that. Such as fear him (v. 12 and again v. 14), such as stand in awe of his majesty and worship him with reverence, submit to his authority and obey him with cheerfulness.

II. Two things which ratify and confirm all the promises:—1. The perfections of God's nature. We value the promise by the character of him that makes it. We may therefore depend upon God's promises; for good and upright is the Lord, and therefore he will be as good as his word. 2. The agreeableness of all he says and does with the perfections of his nature (v. 10): All the paths of the Lord (that is, all his promises and all his providences) are mercy and truth; they are, like himself, good and upright.

III. What these promises are.

1. That God will instruct and direct them in the way of their duty. This is most insisted upon, because it is an answer to David's prayers (v. 4, 5), Show me thy ways and lead me. We should fix our thoughts on those promises which suit our present case. (1) He will teach sinners in the way, because they are sinners, and therefore need teaching. When they desire teaching, then he will teach them the way of reconciliation to God, the way to a well-grounded peace of conscience, and the way to eternal life. (2) The meek will he guide, that is, those that are humble, distrustful of themselves, desirous to be taught, and honestly resolved to follow the divine guidance. These he will guide in judgment, that is, by the rule of the written word. (3) Him that feareth the Lord he will teach in the way that he shall choose, either in the way that God shall choose or that the good man shall choose. It comes all to one, for he that fears the Lord chooses the things that please him.

2. That God will make them easy (v. 13): His soul shall dwell at ease, shall lodge in goodness, marg.

Those that devote themselves to the fear of God, and give up themselves to be taught of God, will be easy.

3. That he will give to them and theirs as much of this world as is good for them: His seed shall inherit the earth. Their children shall fare the better for their prayers when they are gone.

4. That God will admit them into the secret of communion with himself (v. 14): The secret of the Lord is with those that fear him. They understand his word; for, if any man do his will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God, John vii. 17.

David, encouraged by the promises he had been meditating upon, concludes the psalm, as he began, with professions of dependence upon God and desires towards him.

I. He lays open before God the calamitous condition he was in. His feet were in the net, held fast and entangled, so that he could not extricate himself out of his difficulties, v. 15. He was desolate and afflicted, v. 16. David calls himself desolate and solitary because he depended not upon his servants and soldiers, but relied as entirely upon God as if he had no prospect at all of help and succour from any creature. The troubles of his heart were enlarged (v. 17), he grew more and more melancholy and troubled in mind.

II. He expresses the dependence he had upon God in these distresses (v. 15): My eyes are ever towards the Lord. Those that have their eye ever towards God shall not have their feet long in the net. He repeats his profession of dependence upon God (v. 20)—Let me not be ashamed, for I put my trust in thee; and of expectation from him—I wait on thee, v. 21.

III. He prays earnestly to God for relief and succour, Forgive all my sins, Lord, forgive all, take away all iniquity. It is observable that, as to his affliction, he asks for no more than God's regard to it: "Look upon my affliction and my pain, and do with it as thou pleasest." But, as to his sin, he asks for no less than a full pardon: Forgive all my sins. Turn thou unto me. His condition was troubled, and, in reference to that, he prays, "O bring thou me out of my distresses. I see no way of deliverance open; but thou canst either find one or make one." He pleads God's mercy: Have mercy upon me. Men of the greatest merits would be undone if they had not to do with a God of infinite mercies. He pleads his own misery, which made him the proper object of divine mercy. He pleads the iniquity of his enemies: "Lord, consider them, how cruel they are, and deliver me out of their hands." He pleads his own integrity, v. 21. Though he had owned himself guilty before God, yet, as to his enemies, he had the testimony of his conscience that he had done them no wrong. Sincerity will be our best security in the worst of times. Redeem Israel, O God! out of all his troubles. David's troubles were enlarged, and very earnest he was with God to deliver him, yet he forgets not the distresses of God's church.

PSALM XXVI

David is in this psalm putting himself upon a solemn trial by God and his own conscience, to both which he appeals touching his integrity (ver. 1, 2), for the proof of which he alleges, I. His constant regard to God and his grace, ver. 3. II. His rooted antipathy to sin and sinners, ver. 4, 5. III. His sincere affection to the ordinances of God, and his care about them, ver. 6–8. Having thus proved his integrity, 1. He deprecates the doom of the wicked, ver. 9, 10. 2. He casts himself upon the mercy and grace of God, with a resolution to hold fast his integrity, and his hope in God, ver. 11, 12.

A psalm of David.

It is probable that David penned this psalm when he was persecuted by Saul, who represented him as a very bad man, and falsely accused him of many crimes. Herein he was a type of Christ, who was made a reproach of men. Now see what David does in this case.

I. He appeals to God's righteous sentence (v. 1): "Judge me, O God! be thou Judge between me and my accusers." He cannot justify himself against the charge of sin; he owns his iniquity is great and he is undone if God, in his infinite mercy, do not forgive him; but he can justify himself against the charge of hypocrisy. It is a comfort to all who are sincere in religion that God himself is a witness to their sincerity.

II. He submits to his unerring search (v. 2): Examine me, O Lord! and prove me, as gold is proved, whether it be standard. So sincere was he in his devotion to his God that he wished he had a window in his bosom, that whoever would might look into his heart.

III. He solemnly protests his sincerity (v. 1): "I have walked in my integrity; my conversation has agreed with my profession, and one part of it has been of a piece with another." Proofs of his integrity encouraged him to trust in the Lord as his righteous Judge, therefore I shall not slide. Those that are sincere in religion may trust in God that they shall not slide, that is, that they shall not apostatize from their religion.

1. He had a constant regard to God and to his grace, v. 3. Thy loving-kindness is before my eyes. He governed himself by the word of God as his rule: "I have walked in thy truth, that is, according to thy law, for thy law is truth."

2. He had no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, nor with the workers of those works, v. 4, 5. Great care to avoid bad company is both a good evidence of our integrity and a good means to preserve us in it. "I have not sat with them, and I will not go in with them." The company of dissemblers is as dangerous company as any, and as much to be shunned. Evil-doers pretend friendship to those whom they would decoy into their snares, but they dissemble. When they speak fair, believe them not. Though sometimes he could not avoid being in the company of bad people, yet he would not go in with them, he would not choose such for his companions. I have hated ecclesiam malignantium —the church of the malignant; so the Latin reads it. As good men, in concert, make one another better, and are enabled to do so much the more good, so bad men, in combination, make one another worse, and do so much the more mischief.

I. David mentions, as a further evidence of his integrity, the sincere affection he had to the ordinances of God.

1. He was very careful and conscientious in his preparation for holy ordinances: I will wash my hands in innocency. In our preparations for solemn ordinances we must not only be able to clear ourselves from the charge of hypocrisy, and to protest our innocency of that (which was signified by washing the hands, Deut. xxi. 6), but we must take pains to cleanse ourselves by renewing our repentance.

2. He was very diligent and serious in his attendance upon them: I will compass thy altar, alluding to the custom of the priests, who, while the sacrifice was in offering, walked round the altar, and probably the offerers likewise did so at some distance, denoting a diligent regard to what was done and a dutiful attendance in the service.

3. In all his attendance on God's ordinances he aimed at the glory of God.

4. He did this with delight. "Lord, thou knowest how dearly I have loved the habitation of thy house

(v. 8), the tabernacle where thou art pleased to manifest thy residence among thy people and receive their homage, the place where thy honour dwells."

II. David, having given proofs of his integrity, earnestly prays that he might not fall under the doom of the wicked (v. 9, 10). Gather not my soul with sinners. "They are bloody men, that thirst after blood and lie under a great deal of the guilt of blood. They do mischief, and mischief is always in their hands. Though they get by their wickedness (for their right hand is full of bribes which they have taken to pervert justice), yet that will make their case never the better; for what is a man profited if he gain the world and lose his soul?" He dreads having his lot with them.

III. David, with a holy humble confidence, commits himself to the grace of God, v. 11, 12. "As for me, whatever others do, I will walk in my integrity." He prays for the divine grace both to enable him to do so and to give him the comfort of it: "Redeem me out of the hands of my enemies, and be merciful to me, living and dying." He pleases himself with his steadiness: "My foot stands in an even place, where I shall not stumble and whence I shall not fall." He promises himself that though he was now perhaps banished from public ordinances, yet he should again have an opportunity of blessing God in the congregation of his people.

PSALM XXVII

Some think David penned this psalm before his coming to the throne, when he was in the midst of his troubles, and perhaps upon occasion of the death of his parents; but the Jews think he penned it when he was old, upon occasion of the wonderful deliverance he had from the sword of the giant, when Abishai succoured him (2 Sam. xxi. 16, 17). Perhaps it was not penned upon any particular occasion; but it is very expressive of the pious and devout affections with which gracious souls are carried out towards God at all times, especially in times of trouble I. The courage and holy bravery of his faith, ver. 1–3. II. The complacency he took in communion with God and the benefit he experienced by it, ver. 4–6. III. His desire towards God, and his favour and grace, ver. 7–9, 11, 12. IV. His expectations from God, and the encouragement he gives to others to hope in him, ver. 10, 13, 14.

I. With what a lively faith David triumphs in God, glories in his holy name. 1. The Lord is my light. David's subjects called him the light of Israel, 2 Sam. xxi. 17. And he was indeed a burning and a shining light: but he owns that he shone, as the moon does, with a borrowed light; what light God darted upon him reflected upon them: The Lord is my light. 2. "He is my salvation, in whom I am safe and by whom I shall be saved." 3. "He is the strength of my life, not only the protector of my exposed life, but the strength of my frail weak life."

II. With what an undaunted courage he triumphs over his enemies; no fortitude like that of faith. If God be for him, who can be against him? Whom shall I fear? Of whom shall I be afraid? His enemies came upon him, to eat up his flesh, aiming at no less and assured of that, but they fell; not, "He smote them and they fell," but, "They stumbled and fell"; they were so confounded and weakened that they could not go on with their enterprise. "Though they be numerous, a host of them, though they encamp against me, an army against one man, yet my heart shall not fear." Hosts cannot hurt us if the Lord of hosts protect us. Nay, in this assurance that God is for me I will be confident. "He shall hide me, not in the strongholds of En-gedi (1 Sam. xxiii. 29), but in the secret of his tabernacle. Now shall my head be lifted up above my enemies, not only so as that they cannot reach it with their darts, but so as that I shall be exalted to bear rule over them."

III. With what a gracious earnestness he prays for a constant communion with God in holy ordinances, v. 4.

1. What it is he desires—to dwell in the house of the Lord. In the courts of God's house the priests had their lodgings, and David wished he had been one of them. All God's children desire to dwell in God's house; where should they dwell else? Do we hope that praising God will be the blessedness of our eternity? Surely then we ought to make it the business of our time.

2. How earnestly he covets this: "This is the one thing I have desired of the Lord and which I will seek after." If he were to ask but one thing of God, this should be it; for this he had at heart more than anything. He would dwell in God's house to behold the beauty of the Lord and to enquire in his temple. He knew something of the beauty of the Lord; his holiness is his beauty (ex. 3); his goodness is his beauty, Zech. ix. 17. The harmony of all his attributes is the beauty of his nature. In God's house troubles would not find him. Joash, one of David's seed, was hidden in the house of the Lord six years, and there not only preserved from the sword, but reserved to the crown, 2 Kings xi. 3. The temple was thought a safe place for Nehemiah to abscond in, Neh. vi. 10. The safety of believers however is not in the walls of the temple, but in the God of the temple and their comfort in communion with him.

David in these verses expresses,

I. His desire towards God, in many petitions. If he cannot now go up to the house of the Lord, yet, wherever he is, he can find a way to the throne of grace by prayer. "Hear, O Lord, when I cry, not only with my heart, but, as one in earnest, with my voice too." If we pray and believe, God will graciously hear and answer. David fastens, in his thoughts, upon the call God had given him to the throne of his grace. My heart said unto thee (so it begins in the original) or of thee, Seek you my face; he first revolved that, and preached that over again to himself (and that is the best preaching; it is hearing twice what God speaks once)—Thou saidst Seek you my face; and then he returns what he had so meditated upon, in this pious resolution, Thy face, Lord, will I seek. The opening of his hand will satisfy the desire of living things (cxlv. 16), but it is only the shining of his face that will satisfy the desire of a living soul, iv. 6, 7. He owns he had deserved God's displeasure, but begs that, however God might correct him, he would not cast him away from his presence. "O leave me not, neither forsake me; withdraw not the operations of thy power from me, for then I am helpless; withdraw not the tokens of thy goodwill to me, for then I am comfortless." "Teach me thy way, O Lord! give me to understand the meaning of thy providences towards me that I may not mistake it, but may walk rightly, and that I may not do it with hesitation, but may walk surely." He begs to be guided in a plain path, because of his enemies, or (as the margin reads it) his observers. "Deliver me not over to the will of my enemies. Lord, let them not gain their point, for it aims at my life, and I have no fence against them, but thy power over their consciences; for false witnesses have risen up against me, that aim further than to take away my reputation, for they breathe out cruelty; it is the blood they thirst after."

II. He expresses his dependence upon God: "When my father and my mother forsake me, the nearest and dearest friends I have in the world, from whom I may expect most relief and with most reason, when they die, or are at a distance from me, or are disabled to help me in the time of need, or are unkind to me or unmindful of me, and will not help me, when I am as helpless as ever poor orphan was that was left fatherless and motherless, then I know the Lord will take me up." He believed he should see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living; and, if he had not done so, he would have fainted under his afflictions. Those that walk by faith in the goodness of the Lord shall in due time walk in the sight of that goodness. It is his comfort, not so much that he shall see the land of the living as that he shall see the goodness of God in it; for that is the comfort of all creature-comforts to a gracious soul. In heaven is that land that may truly be called the land of the living. This earth is the land of the dying. There is nothing like the believing hope of eternal life to keep us from fainting under all the calamities of this present time. In the meantime he says to himself, or to his friends, He shall strengthen thy heart, shall sustain the spirit. In that strength, Wait on the Lord by faith, and prayer, and a humble resignation to his will; wait, I say, on the Lord; whatever you do, grow not remiss in your attendance upon God. Those that wait upon the Lord have reason to be of good courage.

PSALM XXVIII

The former part of this psalm is the prayer of a saint militant and now in distress (ver. 1–3), to which is added the doom of God's implacable enemies, ver. 4, 5. The latter part of the psalm is the thanksgiving of a saint triumphant, and delivered out of his distresses (ver. 6–8), to which is added a prophetical prayer for all God's faithful loyal subjects, ver. 9.

A psalm of David.

David is very earnest in prayer.

I. He prays that God would graciously hear and answer him, now that, in his distress, he called upon him, v. 1, 2. "O Lord, my rock (denoting his belief of God's power), to thee will I cry, as one in earnest, being ready to sink, unless thou come in with seasonable succour. If thou be silent to me, and I have not the tokens of thy favour, I am like those that go down into the pit (that is, I am a dead man, lost and undone); if God be not my friend my hope and my help will have perished." I lift up my hands towards thy holy oracle, thence to receive an answer of peace. The most holy place within the veil is here, as elsewhere, called the oracle; there the ark and the mercy-seat were, there God was said to dwell between the cherubim, and thence he spoke to his people, Num. vii. 89. That was a type of Christ, and it is to him that we must lift up our eyes and hands, for through him all good comes from God to us.

II. He deprecates the doom of wicked people. "Lord, I attend thy holy oracle, draw me not away from that with the wicked, and with the workers of iniquity," v. 3. "Lord, never leave me to myself, to use such arts of deceit and treachery for my safety as they use for my ruin."

III. He imprecates the just judgments of God upon the workers of iniquity (v. 4): Give them according to their deeds. This is not the language of passion or revenge, nor is it inconsistent with the duty of praying for our enemies. But he would show how far he was from complying with the workers of iniquity. If what has been done amiss be not undone by repentance, there will certainly come a reckoning day, when God will render to every man who persists in his evil deeds according to them. It is a prophecy particularly of the destruction of destroyers: "They speak peace to their neighbours, but mischief is in their hearts; Lord, give them according to their deeds."

IV. He foretells their destruction for their contempt of God and his hand (v. 5): "Because they regard not the works of the Lord and the operations of his hands, by which he manifests himself and speaks to the children of men, he will destroy them in this world and in the other, and not build them up." Why do men question the being or attributes of God, but because they do not duly regard his handiworks, which declare his glory, and in which the invisible things of him are clearly seen?

I. David gives God thanks. It was in faith that David prayed (v. 2), Hear the voice of my supplications; and by the same faith he gives thanks (v. 6) that God has heard the voice of his supplications. Those that pray in faith may rejoice in hope. What we win by prayer we must wear with praise.

II. He encourages himself to hope in God for the perfecting of everything that concerned him. This is the method of attaining peace: let us begin with praise that it is attainable. His experience of the benefit of that dependence: "My heart trusted in him, and in his power and promise; and it has not been in vain to do so, for I am helped, I have been often helped; not only God has given to me, in his due time, the help I trusted to him for, but my very trusting in him has helped me, in the mean time, and kept me from fainting," xxvii. 13. Therefore my heart greatly rejoices.

III. He pleases himself with the interest which all good people, through Christ, have in God (v. 8): "The Lord is their strength; not mine only, but the strength of every believer." This is our communion with all saints, that God is their strength and ours, Christ their Lord and ours, 1 Cor. i. 2.

IV. He concludes with a short but comprehensive prayer for the church of God, v. 9. He prays for Israel, not as his people ("save my people, and bless my inheritance"), though they were so, but, "thine." The Lord's portion is his people. That which he begs of God for them is, 1. That he would save them from their enemies. 2. That he would bless them with all good. 3. That he would feed them. "Direct their counsels and actions aright, and overrule their affairs for good. Feed them, and rule them; set pastors, set rulers, over them, that shall do their office with wisdom and understanding." 4. That he would lift them up for ever, lift them up out of their troubles and distresses, and do this, not only for those of that age, but for his people in every age to come, even to the end.

PSALM XXIX

It is the probable conjecture that David penned this psalm at the time of a great storm of thunder, lightning, and rain, as the eighth psalm was his meditation in a moonlight night and the nineteenth in a sunny morning. I. He calls upon the great ones of the world to give glory to God, ver. 1, 2. II. To convince them of the goodness of that God whom they were to adore, he takes notice of his power in the thunder, and lightning, and thunder-showers (ver. 3–9), his sovereign dominion over the world (ver. 10), and his special favour to his church, ver. 11.

A psalm of David.

I. A demand of the homage of the great men of the earth to be paid to the great God. Every clap of thunder David interpreted as a call to himself and other princes to give glory to the great God. "O you mighty (v. 1), you sons of the mighty, who have power, give unto the Lord, and again, and a third time, Give unto the Lord the recognition of his glory, and of his dominion over us. Give unto the Lord your ownselves, in the first place, and then your services. Give unto the Lord glory and strength; acknowledge his glory and strength, and whatever glory or strength he has entrusted you with offer it to him, to be used for his honour, in his service. Give him your crowns; let them be laid at his feet; give him your sceptres, your swords, your keys; put all into his hand, that you, in the use of them, may be to him for a name and a praise." What is here said to the mighty is said to all: Worship God; it is the sum and substance of the everlasting gospel,

Rev. xiv. 6, 7. Religious worship is giving to the Lord the glory due to his name, v. 2. Worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness. Adore him, not only as infinitely awful and therefore to be feared above all, but as infinitely amiable and therefore to be loved and delighted in above all; especially we must have an eye to the beauty of his holiness. There is a beauty in holiness, and it is that which puts an acceptable beauty upon all the acts of worship.

II. Good reason given for this demand.

1. His sufficiency in himself, intimated in his name Jehovah—I am that I am, which is repeated here no fewer than eighteen times in this short psalm, twice in every verse but three, and once in two of those three.

2. His sovereignty over all things. The psalmist here sets forth God's dominion,

(1) In the kingdom of nature. In the wonderful effects of natural causes, and the operations of the powers of nature. It is the God of glory that thunders, v. 3. Every one that hears the thunder will own that the voice of the Lord is full of majesty (xxix. 4). For if his voice be so terrible, what is his arm? The voice of the Lord, in the thunder, often broke the cedars, even those of Lebanon, the strongest, the stateliest. Some understand it of the violent winds which shook the cedars, and tore off their tops. Earthquakes also shook the ground itself on which the trees grew, and made Lebanon and Sirion to dance; the wilderness of Kadesh also was in like manner shaken (v. 8), the trees by winds, the ground by earthquakes. Dr. Hammond understands it of the conquest of the neighbouring kingdoms that warred with Israel and opposed David, as the Syrians, whose country lay near the forest of Lebanon, the Amorites that bordered on Mount Hermon, and the Moabites and Ammonites that lay about the wilderness of Kadesh. Fires have been kindled by lightnings, accordingly the voice of the Lord, in the thunder, is here said to divide the flames of fire (v. 7). The terror of thunder makes the hinds to calve sooner, and some think more easily, than otherwise they would. The thunder is said here to discover the forest, that is, it so terrifies the wild beasts of the forest that they quit the dens and thickets in which they hid themselves and so are discovered.

(2) In the kingdom of providence, v. 10. God is to be praised as the governor of the world of mankind. He sits upon the flood; he sits King for ever. The ebbings and flowings of this lower world, and the agitations and revolutions of the affairs in it, give not the least shake to the repose nor to the counsels of the Eternal Mind. He sits King for ever; no period can, or shall, be put to his government. The administration of his kingdom is consonant to his counsels from eternity and pursuant to his designs for eternity.

(3) In the kingdom of grace. Here his glory shines most brightly. In his temples, where his people attend his discoveries of himself and his mind and attend him with their praises everyone speaks of his glory. All his works do praise him, but his saints only do bless him, and speak of his glory in his works, cxlv. 10. He will give strength to his people, to fortify them against every evil work and to furnish them for every good work. He will bless his people with peace. Peace is a blessing of inestimable value, which God designs for all his people.

PSALM XXX

This is a psalm of thanksgiving for the great deliverances which God had wrought for David, penned upon occasion of the dedicating of his house of cedar. I. He here praises God for the deliverances he had wrought for him, ver. 1–3. II. He calls upon others to praise him too, ver. 4, 5. III. He blames himself for his former security, ver. 6, 7. IV. He recollects the prayers and complaints he had made in his distress, ver. 8–10. With them he stirs up himself to be very thankful to God for the present change, ver. 11, 12.

A psalm and song at the dedication of the house of David.

It was the laudable practice of the pious Jews, and, though not expressly appointed, yet allowed and accepted, when they had built a new house, to dedicate it to God, Deut. xx. 5. David did so when his house was built, and he took possession of it (2 Sam. v. 11). The houses we dwell in should, at our first entrance upon them, be dedicated to God, as little sanctuaries. We must solemnly commit ourselves, our families, and all our family affairs, to God's guidance and pray for his presence and blessing.

I. David does himself give God thanks for the great deliverances he had wrought for him (v. 1): "I will extol thee, O Lord! I will exalt thy name, will praise thee as one high and lifted up. I cried to thee, and thou hast not only heard me, but healed me, healed the distempered body, healed the disturbed and disquieted mind, healed the disordered distracted affairs of the kingdom." He was brought to the last extremity, dropping into the grave, and ready to go down into the pit, and yet rescued and kept alive, v. 3. A life from the dead ought to be spent in extolling the God of our life.

II. He calls upon others to join with him in praise. Sing unto the Lord, O you saints of his! "Let them give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness; let them praise his holy name, for holiness is his memorial throughout all generations." It is a good sign that we are in some measure partakers of his holiness if we can heartily rejoice and give thanks at the remembrance of it. We have found his frowns very short. Though we have deserved that they should be everlasting, and that he should be angry with us till he had consumed us, and should never be reconciled, yet his anger endureth but for a moment, v. 5. If weeping endureth for a night, yet, as sure as the light of the morning returns, so sure will joy and comfort return in a short time to the people of God; for the covenant of grace is as firm as the covenant of the day. In his favour is life, that is, all good. It is the life of the soul, it is spiritual life, the earnest of life eternal.

An account of three several states that David was in successively, and of the workings of his heart towards God in each of those states.

I. "In my prosperity, when I was in health of body and God had given me rest from all my enemies, I said I shall never be moved; I never had any apprehensions of danger upon any account." He thought his prosperity fixed like a mountain; Thou, through thy favour, hast made my mountain to stand strong, v. 7. He does not look upon it as his heaven (as worldly people do, who make their prosperity their felicity), only his mountain; it is earth still, only raised a little higher than the common level.

II. On a sudden he fell into trouble, and then he prayed to God, and pleaded earnestly for relief and succour. His mountain was shaken and he with it; it proved, when he grew secure, that he was least safe: "Thou didst hide thy face and I was troubled, in mind, body, or estate." If God hide his face, a good man is certainly troubled, though no other calamity befall him; when the sun sets night certainly follows, and the moon and all the stars cannot make day. When his mountain was shaken he lifted up his eyes above the hills. Is any troubled? Let him pray. I cried to thee, O Lord! It seems God's withdrawings made his prayers the more vehement. What profit is there in my blood? implying that he would willingly die if he could thereby do any real service to God or his country (Phil. ii. 17), but he saw not what good could be done by his dying in the bed of sickness, as might be if he had died in the bed of honour. Shall the dust praise thee? The sanctified spirit, which returns to God shall be still praising him; but the dust, which returns to the earth, shall not praise him, nor declare his truth.

III. In due time God delivered him out of his troubles and restored him to his former prosperity. His prayers were answered and his mourning was turned into dancing, v. 11. But what temper of mind was he in upon this happy change of the face of his affairs? What does he say now? He tells us, v. 12. His complaints were turned into praises. I will give thanks unto thee for ever. Thus must we learn to accommodate ourselves to the various providences of God.

PSALM XXXI

It is probable that David penned this psalm when he was persecuted by Saul; some passages in it agree particularly to the narrow escapes he had, at Keilah (1 Sam. xxiii. 13), then in the wilderness of Maon, when Saul marched on one side of the hill and he on the other, and, soon after, in the cave in the wilderness of Engedi. It is a mixture of prayers, and praises, and professions of confidence in God. I. David professes his cheerful confidence in God, and, in that confidence, prays for deliverance out of his present troubles, ver. 1–8. II. He complains of the deplorable condition he was in, and still prays that God would graciously appear for him against his persecutors, ver. 9–18. III. He concludes the psalm with praise and triumph, giving glory to God, and encouraging himself and others to trust in him, ver. 19–24.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

Verses 1–8

Faith and prayer must go together.

I. David, in distress, is very earnest with God in prayer for succour and relief. He prays that God, not only in mercy, but in righteousness, would deliver him, as a righteous Judge betwixt him and his unrighteous persecutors. The psalmist prays also that he would deliver him speedily, lest, if the deliverance were long deferred, his faith should fail. "Be thou my strong rock, immovable, impregnable, as a fastness framed by nature, and my house of defence, a fortress framed by art, and all to save me. Lord, lead me and guide me" (v. 3). Those that resolve to follow God's direction may in faith pray for it.

II. In this prayer he gives glory to God by a repeated profession of his confidence in him and dependence on him. "In thee, O Lord! do I put my trust, and not in myself, or any sufficiency of my own, or in any creature; let me never be ashamed, let me not be disappointed of any of that good which thou hast promised me. Thou art my rock and my fortress, by thy covenant with me and my believing consent to that covenant; therefore be my strong rock," v. 2. If God be our strength, we may hope that he will both put his strength in us and put forth his strength for us. Into thy hands I commit my spirit (v. 5). David is here to be looked upon as a man in distress and trouble. His great care is about his soul, his spirit, his better part. Our outward afflictions should increase our concern for our souls. Many think that while they are perplexed about their worldly affairs, they may be excused if they neglect their souls; whereas the greater hazard our lives and secular interests lie at the more we are concerned to look to our souls, that we may keep possession of our souls when we can keep possession of nothing else, Luke xxi. 19. He thinks the best he can do for his soul is to commit it into the hand of God. He had prayed (v. 4) to be plucked out of the net of outward trouble, but, as not insisting upon that (God's will be done), he immediately lets fall that petition, and commits the spirit, the inward man, into God's hand. "Lord, however it goes with me, as to my body, let it go well with my soul."

III. He disclaimed all confederacy with those that made an arm of flesh their confidence (v. 6): I have hated those that regard lying vanities—idolaters (so some), who expect aid from false gods, which are vanity and a lie—astrologers, and those that give heed to them, so others.

IV. He comforted himself with his hope in God, and made himself, not only easy, but cheerful, with it, v. 7.

V. He encouraged himself in this hope with the experiences he had had of late. "Thou hast considered my trouble, with wisdom to suit relief to it, with condescension and compassion regarding the low estate of thy servant. Thou hast known my soul in adversities, with a tender concern and care for it. Thou hast not shut me up into the hand of the enemy, but set me at liberty, in a large room, where I may shift for my own safety," v. 8.

Verses 9–18

In the foregoing verses David had appealed to God's righteousness; here he appeals to his mercy, and pleads the greatness of his own misery, which made his case the proper object of that mercy.

I. The complaint he makes of his trouble and distress (v. 9): "Have mercy upon me, O Lord! for I am in trouble, and need thy mercy." His troubles had made him a man of sorrows. We may guess by David's complexion, which was ruddy and sanguine, by his genius for music, and by his daring enterprises in his early days, that his natural disposition was both cheerful and firm, that he was apt to be cheerful, and not to lay trouble to his heart; yet here we see he has almost wept out his eyes, and sighed away his breath. His body was affected with the sorrows of his mind (v. 10): My strength fails, my bones are consumed, and all because of my iniquity. His friends were unkind and became shy of him. He was a fear to his acquaintance, when they saw him they fled from him, v. 11. He was forgotten by them, as a dead man out of mind (v. 12), and looked upon with contempt as a broken vessel. Such swallow-friends the world is full of, that are gone in winter. His enemies were unjust in their censures of him. He was a reproach among all his enemies, but especially among his neighbours, v. 11. Thus he heard the slander of many; everyone had a stone to throw at him, because fear was on every side.

II. His confidence in God in the midst of these troubles. Everything looked black and dismal round about him, and threatened to drive him to despair: "But I trusted in thee, O Lord! (v. 14) and was thereby kept from sinking." His enemies robbed him of his reputation among men, but they could not rob him of his comfort in God, because they could not drive him from his confidence in God. "Thou art my God; I have chosen thee for mine, and thou hast promised to be mine." My times are in thy hand. Join this with the former and it makes the comfort complete. If God have our times in his hand, he can help us; and, if he be our God, he will help us; and then what can discourage us?

III. His petitions to God, in this faith and confidence. Our opportunities are in God's hand (so some read it), and therefore he knows how to choose the best and fittest time for our deliverance, and we must be willing to wait that time. When David had Saul at his mercy in the cave those about him said, "This is the time in which God will deliver thee," 1 Sam. xxiv. 4. "No," says David, "the time has not come for my deliverance till it can be wrought without sin; and I will wait for that time; for it is God's time, and that is the best time." Particularly, he prays for the silencing of those that reproach and calumniate the people of God (v. 18): Let lying lips be put to silence, that speak grievous things proudly and contemptuously against the righteous. One would think they thought it no sin to tell a deliberate lie if it might but serve to expose a good man either to hatred or contempt. Hear, O our God! for we are despised.

I. The acknowledgment which David makes of God's goodness to his people in general, v. 19, 20. God is good to all, but he is, in a special manner, good to Israel. Those who are interested in this goodness are described to be such as fear God and trust in him, as stand in awe of his greatness and rely on his grace. This goodness is said to be laid up for them and wrought for them. There is enough in bank and enough in hand. This goodness is wrought, in the actual performance of the promise, for those that trust in him. If what is laid up for us in the treasures of the everlasting covenant be not wrought for us, it is our own fault, because we do not believe. God is, in a special manner, the protector of his own people (v. 20): Thou shalt hide them. The saints are God's hidden ones. See the defence they are under: Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence, in a pavilion. God's providence shall keep them safe from the malice of their enemies. He has many ways of sheltering them. When Baruch and Jeremiah were sought for the Lord hid them, Jer. xxxvi. 26.

II. The thankful returns which David makes for God's goodness to him in particular, v. 21, 22. "He has shown me his marvellous loving-kindness, beyond what I could have expected." Special preservations call for particular thanksgiving. Within were fears; but God was better to him than his fears, v. 22. Though his faith failed, God's promise did not: Thou heardest the voice of my supplication, for all this. He mentions his own unbelief as a foil to God's fidelity, serving to make his loving-kindness the more marvellous, the more illustrious.

III. The exhortation and encouragement which he hereupon gives to all the saints, v. 23, 24. O love the Lord! all you his saints. It is the character of the saints that they do love God; and yet they must be still called upon to love him, to love him more and love him better, and give proofs of their love. He would have them set their hope in God (v. 24): "Be of good courage; have a good heart on it; whatever difficulties or dangers you may meet with, the God you trust in shall by that trust strengthen your heart."

PSALM XXXII

This psalm, though it speaks not of Christ, has yet a great deal of gospel in it. We have here a summary, I. Of gospel grace in the pardon of sin (ver. 1, 2), in divine protection (ver. 7), and divine guidance, ver. 8. II. Of gospel duty. To confess sin (ver. 3–5), to pray (ver. 6), to govern ourselves well (ver. 9, 10), and to rejoice in God, ver. 11. Grotius thinks it was designed to be sung on the day of atonement.

A psalm of David, Maschil.

This psalm is entitled Maschil, which some take to be only the name of the tune to which it was set and was to be sung. But others think it is significant; our margin reads it, A psalm of David giving instruction, and there is nothing in which we have more need of instruction than in the nature of true blessedness—what we must do that we may be happy. In general our happiness consists in the favour of God, and not in the wealth of this world—in spiritual blessings. When it is here said, Blessed is the man whose iniquity is forgiven, the meaning is, "This is the ground of his blessedness: this is that fundamental privilege from which all the other ingredients of his blessedness flow."

I. Concerning the nature of the pardon of sin. 1. It is the forgiving of transgression. Sin is the transgression of the law. Upon our repentance, the transgression is forgiven; that is, the obligation to punishment which we lay under is cancelled: it is lifted off (so some read it), that by the pardon of it we may be eased of a burden, a heavy burden. 2. It is the covering of sin, as nakedness is covered, that it may not appear to our shame, Rev. iii. 18. When sin is pardoned, it is covered with the robe of Christ's righteousness. 3. It is the not imputing of iniquity, not laying it to the sinner's charge. The righteousness of Christ being imputed to us, and we being made the righteousness of God in him, our iniquity is not imputed, God having laid upon him the iniquity of us all and made him sin for us.

II. Concerning the character of those whose sins are pardoned: in whose spirit there is no guile. He does not say, "There is no guilt" (for who is there that lives and sins not?), but no guile; the pardoned sinner is one that does not dissemble with God in his professions of repentance and faith. While I kept silence my bones waxed old. Those may be said to keep silence who stifle their convictions, who, when they cannot but see the evil of sin and their danger by reason of it, ease themselves by not thinking of it and diverting their minds to something else, who will not unburden their consciences by a penitent confession, and who choose rather to pine away in their iniquities than to take the method which God has appointed of finding rest for their souls.

III. Concerning the true and only way to peace of conscience. We are here taught to confess our sins, that they may be forgiven, to declare them, that we may be justified. This course David took: I acknowledged my sin unto thee, and no longer hid my iniquity, v. 5.

IV. Concerning God's readiness to pardon sin to those who truly repent of it: "I said, I will confess and immediately thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin, and gavest me the comfort of the pardon in my own conscience; immediately I found rest to my soul." Thus the father of the prodigal saw his returning son when he was yet afar off, and ran to meet him with the kiss that sealed his pardon. For this shall every one that is godly pray unto thee. All godly people are praying people. As soon as ever Paul was converted, Behold, he prays, Acts ix. 11. Those that are sincere and abundant in prayer will find the benefit of it when they are in trouble: Surely in the floods of great waters, which are very threatening, they shall not come nigh them.

I. David speaks to God, and professes his confidence in him and expectation from him, v. 7. "Thou art my hiding-place; when by faith I have recourse to thee I shall see all the reason in the world to be easy, and to think myself out of the reach of any real evil. Thou shalt preserve me from trouble, from the sting of it, and from the strokes of it as far as is good for me. Thou shalt preserve me from such trouble as I was in while I kept silence," v. 3. When God has pardoned our sins, if he leaves us to ourselves, we shall soon run as far in debt again as ever, and therefore, when we have received the comfort of our remission, we must fly to the grace of God to be preserved from returning to folly again. "Thou shalt not only deliver me, but compass me about with songs of deliverance. As everyone that is godly shall pray with me, so they shall give thanks with me."

II. He turns his speech to the children of men. Being himself converted, he does what he can to strengthen his brethren (Luke xxii. 32): I will instruct thee, whoever thou art that desirest instruction, and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go, v. 8. When Solomon became a penitent he immediately became a preacher, Eccles. i. 1. I will guide thee with my eye. Some apply this to God's conduct and direction. But it is rather to be taken as David's promise to those who sat under his instruction, his own children and family especially: "I will counsel thee; my eye shall be upon thee" (so the margin reads it); "I will give thee the best counsel I can and then observe whether thou takest it or no." Spiritual guides must be overseers. Here is a word of caution to sinners, not to be unruly and ungovernable: Be you not as the horse and the mule, which have no understanding, v. 9. It is our honour and happiness that we have understanding, that we are capable of being governed by reason and of reasoning with ourselves. Where there is renewing grace there is no need of the bit and bridle of restraining grace. The reason for this caution is because the way of sin will certainly end in sorrow (v. 10). Here is a word of comfort to saints. They are assured that if they will but trust in the Lord, and keep closely to him, mercy shall compass them about on every side (v. 10).

PSALM XXXIII

This is a psalm of praise. The psalmist, I. Calls upon the righteous to praise God, ver. 1–3. II. Furnishes us with matter for praise. 1. For his justice, goodness, and truth, appearing in his word, and in all his works, ver. 4, 5. 2. For his power appearing in the work of creation, ver. 6–9. 3. For the sovereignty of his providence in the government of the world, ver. 10, 11, and again ver. 13–17. 4. For the peculiar favour which he bears to his own chosen people, ver. 12 and again ver. 18–22.

I. The great desire that God might be praised. Holy joy is the heart and soul of praise (v. 1): Rejoice in the Lord, you righteous; so the foregoing psalm concluded and so this begins. Thankful praise is holy joy (v. 2): "Praise the Lord; speak well of him, and give him the glory due to his name." Religious songs are the proper expressions of thankful praise (v. 3): "Sing unto him a new song, the best you have." Music was then used with the temple-songs (v. 2): Sing unto him with the psaltery. A good rule for this duty: "Do it skilfully, and with a loud noise; let it have the best both of head and heart; let it be done intelligently and with a clear head, affectionately and with a warm heart." A good reason for this duty: For praise is comely for the upright.

II. The high thoughts he had of God, and of his infinite perfections, v. 4, 5. God makes himself known to us, 1. In his word, here put for all divine revelation, all that which God at sundry times and in divers manners spoke to the children of men. 2. In his works, and those are all done in truth. The copy in all God's works agrees exactly with the great original, the plan laid in the Eternal Mind, and varies not in the least jot. God has made it to appear in his works that he is a God of inflexible justice: He loveth righteousness and judgment. He is a God of inexhaustible bounty: The earth is full of his goodness, that is, of the proofs and instances of it. The benign influences which the earth receives from above, and the fruits it is thereby enabled to produce, the provision that is made both for man and beast, and the common blessings with which all the nations of the earth are blessed, plainly declare that the earth is full of his goodness—the darkest, the coldest, the hottest, and the most dry and desert part of it not excepted. What a pity it is that this earth, which is so full of God's goodness, should be so empty of his praises, and that of the multitudes that live upon his bounty there are so few that live to his glory!

III. The conviction he was under of the almighty power of God, evidenced in the creation of the world. We "believe in God," and therefore we praise him as "the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth", so we are here taught to praise him.

1. God made the world, and brought all things into being. (1) How easily: All things were made by the word of the Lord and by the breath of his mouth. Christ is the Word, the Spirit is the breath, so that God the Father made the world, as he rules it and redeems it, by his Son and Spirit. He spoke, and he commanded (v. 9), and that was enough; there needed no more. With men saying and doing are two things, but it is not so with God. (2) How effectually it was done: And it stood fast. What God does he does to purpose; he does it and it stands fast.

2. What he made. He made all things, but notice is here taken, (1) Of the heavens, and the host of them, v. 6. The visible heavens, and the sun, moon, and stars, their hosts—the highest heavens, and the angels, their hosts. (2) Of the waters, and the treasures of them, v. 7. The earth was at first covered with the water, and he gathered the waters together on a heap, that the dry land might appear, yet left them not to continue on a heap, but laid up the depth in storehouses.

3. What use is to be made of this (v. 8): Let all the earth fear the Lord, and stand in awe of him; that is, let all the children of men worship him and give glory to him, xcv. 5, 6.

IV. The satisfaction he had of God's sovereignty and dominion, v. 10, 11. Come and see with an eye of faith God in the throne, 1. Frustrating the devices of his enemies: He bringeth the counsel of the heathen to nought. 2. Fulfilling his own decrees: The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever. Through all the revolutions of time God never changed his measures, but in every event, even that which to us is most surprising, the eternal counsel of God is fulfilled.

Give to God the glory,

I. Of his common providence towards all the children of men. 1. The children of men are all under his eye, even their hearts are so; and all the motions and operations of their souls, which none know but they themselves, he knows better than they themselves, v. 13, 14. He not only beholds them, but he looks upon them; he looks narrowly upon them (so the word here used is sometimes rendered). 2. He fashions their hearts. He formed the spirit of each man within him. Hence he is called the Father of spirits. The artist that made the clock, can account for the motions of every wheel. David uses this argument with application to himself, cxxxix. 1, 14. He fashions them together (so some read it); as the wheels of a watch, though of different shapes, sizes, and motions, are yet all put together, to serve one and the same purpose, so the hearts of men and their dispositions, however varying from each other and seeming to contradict one another, are yet all overruled to serve the divine purpose, which is one. All the powers of the creature have a dependence upon him, and are of no account, of no avail at all, without him, v. 16, 17. The strength of an army is nothing without God. The multitude of a host cannot secure those under whose command they act, unless God make them a security to them. The strength of a giant is nothing without God. A mighty man, such as Goliath was, is not delivered by his much strength, when his day comes to fall. Let not the strong man then glory in his strength, but let us all strengthen ourselves in the Lord our God. The strength of a horse is nothing without God (v. 17): A horse is a vain thing for safety. In war horses were then so highly accounted of, and so much depended on, that God forbade the kings of Israel to multiply horses (Deut. xvii. 16), lest they should be tempted to trust to them and their confidence should thereby be taken off from God. David houghed the horses of the Syrians (2 Sam. viii. 4); here he houghs all the horses in the world, by pronouncing a horse a vain thing for safety in the day of battle.

II. We are to give God the glory of his special grace. Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord. It is their wisdom that they take the Lord for their God. It is their happiness that they are the people whom God has chosen for his own inheritance, whom he protects and cultivates and improves as a man does his inheritance, Deut. xxxii. 9. God beholds all the sons of men with an eye of observation, but his eye of favour and complacency is upon those that fear him. While those that depend on arms and armies, on chariots and horses, perish in the disappointment of their expectations, God's people, under his protection, are safe, for he shall deliver their soul from death when there seems to be but a step between them and it. If he do not deliver the body from temporal death, yet he will deliver the soul from spiritual and eternal death. Their souls, whatever happens, shall live and praise him, either in this world or in a better. He shall keep them alive in famine. When visible means fail, God will find out some way or other to supply them. We must attend the motions of his providence, and accommodate ourselves to them. Our souls must wait for him, v. 20. We must rely on God, hope in his mercy. This is trusting in his holy name (v. 21). We must rejoice in God, v. 21. Our expectations from God are not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage, our applications to him; and therefore the psalm concludes with a short but comprehensive prayer, "Let thy mercy, O Lord! be upon us; let us always have the comfort and benefit of it, not according as we merit from thee, but according as we hope in thee, that is, according to the promise which thou hast in thy word given to us and according to the faith which thou hast by thy Spirit and grace wrought in us."

PSALM XXXIV

This psalm was penned upon a particular occasion, as appears by the title. I. He praises God for the experience which he and others had had of his goodness, ver. 1–6. II. He encourages all good people to trust in God, ver. 7–10. III. He gives good counsel to us all, to make conscience of our duty both to God and man, ver. 11–14. IV. To enforce this good counsel he sets before us good and evil, the blessing and the curse, ver. 15–22.

A psalm of David when he changed his behaviour before Abimelech, who drove him away, and he departed.

David, being forced to flee from his country, which was made too hot for him by the rage of Saul, sought shelter as near it as he could, in the land of the Philistines. There it was soon discovered who he was, and he was brought before the king, here Abimelech (his title); and lest he should be treated as a spy, he feigned himself to be a madman that Achish might dismiss him as a contemptible man, rather than take cognizance of him as a dangerous man. And by this stratagem he escaped the hand that otherwise would have handled him roughly. Even when he was in danger his heart was so fixed, trusting in God, that he penned this excellent psalm, which has as much in it of the marks of a calm sedate spirit as any psalm in all the book; and there is something curious too in the composition, for it is what is called an alphabetical psalm, that is, a psalm in which every verse begins with each letter in its order as it stands in the Hebrew alphabet.

I. David engages and excites himself to praise God. "I will bless the Lord at all times, upon all occasions. His praise shall continually be in my mouth." He will praise him heartily: "My soul shall make her boast in the Lord, in my relation to him, my interest in him, and expectations from him."

II. He calls upon others to join with him herein. He expects they will (v. 2): "The humble shall hear thereof, both of my deliverance and of my thankfulness, and be glad." We cannot make God greater or higher than he is; but if we adore him as infinitely great, and higher than the highest, he is pleased to reckon this magnifying and exalting him. This we must do together. God's praises sound best in concert. David has found him a prayer-hearing God (v. 4): "I sought the Lord, in my distress, entreated his favour, begged his help, and he heard me, answered my request immediately, and delivered me from all my fears, both from the death I feared and from the disquietude and disturbance produced by my fear of it." The former he does by his providence working for us, the latter by his grace working in us, to silence our fears and still the tumult of the spirits. Many besides him have looked unto God by faith and prayer, and have been lightened by it, v. 5. It has wonderfully revived and comforted them; witness Hannah, who, when she had prayed, went her way, and did eat, and her countenance was no more sad. These here spoken of had their expectations raised. Their faces were not ashamed of their confidence. This poor man cried, a single person, mean and inconsiderable, whom no man looked upon with any respect or looked after with any concern; yet he was as welcome to the throne of grace as David or any of his worthies: The Lord heard him, took cognizance of his case and of his prayers, and saved him out of all his troubles, v. 6. The angel of the Lord, a guard of angels (so some), encamps round about those that fear God, as the life-guard about the prince, and delivers them. David would have us to join with him in kind and good thoughts of God (v. 8): O taste and see that the Lord is good! The goodness of God includes both the beauty and amiableness of his being and the bounty and beneficence of his providence and grace. He would have us join with him in a resolution to seek God and serve him, and continue in his fear (v. 9): O fear the Lord! you his saints. Fear the Lord; that is, worship him, and make conscience of your duty to him in everything, not fear him and shun him, but fear him and seek him (v. 10). To encourage us to fear God and seek him, it is here promised that those that do so, even in this wanting world, shall want no good thing. They shall have grace sufficient for the support of the spiritual life (2 Cor. xii. 9; Ps. lxxxiv. 11); and, as to this life, they shall have what is necessary to the support of it from the hand of God: as a Father, he will feed them with food convenient. What further comforts they desire they shall have, as far as Infinite Wisdom sees good, and what they want in one thing shall be made up in another. What God denies them he will give them grace to be content without and then they do not want it, Deut. iii. 26. Paul had all and abounded, because he was content, Phil. iv. 11, 18.

David, in this latter part of the psalm, undertakes to teach children. It does not appear that he had now any children of his own, he instructs the children of his people, and therefore calls together a congregation of them (v. 11): "Come, you children, hearken unto me, leave your play, lay by your toys, and hear what I have to say to you; not only give me the hearing, but observe and obey me." He undertakes to teach them—the fear of the Lord, inclusive of all the duties of religion.

I. He supposes that we all aim to be happy (v. 12): What man is he that desireth life?

II. He prescribes the true and only way to happiness both in this world and that to come, v. 13, 14. 1. We must learn to bridle our tongues, and be careful what we say, that we never speak amiss, to God's dishonour or our neighbour's prejudice: Keep thy tongue from evil speaking, lying, and slandering. 2. We must be upright and sincere in everything we say, and not double-tongued. 3. We must depart from evil, from evil works and evil workers. 4. It is not enough not to do hurt in the world, but we must study to be useful, and live to some purpose. 5. We must seek peace and pursue it; follow peace with all men, willing to deny ourselves a great deal, both in honour and interest, for peace' sake.

III. Here are life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse, plainly stated before us, that we may choose life and live. See Isa. iii. 10, 11.

1. Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with them, however they may bless themselves in their own way. The face of the Lord is against those that do evil, v. 16. Evil shall slay the wicked, v. 21. Their death shall be miserable; and so it will certainly be, though they die on a bed of down or on the bed of honour. The evil here, which slays the wicked, is the same word, in the singular number, that is used (v. 19) for the afflictions of the righteous, to intimate that godly people have many troubles, and yet they do them no hurt, for God will deliver them out of them all; whereas wicked people have fewer troubles, perhaps but one, and yet that one may prove their utter ruin. One trouble with a curse in it kills, but many, with a blessing in them, are harmless, nay, gainful.

2. Yet say to the righteous, It shall be well with them. All good people are under God's special favour and protection. The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous (v. 15), to direct and guide them, to protect and keep them. Parents that are very fond of a child will not let it be out of their sight; none of God's children are ever from under his eye. They cry, and the Lord hears them, and hears them as the tender mother the cry of her sucking child, which another would take no notice of. He not only takes notice of what we say, but is ready to us for our relief (v. 18): He is nigh to those that are of a broken heart, and saves them. He is near them to good purpose. He keepeth all his bones; not only his soul, but his body; not only his body in general, but every bone in it: Not one of them is broken. He that has a broken heart shall not have a broken bone; for David himself had found that, when he had a contrite heart, the broken bones were made to rejoice, li. 8, 17. Many are the afflictions of the righteous, witness David and his afflictions, cxxxii. 1. God has engaged for their deliverance and salvation: He delivers them out of all their troubles (v. 17, 19); he saves them (v. 18), so that, though they may fall into trouble, it shall not be their ruin.

PSALM XXXV

David, in this psalm, appeals to the righteous Judge of heaven and earth against his enemies that hated and persecuted him. It is supposed that Saul and his party are the persons he means, for with them he had the greatest struggles. I. He complains to God of the injuries they did him. II. He pleads his own innocency, that he never gave them any provocation (ver. 7, 19), but, on the contrary, had studied to oblige them, ver. 12–14. III. He prays to God to protect and deliver him. IV. He prophesies the destruction of his persecutors, ver. 4–6, 8. V. He promises himself that he shall yet see better days (ver. 9, 10), and promises God that he will then attend him with his praises, ver. 18, 28.

A psalm of David.

I. David's representation of his case to God, setting forth the restless rage and malice of his persecutors. They persecuted him with an unwearied enmity, sought after his soul (v. 4), that is, his life, no less would satisfy their bloody minds.

II. His appeal to God concerning his integrity and the justice of his cause. If a fellow-subject had wronged him, he might have appealed to his prince, as St. Paul did to Caesar; but, when his prince wronged him, he appealed to his God, who is prince and Judge of the kings of the earth: Plead my cause, O Lord! v. 1.

III. His prayer to God to manifest himself both for him and to him, in this trial. He prays that God would fight against his enemies, so as to disable them to hurt him, and defeat their designs against him. If God be our friend, no matter who is our enemy.

IV. His prospect of the destruction of his enemies, which he prays for, not in malice or revenge. In v. 4–6 Dr. Hammond reads, They shall be confounded, they shall be turned back. This may be taken as a prayer for their repentance, for all penitents are put to shame for their sins and turned back from them. They shall be as chaff before the wind, so unable will wicked men be to stand before the judgments of God. Their way shall be dark and slippery, darkness and slipperiness (so the margin reads it).

V. His prospect of his own deliverance, which, having committed his cause to God, he did not doubt of, v. 9, 10. 1. He hoped that he should have the comfort of it: "My soul shall be joyful, not in my own ease and safety, but in the Lord and in his favour, in his promise and in his salvation according to the promise." He promised that then God should have the glory of it (v. 10): All my bones shall say, Lord, who is like unto thee?

Verses 11–16

Two very wicked things David here lays to the charge of his enemies—perjury and ingratitude.

I. Perjury, v. 11. When Saul would have David attainted of treason, in order to his being outlawed, False witnesses did rise up, who would swear anything; they laid to my charge things that I knew not. This instance of the wrong done to David was typical, and had its accomplishment in the Son of David, against whom false witnesses did arise, Matt. xxvi. 60.

II. Ingratitude. Call a man ungrateful and you can call him no worse. This was the character of David's enemies (v. 12): They rewarded me evil for good. He had deserved well not only of the public in general, but of those particular persons that were now most bitter against him. Probably it was then well known whom he meant; it may be Saul himself.

1. How tenderly, and with what a cordial affection, he had behaved towards them in their afflictions (v. 13, 14). He prayed for them. With his prayers he joined humiliation and self-affliction, both in his diet (he fasted, at least from pleasant bread) and in his dress; he clothed himself with sackcloth, thus expressing his grief, not only for their affliction, but for their sin; for this was the guise and practice of a penitent. His fasting also put an edge upon his praying. He was so intent in his devotions that he had no appetite to meat, nor would allow himself time for eating: My prayer returned into my own bosom.

2. How basely and insolently and with what a brutish enmity, and worse than brutish, they had behaved towards him (v. 15, 16): In my adversity they rejoiced. They gnashed upon him with their teeth. David was the fool in the play, and his disappointment all the table-talk of the hypocritical mockers at feasts; it was the song of the drunkards. Such has often been the hard fate of the best of men. The apostles were made a spectacle to the world.

I. David describes the great injustice, malice, and insolence, of his persecutors, pleading this with God as a reason why he should protect him from them. They hated him without a cause; nay, for that for which they ought rather to have loved and honoured him. This is quoted, with application to Christ, and is said to be fulfilled in him. John xv. 25, They hated me without cause. They speak not peace; if they met him, they had not the good manners to give him the time of the day; like Joseph's brethren, that could not speak peaceably to him, Gen. xxxvii. 4. They opened their mouth wide against me. They set themselves against all the sober good people that adhered to David (v. 20): They devised deceitful matters, to trepan and ruin those that were quiet in the land. He appeals to God against them, the God to whom vengeance belongs, appeals to his knowledge

(v. 22): This thou hast seen. He appeals to God's justice: Awake to my judgment, even to my cause, and let it have a hearing at thy bar, v. 23. "Judge me, O Lord my God! pass sentence upon this appeal, according to the righteousness of thy nature and government," v. 24.

II. He prays earnestly to God to appear graciously for him and his friends, that God would act for him, and not stand by as a spectator (v. 17): "Lord, how long wilt thou look on? Rescue my soul from the destructions they are plotting against it; rescue my darling, my only one, from the lions. My soul is my only one, and therefore the greater is the shame if I neglect it and the greater the loss if I lose it: it is my only one, and therefore ought to be my darling, ought to be carefully protected and provided for. It is my soul that is in danger; Lord, rescue it. He desires that his innocency might be so cleared that they might be ashamed of the calumnies with which they had loaded him, that his interest might be so confirmed that they might be ashamed of their designs against him and their expectations of his ruin, that they might either be brought to that shame which would be a step towards their reformation or that that might be their portion which would be their everlasting misery. Notwithstanding the arts that were used to blacken David, and make him odious, and to frighten people from owning him, there were some that favoured his righteous cause, and he prays for them. Let them say continually, The Lord be magnified, by us and others, who hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servant.

III. The mercy he hoped to win by prayer he promises to wear with praise: "I will give thee thanks, as the author of my deliverance (v. 18), and my tongue shall speak of thy righteousness, the justice of thy judgments and the equity of all thy dispensations."

PSALM XXXVI

I. The sinfulness of sin, and how mischievous it is, ver. 1–4. II. The goodness of God, and how gracious he is, 1. To all his creatures in general, ver. 5, 6. 2. To his own people in a special manner, ver. 7–9. By this the psalmist is encouraged to pray for all the saints (ver. 10), for himself in particular and his own preservation (ver. 11), and to triumph in the certain fall of his enemies, ver. 12. If, in singing this psalm, our hearts be duly affected with the hatred of sin and satisfaction in God's loving-kindness, we sing it with grace and understanding.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David the servant of the Lord.

Verses 1–4

David, in the title of this psalm, is styled the servant of the Lord; why in this, and not in any other, except in xviii (title), no reason can be given; but so he was, not only as every good man is God's servant, but as a king, as a prophet.

David, in these verses, describes the wickedness of the wicked, sin in its causes and sin in its colours, in its root and in its branches.

I. Here is the root of bitterness, from which all the wickedness of the wicked comes. "The transgression of the wicked (as it is described afterwards, v. 3, 4) saith within my heart (makes me to conclude within myself) that there is no fear of God before his eyes: for, if there were, he would not break the laws of God, and violate his covenants with him, if he had any awe of his majesty or dread of his wrath." He flattereth himself in his own eyes; that is, while he goes on in sin he thinks he does wisely and well for himself, and either does not see or will not own the evil and danger of his wicked practices; he calls evil good and good evil; his licentiousness he pretends to be but his just liberty, his fraud passes for his prudence and policy, and his persecuting the people of God, he suggests to himself, is a piece of necessary justice. But the day is coming when the sinner will be undeceived, when his iniquity shall be found to be hateful.

II. Here are the cursed branches which spring from this root of bitterness. The sinner defies God. The words of his mouth are iniquity and deceit, contrived to do wrong, and yet to cover it with specious and plausible pretences. The sparks of virtue are extinguished, their convictions baffled, their good beginnings come to nothing: They have left off to be wise and to do good. He devises mischief upon his bed. Those that leave off to do good begin to do evil. Doing evil themselves, they have no dislike at all of it in others: He abhors not evil, but, on the contrary, takes pleasure in it, and is glad to see others as bad as himself.

David, having looked round with grief upon the wickedness of the wicked, here looks up with comfort upon the goodness of God.

1. His meditations upon the grace of God.

1. The transcendent perfections of the divine nature. Thy mercy, O Lord! is in the heavens. How bad soever the world is, let us never think the worse of God nor of his government; but, let us take occasion, instead of reflecting upon God's purity, as if he countenanced sin, to admire his patience, that he bears so much with those that so impudently provoke him, nay, and causes his sun to shine and his rain to fall upon them. He is a God of inviolable truth: Thy faithfulness reaches unto the clouds. God's faithfulness reaches so high that it does not change with the weather, as men's does, for it reaches to the skies (so it should be read, as some think), above the clouds, and all the changes of the lower region. He is a God of incontestable justice and equity: Thy righteousness is like the great mountains, immovable and inflexible. He is a God of unsearchable wisdom and design: "Thy judgments are a great deep, not to be fathomed with the line and plummet of any finite understanding."

2. The extensive care and beneficence of the divine Providence: "Thou preservest man and beast, not only protectest them from mischief, but suppliest them with that which is needful for the support of life."

3. The peculiar favour of God to the saints.

(1) Their character, v. 7. They are such as are allured by the excellency of God's loving-kindness to put their trust under the shadow of his wings.

(2) Their privilege. They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house, their wants supplied, their cravings gratified, and their capacities filled. In God all-sufficient they shall have enough, all that which an enlightened enlarged soul can desire or receive. A gracious soul, though still desiring more of God, never desires more than God. I have all, and abound, Phil. iv. 18. Their joys shall be constant: Thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures. There are pleasures that are truly divine. "They are thy pleasures, not only which come from thee as the giver of them, but which terminate in thee as the matter and centre of them." There is a river of these pleasures, always full, always fresh, always flowing. The pleasures of sense are putrid puddle-water; those of faith are pure and pleasant, clear as crystal, Rev. xxii. 1. Having God himself for their felicity they have a fountain of life, from which those rivers of pleasure flow, v. 8. In him they have light in perfection, wisdom, knowledge, and joy, all included in this light: In thy light we shall see light. "In the knowledge of thee in grace, and the vision of thee in glory, we shall have that which will abundantly suit and satisfy our understandings." That divine light which shines in the scripture, and especially in the face of Christ, the light of the world, has all truth in it. "In communion with thee now; by the communications of thy grace to us and the return of our devout affections to thee, we have all the good we can desire."

II. We have here David's prayers, intercessions, and holy triumphs, grounded upon these meditations.

1. He intercedes for all saints, v. 10. (1) The persons he prays for are those that know God—the upright in heart, that are sincere in their profession of religion, and faithful both to God and man. (2) The blessing he begs for them is God's loving-kindness (that is, the tokens of his favour towards them) and his righteousness (that is, the workings of his grace in them).

2. He prays for himself, that he might be preserved in his integrity and comfort (v. 11): "Let not the foot of pride come against me, to trip up my heels, or trample upon me; and let not the hand of the wicked, which is stretched out against me, prevail to remove me, either from my purity and integrity, by any temptation, or from my peace and comfort, by any trouble."

PSALM XXXVII

This psalm is a sermon, and an excellent useful sermon it is, calculated not (as most of the psalms) for our devotion, but for our conversation; there is nothing in it of prayer or praise, but it is all instruction; it is "Maschil—a teaching psalm"; it is an exposition of some of the hardest chapters in the book of Providence, the advancement of the wicked and the disgrace of the righteous. The scope of the prophet in this psalm, I. He forbids us to fret at the prosperity of the wicked in their wicked ways, ver. 1, 7, 8. II. He gives very good reasons why we should not fret at it. 1. Because of the scandalous character of the wicked (ver. 12, 14, 21, 32) notwithstanding their prosperity, and the honourable character of the righteous, ver. 21, 26, 30, 31. 2. Because of the destruction and ruin which the wicked are nigh to (ver. 2, 9, 10, 20, 35, 36, 38) and the salvation and protection which the righteous are sure of from all the malicious designs of the wicked, ver. 13, 15, 17, 28, 33, 39, 40. 3. Because of the particular mercy God has in store for all good people and the favour he shows them, ver 11, 16, 18, 19, 22–25, 28, 29, 37. III. He prescribes very good remedies against this sin of envying the prosperity of the wicked, and great encouragement to use those remedies, ver. 3–6, 27, 34.

A psalm of David.

I. We are here cautioned against discontent at the prosperity and success of evildoers (v. 1, 2): Fret not thyself, neither be thou envious. We may suppose that David speaks this to himself first. That is preached best, and with most probability of success, to others, which is first preached to ourselves. When we look abroad we see the world full of evildoers and workers of iniquity, that flourish and prosper. When we look within we find ourselves tempted to fret at this, and to be envious. We are apt to fret at God, as if he were unkind to the world and unkind to his church in permitting such men to live, and prosper, and prevail, as they do. We are apt to envy them the liberty they take in getting wealth, and perhaps by unlawful means, and in the indulgence of their lusts, and to wish that we should shake off the restraints of conscience and do so too. When we look forward with an eye of faith we shall see no reason to envy wicked people their prosperity, for their ruin is at the door and they are ripening apace for it, v. 2. They flourish, but as the grass, and as the green herb, which nobody envies nor frets at. They will soon wither of themselves. Outward prosperity is a fading thing, and so is the life itself to which it is confined.

II. We are here counselled to live a life of confidence in God, and that will keep us from fretting at the prosperity of evil-doers; if we do well for our own souls, we shall see little reason to envy those that do so ill for theirs. Here are three excellent precepts, and three precious promises,

1. We must make God our hope in the way of duty and then we shall have a comfortable subsistence in this world, v. 3. It is required that we trust in the Lord and do good. We must not think to trust in God and then live as we list. It is promised that we shall be well provided for in this world: So shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed. "Thou shalt have a settlement, a quiet settlement, and a maintenance, a comfortable maintenance: Verily thou shalt be fed." Some read it, Thou shalt be fed by faith, as the just are said to live by faith, and it is good living, good feeding, upon the promises.

2. We must make God our heart's delight and then we shall have our heart's desire, v. 4. We were commanded (v. 3) to do good, and then follows this command to delight in God, which is as much a privilege as a duty. And this pleasant duty has a promise annexed to it, He shall give thee the desires of thy heart. He has not promised to gratify all the appetites of the body, but to grant all the desires of the heart, all the cravings of the soul. What is the desire of the heart of a good man? It is this, to know, and love, and live to God, to please him and to be pleased in him.

3. We must make God our guide, and submit in everything to his guidance, and then all our affairs, even those that seem most intricate and perplexed, shall be made to issue well, v. 5, 6. The duty is very easy; and, if we do it aright, it will make us easy: Commit thy way unto the Lord; roll thy way upon the Lord (so the margin reads it), Prov. xvi. 3; Ps. lv. 22. Cast thy burden upon the Lord, the burden of thy care, 1 Pet. v. 7. Reveal thy way unto the Lord (so the LXX), that is, "By prayer spread thy case, and all thy cares about it, before the Lord, and then trust in him to bring it to a good issue, with a full satisfaction that all is well that God does." We must follow Providence, and not force it, subscribe to Infinite Wisdom and not prescribe. The promise is very sweet. "He shall bring that to pass, whatever it is, which thou hast committed to him, if not to thy contrivance, yet to thy content. He will find means to extricate thee out of thy straits, to prevent thy fears, and bring about thy purposes, to thy satisfaction." He shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light and thy judgment as the noon-day" (v. 6), that is, "he shall make it to appear that thou art an honest man, and that is honour enough." If we take care to keep a good conscience, we may leave it to God to take care of our good name.

I. The foregoing precepts inculcated. 1. Let us compose ourselves by believing in God: "Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him" (v. 7), that is, be well reconciled to all he does and acquiesce in it, and be well satisfied that he will still make all to work for good to us, though we know not how or which way. Be silent to the Lord (so the word is), not with a sullen, but a submissive silence. 2. Let us not discompose ourselves at what we see in this world: "Fret not thyself, because of him who prospers in his wicked way, who, though he is a bad man, yet thrives and grows rich and great in the world. If thy heart begins to rise at it, stroke down thy folly, and cease from anger (v. 8). Fret not thyself in any wise to do evil; do not envy them their prosperity, lest thou be tempted to fall in with them and to take the same evil course that they take to enrich and advance themselves or some desperate course to avoid them and their power."

II. The foregoing reasons repeated.

1. Good people have no reason to envy the worldly prosperity of wicked people. Evil-doers shall be cut off by some sudden stroke of divine justice in the midst of their prosperity. The condition of the righteous, even in this life, is every way better and more desirable than that of the wicked, v. 16. A godly man's little is really better than a wicked man's much, see Prov. xv. 16, 17; xiv 8; xxviii. 6. It comes from a better hand, from a hand of special love and not merely from a hand of common providence. Those that wait upon the Lord, as dependents on him, expectants from him, and suppliants to him, shall inherit the earth, as a token of his present favour to them and an earnest of better things intended for them in the other world. The meek shall inherit the earth. Our Saviour has made this a gospel promise, and a confirmation of the blessing he pronounced on the meek, Matt. v. 5. They shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace, v. 11. That peace which the world cannot give (John xiv. 27), they shall delight themselves in. God knows their days, v. 18. He takes particular notice of them, of all they do and of all that happens to them. He keeps account of the days of their service, and not one day's work shall go unrewarded. Their inheritance shall be for ever. Their time on earth is reckoned by days, which will soon be numbered. God takes cognizance of them, and gives them the blessings of every day in its day; but it was never intended that their inheritance should be confined within the limits of those days. No, that must be the portion of an immortal soul, and therefore must last as long as that lasts, and will run parallel with the longest line of eternity itself: Their inheritance shall be for ever; not their inheritance in the earth, but that incorruptible indefeasible one which is laid up for them in heaven.

2. Good people have no reason to fret at the occasional success of the designs of the wicked against the just.

(1) Their plots will be their shame, v. 12, 13. It is true the wicked plotteth against the just. They are proud and insolent, but God despises all their attempts as vain and ineffectual. Men have their day now. God's day will give a decisive judgment.

(2) Their attempts will be their destruction, v. 14, 15. They have drawn the sword, and bent the bow; and all these military preparations are made against the helpless, the poor and needy and against the guiltless, such as are of upright conversation. How justly their malice recoils upon themselves: Their sword shall turn into their own heart.

(3) Those that are not suddenly cut off shall yet be so disabled for doing any further mischief: Their bows shall be broken (v. 15); the instruments of their cruelty shall fail them and their arms shall be broken, so that they shall not be able to go on with their enterprises, v. 17.

Verses 21–33

I. What is required of us as the way to our happiness. If we would be blessed of God, 1. We must make conscience of giving everybody his own; for the wicked borrows and pays not again, v. 21. It is the first thing which the Lord our God requires of us, that we do justly, and render to all their due. 2. We must be ready to all acts of charity and beneficence; for, as it is an instance of God's goodness to the righteous that he puts it into the power of his hand to be kind and to do good, so it is an instance of the goodness of the righteous man that he has a heart proportionable to his estate: He shows mercy, and gives, v. 21. He is ever merciful and lends, and sometimes there is as true charity in lending as in giving. 3. We must leave our sins, and engage in the practice of serious godliness (v. 27): Depart from evil and do good. 4. We must abound in good discourse, and with our tongues must glorify God and edify others. It is part of the character of a righteous man (v. 30) that his mouth speaketh wisdom. Out of the abundance of a good heart will the mouth speak that which is good and to the use of edifying. 5. We must have our wills brought into an entire subjection to the will and word of God (v. 31): The law of God, of his God, is in his heart; and in vain do we pretend that God is our God if we do not receive his law into our hearts and resign ourselves to the government of it.

II. What is assured to us, as instances of our happiness and comfort, upon these conditions.

1. That we shall have the blessing of God, and that blessing shall be the spring, and sweetness, and security of all our temporal comforts and enjoyments (v. 22): Such as are blessed of God, as all the righteous are, with a Father's blessing, by virtue of that shall inherit the earth, or the land (for so the same word is translated, v. 29), the land of Canaan, that glory of all lands.

2. That God will direct and dispose of our actions and affairs so as may be most for his glory (v. 23): The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord. God orders the steps of a good man; not only his way in general, by his written word, but his particular steps, by the whispers of conscience, saying, This is the way, walk in it. He does not always show him his way at a distance, but leads him step by step, as children are led, and so keeps him in a continual dependence upon his guidance.

3. That God will keep us from being ruined by our falls either into sin or into trouble (v. 24): Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down. A good man may be overtaken in a fault, but the grace of God shall recover him to repentance, so that he shall not be utterly cast down. Though he may, for a time, lose the joys of God's salvation, yet they shall be restored to him; for God shall uphold him with his hand, uphold him with his free Spirit. The root shall be kept alive, though the leaf wither; and there will come a spring after the winter.

4. That we shall not want the necessary supports of this life (v. 25): "I have been young and now am old, and, among all the changes I have seen in men's outward condition and the observations I have made upon them, I never saw the righteous forsaken of God and man." There are very few instances of good men, or their families, that are reduced to such extreme poverty as many wicked people bring themselves to by their wickedness. Some make this promise relate especially to those that are charitable and liberal to the poor, and to intimate that David never observed any that brought themselves to poverty by their charity.

5. That God will not desert us, but graciously protect us in our difficulties and straits (v. 28): The Lord loves judgment; he delights in doing justice himself and he delights in those that do justice.

6. That we shall have a comfortable settlement in this world, and in a better when we leave this. That we shall dwell for evermore (v. 27), and not be cut off as the seed of the wicked, v. 28. That we shall inherit the land which the Lord our God gives us and dwell therein for ever, v. 29. But on this earth there is no dwelling for ever, no continuing city; it is in heaven only, that city which has foundations, that the righteous shall dwell for ever; that will be their everlasting habitation.

7. That we shall not become a prey to our adversaries who seek our ruin, v. 32, 33.

The psalmist's conclusion of this sermon.

I. The duty here pressed upon us is still the same (v. 34): Wait on the Lord and keep his way. If we make conscience of keeping God's way, we may with cheerfulness wait on him and commit to him our way; and we shall find him a good Master both to his working servants and to his waiting servants.

II. The reasons to enforce this duty are much the same too, taken from the certain destruction of the wicked and the certain salvation of the righteous.

1. The misery of the wicked at last, however they may prosper awhile: The end of the wicked shall be cut off (v. 38); and that cannot be well that will undoubtedly end so ill. The transgressors shall be destroyed together, v. 38. In this world God singles out here one sinner and there another, out of many, to be made an example in terrorem—as a warning; but in the day of judgment there will be a general destruction of all the transgressors, and not one shall escape.

2. The blessedness of the righteous, at last. Those that keep God's way may be assured that in due time he will exalt them to inherit the land (v. 34); he will advance them to a place in the heavenly mansions, to dignity, and honour, and true wealth, in the New Jerusalem, to inherit that good land, that land of promise, of which Canaan was a type; he will exalt them above all contempt and danger. Let all people mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; take notice of him to observe what comes of him, and you will find that the end of that man is peace. The salvation of the righteous is of the Lord; it will be the Lord's doing. He shall save them, not only keep them safe, but make them happy, because they trust in him.

PSALM XXXVIII

This is one of the penitential psalms; it is full of grief and complaint, from the beginning to the end. David's sins and his afflictions are the cause of his grief and the matter of his complaints. He complains, I. Of God's displeasure, and of his own sin which provoked God against him, ver. 1–5. II. Of his bodily sickness, ver 6–10. III Of the unkindness of his friends, ver. 11. IV. Of the injuries which his enemies did him, pleading his good conduct towards them, yet confessing his sins against God, ver. 12–20. Lastly, he concludes the psalm with earnest prayers to God for his gracious presence and help, ver. 21, 22.

A psalm of David to bring to remembrance.

The title of this psalm is a psalm to bring to remembrance; the 70th psalm, which was likewise penned in a day of affliction, is so entitled.

I. He deprecates the wrath of God and his displeasure in his affliction (v. 1): O Lord! rebuke me not in thy wrath. However God rebukes and chastens us, it may not be in wrath and displeasure, for that will be wormwood and gall in the affliction and misery. Those that would escape the wrath of God must pray against that more than any outward affliction, and be content to bear any outward affliction while it comes from, and consists with, the love of God.

II. He bitterly laments the impressions of God's displeasure upon his soul (v. 2): Thy arrows stick fast in me. He complains of God's wrath as that which inflicted the bodily distemper he was under (v. 3): There is no soundness in my flesh because of thy anger. The bitterness of it, infused in his mind, affected his body; but that was not the worst: it caused the disquietude of his heart, by reason of which he forgot the courage of a soldier, the dignity of a prince, and all the cheerfulness of the sweet psalmist of Israel, and roared terribly, v. 8.

III. He acknowledges his sin to be the cause of all his troubles, and groans more under the load of guilt than any other load, v. 3. He complains that his flesh had no soundness. "It is because of thy anger; that kindles the fire which burns so fiercely"; but, in the next words, he justifies God herein, and takes all the blame upon himself: "It is because of my sin. I have deserved it, and so have brought it upon myself. My own iniquities do correct me." It is sin therefore that this good man complains most of, a burden, a heavy burden (v. 4): "My iniquities have gone over my head, as proud waters over a man that is sinking and drowning, or as a heavy burden upon my head, pressing me down more than I am able to bear or to bear up under." It keeps men from soaring upward and pressing forward. "My wounds stink and are corrupt (as wounds in the body rankle, and fester, and grow foul, for want of being dressed and looked after), and it is through my own foolishness." Sins are wounds (Gen. iv. 23), painful mortal wounds. A slight sore, neglected, may prove of fatal consequence, and so may a slight sin slighted and left unrepented of.

IV. He bemoans himself because of his afflictions, and gives ease to his grief by giving vent to it and pouring out his complaint before the Lord.

1. He was troubled in mind, his conscience was pained, and he had no rest in his own spirit; and a wounded spirit who can bear? He was troubled, or distorted, bowed down greatly, and went mourning all the day long, v. 6.

2. He was sick and weak in body; his loins were filled with a loathsome disease, some swelling, or ulcer, or inflammation (some think a plague-sore, such as Hezekiah's boil), and there was no soundness in his flesh, but, like Job, he was all over distempered. Sickness will tame the strongest body and the stoutest spirit. David was famed for his courage and great exploits; and yet, when God contended with him by bodily sickness and the impressions of his wrath upon his mind, his heart fails him, and he becomes weak as water.

3. His friends were unkind to him (v. 11): My lovers (such as had been merry with him in the day of his mirth) now stand aloof from my sore. Even his kinsmen, that were bound to him by blood and alliance, stood afar off.

V. In the midst of his complaints, he comforts himself with the cognizance God graciously took both of his griefs and of his prayers (v. 9): "Lord, all my desire is before thee. Thou knowest what I want and what I would have: My groaning is not hidden from thee. Thou knowest the burdens I groan under and the blessings I groan after."

I. David complains of the power and malice of his enemies, who, it should seem, not only took occasion from the weakness of his body and the trouble of his mind to insult over him, but took advantage thence to do him a mischief. He has a great deal to say against them, which he humbly offers as a reason why God should appear for him, as xxv. 19, Consider my enemies. "They are very subtle and politic. They lay snares, they imagine deceits, and herein they are restless and unwearied: they do it all the day long. They are very insolent and abusive: When my foot slips, when I make any mistake, or take a false step, they magnify themselves against me; they are pleased with it. They are not only unjust, but very ungrateful: They hate me wrongfully, v. 19. I never did them any ill turn; they render evil for good, v. 20. Many a kindness I have done them, for which I might have expected a return of kindness; but for my love they are my adversaries, cix. 4. "They are my adversaries merely because I follow the thing that" good is. They hated him, not only for his kindness to them, but for his devotion and obedience to God; they hated him because they hated God and all that bear his image.

II. He reflects, with comfort, upon his own peaceable and pious behaviour under all the injuries and indignities that were done him. If still we hold fast our integrity and our peace, who can hurt us? This David did here. He kept his temper, and was not ruffled nor discomposed by any of the mischievous things that were said or done against him (v. 13, 14): I, as a deaf man, heard not. Herein David was a type of Christ, who was as a sheep dumb before the shearer, and, when he was reviled, reviled not again; and both are examples to us not to render railing for railing. He kept close to his God by faith and prayer.

His friends, that should have owned him, and stood by him, and appeared as witnesses for him, withdrew from him, v. 10. But God is a friend that will never fail us if we hope in him. Thou shalt answer, Lord, for me.

III. He here bewails his own follies and infirmities. I am ready to halt, v. 17. This will best be explained by a reflection like this which the psalmist made upon himself in a similar case (lxxiii. 2): My feet were almost gone, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. So here: I was ready to halt, ready to say, I have cleansed my hands in vain. Good men, by setting their sorrow continually before them, have been ready to halt, who, by setting God always before them, have kept their standing. Though before men he could justify himself, before God he will judge and condemn himself (v. 18): "I will declare my iniquity, and not cover it; I will be sorry for my sin, and not make a light matter of it"; and this helped to make him silent under the rebukes of Providence and the reproaches of men.

IV. He concludes with very earnest prayers to God for his gracious presence (v. 21, 22): "Forsake me not, O Lord! though my friends forsake me, and though I deserve to be forsaken by thee. Be not far from me, as my unbelieving heart is ready to fear thou art."

PSALM XXXIX

David seems to have been in a great strait when he penned this psalm, for it is with some difficulty that he composes his spirit himself to take that good counsel which he had given to others (xxxvii) to rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him, without fretting. I. He relates the struggle that was in his breast between grace and corruption, between passion and patience, ver. 1–3. II. He meditates upon the doctrine of man's frailty and mortality, and prays to God to instruct him in it, ver 4–6. III. He applies to God for the pardon of his sins, the removal of his afflictions, and the lengthening out of his life till he was ready for death, ver. 7–13.

To the chief musician, even to Jeduthun. A psalm of David.

David here recollects, and leaves upon record, the workings of his heart under his afflictions.

I. He remembered the covenants he had made with God. When at any time we are tempted to sin we must call to mind the solemn vows we have made against the particular sin we are upon the brink of.

1. He remembers that he had resolved to be circumspect in his walking (v. 1): I said, I will take heed to my ways. Having resolved to take heed to our ways, we must, upon all occasions, remind ourselves of that resolution.

2. He remembers that he had in particular covenanted against tongue-sins. It is not so easy as we could wish not to sin in thought; but, if an evil thought should arise in his mind, he would lay his hand upon his mouth, and suppress it, that it should go no further. "I will keep a bridle, or muzzle, upon my mouth." Watchfulness in the habit is the bridle upon the head; watchfulness in the act and exercise is the hand upon the bridle. He would keep a muzzle upon it, as upon an unruly dog that is fierce and does mischief; by particular steadfast resolution corruption is restrained from breaking out at the lips, and so is muzzled. When he was in company with the wicked he would take heed of saying any thing that might harden them or give occasion to them to blaspheme.

II. Pursuant to these covenants he made a shift with much ado to bridle his tongue (v. 2): I was dumb with silence; I held my peace even from good. But what shall we say of his keeping silence even from good? I rather think it was his weakness; because he might not say anything, he would say nothing, but ran into an extreme.

III. The less he spoke the more he thought and the more warmly. Binding the distempered part did but draw the humour to it: My sorrow was stirred, my heart was hot within me, v. 3. He could bridle his tongue but he could not keep his passion under. Note, Those that are of a fretful discontented spirit ought not to pore much, for, while they suffer their thoughts to dwell upon the causes of the calamity, the fire of their discontent is fed with fuel and burns the more furiously. If therefore we would prevent the mischief of ungoverned passions, we must redress the grievance of ungoverned thoughts.

IV. When he did speak, at last, it was to the purpose: At the last I spoke with my tongue. I rather take it to be, not the breach of his good purpose, but the reformation of his mistake in carrying it too far; he had kept silence from good, but now he would so keep silence no longer.

1. He prays to God to make him sensible of the shortness and uncertainty of life and the near approach of death (v. 4): Lord, make me to know my end and the measure of my days. He does not mean, "Lord, let me know how long I shall live and when I shall die." But, Lord, make me to know my end, means, "Lord, give me wisdom and grace to consider it (Deut. xxxii. 29) and to improve what I know concerning it. Lord, make me to consider the end of my life." It is a final period to our state of probation. To the wicked man it is the end of all joys; to a godly man it is the end of all griefs. When we look upon death as a thing at a distance we are tempted to adjourn the necessary preparations for it; but, when we consider how short life is, we shall see ourselves concerned to do what our hand finds to do, not only with all our might, but with all possible expedition.

2. He meditates upon the brevity and vanity of life, pleading them with God for relief under the burdens of life and pleading them with himself for his quickening to the business of life. Behold, thou hast made my days as a hand-breadth, the breadth of four fingers, a certain dimension, a small one, and the measure whereof we have always about us, always before our eyes. We need no skill in arithmetic wherewith to compute the number of them. No; we have the standard of them at our fingers' end, and it is but one hand-breadth in all. Our time is short, and God has made it so; for the number of our months is with him. It is short, and he knows it to be so: It is as nothing before thee. All time is nothing to God's eternity, much less our share of time. Men's life on earth is vain and therefore it is wisdom to make sure of a better life. All man is all vanity (so it may be read); everything about him is uncertain; nothing is substantial and durable but what relates to the new man. Selah is annexed, as a note commanding observation. "Stop here, and pause awhile, that you may take time to consider and apply this truth, that every man is vanity." For the proof of the vanity of man, as mortal, he here mentions three things, v. 6, First, The vanity of our joys and honours: Surely every man walks (even when he walks in state, when he walks in pleasure) in a shadow, in an image, in a vain show. Secondly, The vanity of our griefs and fears. Surely they are disquieted in vain. The occasions of our trouble are often the creatures of our own fancy and they are always fruitless. Thirdly, The vanity of our cares and toils. Man takes a great deal of pains to heap up riches, and they are but like heaps of manure in the furrows of the field, good for nothing unless they be spread.

The psalmist, in these verses, turns his eyes and heart heaven-ward. When there is no solid satisfaction to be had in the creature it is to be found in God, and in communion with him; and to him we should be driven by our disappointments in the world.

I. His dependence on God, v. 7. He despairs of a happiness in the things of the world, and disclaims all expectations from it: "Now, Lord, what wait I for? Even nothing from the things of sense and time; I have nothing to wish for, nothing to hope for, from this earth." We cannot reckon upon constant health and prosperity, nor upon comfort in any relation; for it is all as uncertain as our continuance here. He takes hold of happiness and satisfaction in God: My hope is in thee.

II. His submission to God, and his cheerful acquiescence in his holy will, v. 9. "Because thou didst it; it did not come to pass by chance, but according to thy appointment." Of every event we may say, "This is the finger of God; it is the Lord's doing," whoever were the instruments.

III. His desire towards God, and the prayers he puts up to him.

1. For the pardoning of his sin and the preventing of his shame, v. 8. Before he prays (v. 10), Remove thy stroke from me, he prays (v. 8), "Deliver me from all my offences, from the guilt I have contracted, the punishment I have deserved." He pleads, Make me not a reproach to the foolish. Wicked people are foolish people; and they then show their folly most when they think to show their wit, by scoffing at God's people.

2. For the removal of his affliction, that he might speedily be eased of his present burdens (v. 10): Remove thy stroke away from me. I am consumed by the blow of thy hand. His sickness prevailed to such a degree that his spirits failed, his strength was wasted, and his body emaciated. Our ways and our doings procure the trouble to ourselves, and we are beaten with a rod of our own making. It is the yoke of our transgressions, though it be bound with his hand, Lam. i. 14. God's rebukes make man's beauty to consume away like a moth. Some make the moth to represent man, who is as easily crushed as a moth with the touch of a finger, Job iv. 19. Others make it to represent the divine rebukes, which silently and insensibly waste and consume us, as the moth does the garment. He pleads the good impressions made upon him by his affliction. He hoped that the end was accomplished for which it was sent, and that therefore it would be removed in mercy. It had set him a-weeping, and he hoped God would take notice of that. Lord, hold not thy peace at my tears, v. 12. He that does not willingly afflict and grieve the children of men, much less his own children, will not hold his peace at their tears, but will either speak deliverance for them or in the meantime speak comfort to them. It had set him a-praying; and afflictions are sent to stir up prayer. It had helped to wean him from the world and to take his affections off from it. Now he began, more than ever, to look upon himself as a stranger and sojourner here, like all his fathers, not at home in this world, but travelling through it to another, to a better, and would never reckon himself at home till he came to heaven.

3. He prays for a reprieve yet a little longer (v. 13): "O spare me, ease me, raise me up from this illness, that I may recover strength both in body and mind, that I may get into a more calm and composed frame of spirit, and may be better prepared for another world, before I go hence by death, and shall be no more in this world." Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee.

PSALM XL

It should seem David penned this psalm upon occasion of his deliverance, by the power and goodness of God, from some great and pressing trouble, by which he was in danger of being overwhelmed; probably it was some trouble of mind arising from a sense of sin and of God's displeasure against him for it. In this psalm, I. David records God's favour to him in delivering him out of his deep distress, with thankfulness to his praise, ver. 1–5. II. Thence he takes occasion to speak of the work of our redemption by Christ, ver. 6–10. III. That gives him encouragement to pray to God for mercy and grace both for himself and for his friends, ver. 11–17.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

Verses 1–5

I. The great distress and trouble that the psalmist had been in.

II. His humble attendance upon God and his believing expectations from him in those depths: I waited patiently for the Lord, v. 1. Waiting, I waited. He expected relief from no other than from God; the same hand that tears must heal, that smites must bind up (Hos. vi. 1), or it will never be done. But he waited patiently, which intimates that the relief did not come quickly; yet he doubted not but it would come, and resolved to continue believing, and hoping, and praying, till it did come. Now this is very applicable to Christ. His agony, both in the garden and on the cross, was the same continued, and it was a horrible pit and miry clay. Then was his soul troubled and exceedingly sorrowful; but then he prayed, Father, glorify thy name; Father, save me; then he kept hold of his relation to his Father, "My God, my God," and thus waited patiently for him.

III. His comfortable experience of God's goodness to him in his distress, which he records for the honour of God and his own and others' encouragement. He inclined unto me and heard my cry. Those that have been under the prevalency of a religious melancholy, and by the grace of God have been relieved, may apply this very feelingly to themselves; they are brought up out of a horrible pit. The mercy is completed by the setting of their feet upon a rock, where they find firm footing, are as much elevated with the hopes of heaven as they were before cast down with the fears of hell. "He has put a new song in my mouth; he has given me cause to rejoice and a heart to rejoice." He was brought, as it were, into a new world, and that filled his mouth with a new song, even praise to our God.

IV. David's experience would be an encouragement to many to hope in God, and, for that end, he leaves it here upon record: Many shall see, and fear, and trust in the Lord. There is a holy reverent fear of God, which is not only consistent with, but the foundation of our hope in him. They shall not fear him and shun him, but fear him and trust in him in their greatest straits, not doubting but to find him as able and ready to help as David did in his distress. The psalmist invites others to make God their hope, as he did, by pronouncing those happy that do so (v. 4): "Blessed is the man that makes the Lord his trust, and respects not the proud, does not do as those do that trust in themselves, nor depends upon those who proudly encourage others to trust in them; for both the one and the other turn aside to lies, as indeed all those do that turn aside from God." This is applicable, particularly, to our faith in Christ. Blessed are those that trust in him, and in his righteousness alone. The joyful sense he had of this mercy led him to observe, with thankfulness, the many other favours he had received from God, v. 5. "Many, O Lord my God, are thy wonderful works which thou hast done, both for me and others; this is but one of many." All his wonderful works are the product of his thoughts to us-ward. They are the projects of infinite wisdom, the designs of everlasting love (1 Cor. ii. 7, Jer. xxxi. 3), thoughts of good and not of evil, Jer. xxix. 11. How the links of the golden chain are joined, is a mystery to us, and what we shall not be able to account for till the veil be rent and the mystery of God finished. When we have said the most we can of the wonders of divine love to us we must conclude with an et cetera—and such like, and adore the depth, despairing to find the bottom.

The psalmist, being struck with amazement at the wonderful works that God had done for his people, is strangely carried out here to foretell that work of wonder which excels all the rest and is the foundation and fountain of all, that of our redemption by our Lord Jesus Christ. This paragraph is quoted by the apostle (Heb. x. 5, &c.) and applied to Christ and his undertaking for us.

I. The utter insufficiency of the legal sacrifices to atone for sin in order to our peace with God and our happiness in him: Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; thou wouldst not have the Redeemer to offer them. Something he must have to offer, but not these (Heb. viii. 3). Even while the law concerning them was in full force it might be said, God did not desire them, nor accept them, for their own sake. They could not take away the guilt of sin by satisfying God's justice. The life of a sheep, which is so much inferior in value to that of a man (Matt. xii. 12), could not pretend to be an equivalent, much less an expedient to preserve the honour of God's government and laws and repair the injury done to that honour by the sin of man. They could not take away the terror of sin by pacifying the conscience, nor the power of sin by sanctifying the nature; it was impossible, Heb. ix. 9; x. 1–4. What there was in them that was valuable resulted from their reference to Jesus Christ, of whom they were types—shadows indeed, but shadows of good things to come, and trials of the faith and obedience of God's people, of their obedience to the law and their faith in the gospel. But the substance must come, which is Christ, who must bring that glory to God and that grace to man which it was impossible those sacrifices should ever do.

II. The designation of our Lord Jesus to the work and office of Mediator: My ears hast thou opened. God the Father disposed him to the undertaking (Isa. l. 5, 6) and then obliged him to go through with it. My ear hast thou digged. It is supposed to allude to the law and custom of binding servants to serve for ever by boring their ear to the doorpost; see Exod. xxi. 6.

III. His own voluntary consent to this undertaking: "Then said I, Lo, I come; then, when sacrifice and offering would not do, rather than the work should be undone, I said, Lo, I come, to enter the lists with the powers of darkness, and to advance the interests of God's glory and kingdom." He freely offered himself to this service. He firmly obliged himself to it: "I come; I promise to come in the fulness of time." He frankly owned himself engaged: He said, Lo, I come, said it all along to the Old Testament saints, who therefore knew him by the title of ὁ ἐρχόμενος—He that should come.

IV. The reason why he came, in pursuance of his undertaking—because in the volume of the book it was written of him, 1. In the close rolls of the divine decree and counsel; there it was written that his ear was opened, and he said, Lo, I come; there the covenant of redemption was recorded.

V. The pleasure he took in his undertaking. Having freely offered himself to it, he did not fail, nor was discouraged, but proceeded with all possible satisfaction to himself (v. 8, 9): I delight to do thy will, O my God!

VI. The publication of the gospel to the children of men, even in the great congregation, v. 9, 10. The same that as a priest wrought out redemption for us, as a prophet, by his own preaching first, then by his apostles, and still by his word and Spirit, makes it known to us. The great salvation began to be spoken by the Lord, Heb. ii. 3. What is preached is righteousness (v. 9), God's righteousness (v. 10), God's faithfulness to his promise, God's loving-kindness and his truth, his mercy according to his word. It is preached—to the congregation, v. 9, and again v. 10. The gospel was preached both to Jews and Gentiles, to great congregations of both. It is preached—freely and openly: I have not refrained my lips; I have not hid it; I have not concealed it.

The psalmist, having meditated upon the work of redemption, and spoken of it in the person of the Messiah, now speaks in his own person.

I. This may encourage us to pray for the mercy of God, and to put ourselves under the protection of that mercy, v. 11. "Lord, thou hast not spared thy Son, nor withheld him; withhold not thou thy tender mercies then, which thou hast laid up for us in him; for wilt thou not with him also freely give us all things? Rom. viii. 32. Let thy lovingkindness and thy truth continually preserve me."

II. This may encourage us in reference to the guilt of sin, that Jesus Christ has done that towards our discharge from it which sacrifice and offering could not do. The psalmist saw his iniquities to be evils, the worst of evils; he saw that they compassed him about more than the hairs of his head. The sight of sin so oppressed him that he could not hold up his head—I am not able to look up; much less could he keep up his heart—therefore my heart fails me. With what a holy passion does he cry out, "Be pleased, O Lord! to deliver me (v. 13). In a case of this nature, where the bliss of an immortal soul is concerned, delays are dangerous; therefore, O Lord! make haste to help me."

III. This may encourage us to hope for victory over our spiritual enemies that seek after our souls to destroy them (v. 14). If Christ has triumphed over them, we, through him, shall be more than conquerors. In the belief of this we may pray, with humble boldness, Let them be ashamed and confounded together, and driven backward, v. 14. Let them be desolate, v. 15. When a child of God is brought into that horrible pit, and the miry clay, Satan cries Aha! aha! thinking he has gained his point; but he shall rage when he sees the brand plucked out of the fire, and shall be desolate, for a reward of his shame.

IV. This may encourage all that seek God, and love his salvation, to rejoice in him and to praise him, v. 16.

V. This may encourage the saints, in distress and affliction, to trust in God and comfort themselves in him, v. 17. David himself was one of these: I am poor and needy, yet the Lord thinketh upon me in and through the Mediator, by whom we are made accepted.

PSALM XLI

God's kindness and truth have often been the support and comfort of the saints when they have had experience of men's unkindness and treachery. David found his enemies very barbarous, but his God very gracious. I. He here comforts himself in his communion with God under his sickness, by faith receiving and laying hold of God's promises (ver. 1–3) and lifting up his heart in prayer, ver. 4. II. He represents the malice of his enemies against him, ver. 5–9. III. He leaves his case with God (ver. 10–12), and so the psalm concludes with a doxology, ver. 13. Is any afflicted with sickness? let him sing the beginning of this psalm. Is any persecuted by enemies? let him sing the latter end of it.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

Verses 1–4

I. God's promises of succour and comfort to those that consider the poor;

1. David makes mention of these with application either, (1) To his friends, who were kind to him, Blessed is he that considers poor David. The provocations which his enemies gave him did but endear his friends so much the more to him. Or, (2) To himself. He had considered the poor and had provided for their relief, and therefore was sure God would, according to his promise, strengthen and comfort him in his sickness.

2. We must regard them more generally with application to ourselves. Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. The mercy which is required of us is to consider the poor or afflicted, whether in mind, body, or estate. We must take notice of their affliction and enquire into their state, must sympathise with them and judge charitably concerning them. He that considers the poor shall be blessed upon the earth. This branch of godliness, as much as any, has the promise of the life that now is and is usually recompensed with temporal blessings. Those who thus distinguish themselves from those that have hard hearts God will distinguish from those that have hard usage. "They shall be preserved and kept alive, when the arrows of death fly thickly round about them." The goodwill of a God that loves us is sufficient to secure us from the ill-will of all that hate us, men and devils; and that goodwill we may promise ourselves if we have considered the poor and helped to relieve and rescue them. In sickness (v. 3): The Lord will strengthen him, both in body and mind, upon the bed of languishing, on which he had lain sick, and he will make all his bed—a very condescending expression, alluding to the care of those that nurse and tend sick people, especially of mothers for their children when they are sick, which is to make their beds easy for them. He will make all his bed from head to foot, so that no part shall be uneasy; he will turn his bed (so the word is), to shake it up and make it very easy; or he will turn it into a bed of health. He has not promised that they shall never be sick, nor that their sickness shall not be unto death; but he has promised to enable them to bear their affliction with patience, and cheerfully to wait the issue. The soul shall by his grace be made to dwell at ease when the body lies in pain.

II. David's prayer, directed and encouraged by these promises (v. 4): I said, Heal my soul. Sin is the sickness of the soul; pardoning mercy heals it; renewing grace heals it; and this spiritual healing we should be more earnest for than for bodily health.

David often complains of the insolent conduct of his enemies towards him when he was sick. My enemies speak evil of me, designing thereby to grieve his spirit, to ruin his reputation.

I. His enemies longed for his death: When shall he die, and his name perish with him? They envied him his name, and the honour he had won, and doubted not but, if he were dead, that would be laid in the dust with him; but his name lives and flourishes to this day in the sacred writings, and will to the end of time; for the memory of the just is, and shall be, blessed. They picked up everything they could to reproach him with (v. 6): "If he come to see me" (as it has always been reckoned a piece of neighbourly kindness to visit the sick) "he speaks vanity; that is, he pretends friendship, but it is all flattery and falsehood." We complain, and justly, of the want of sincerity in our days, and that there is scarcely any true friendship to be found among men; but it seems, by this, that the former days were no better than these. They make invidious remarks upon everything he said or did: His heart gathereth iniquity to itself, puts ill constructions upon everything. If he prayed, or gave them good counsel, they would banter it, and call it canting; if he kept silence from good, when the wicked were before him, they would say that he had forgotten his religion now that he was sick. They whispered together against him (v. 7), speaking that secretly in one another's ears which they could not for shame speak out, and which, if they did, they knew would be confuted. Whisperers and backbiters are put together among the worst of sinners, Rom. i. 29, 30. "The disease he is now under will certainly make an end of him; for it is the punishment of some great enormous crime, which he will not be brought to repent of, and proves him, however he has appeared, a son of Belial." There was one particularly in whom he had reposed a great deal of confidence, that took part with his enemies (v. 9): My own familiar friend; probably he means Ahithophel, who had been his bosom-friend and prime-minister of state, in whom he trusted, and who did eat of his bread, that is, with whom he had been very intimate. Yet this base and treacherous confidant of David's forgot all the eaten bread, and lifted up his heel against him that had lifted up his head. Let us not think it strange if we receive abuses from such: David did, and the Son of David; our Saviour himself so expounds this, and therefore gave Judas the sop, that the scripture might be fulfilled, He that eats bread with me has lifted up his heel against me, John xiii. 18, 26. Nay, have not we ourselves behaved thus perfidiously and disingenuously towards God? We eat of his bread daily, and yet lift up the heel against him.

II. How did David bear this insolent ill-natured conduct of his enemies towards him. He said nothing to them, but turned himself to God: "O Lord! be thou merciful to me, for they are unmerciful, v. 10. Raise me up that I may requite them, that I may render them good for evil" (so some), for that was David's practice, vii. 4; xxxv. 13. They hoped for his death, but he found himself, through mercy, recovering, and this would add to the comfort of his recovery. "Because thou dost, by thy grace, uphold me in my integrity, I know that thou wilt, in thy glory, set me for ever before thy face." The best man in the world holds his integrity no longer than God upholds him in it; for by his grace we are what we are; if we be left to ourselves, we shall not only fall, but fall away. The psalm concludes with a solemn doxology, or adoration of God as the Lord God of Israel, v. 13. It is not certain whether this verse pertains to this particular psalm or whether it was added as the conclusion of the first book of Psalms, which is reckoned to end here (the like being subjoined to lxxii, lxxxix, cvi), and then it teaches us to make God the Omega who is the Alpha, to make him the end who is the beginning of every good work.

PSALM XLII

If the book of Psalms be, as some have styled it, a mirror or looking-glass of pious and devout affections, this psalm in particular deserves to be so entitled. Gracious desires are here strong and fervent; gracious hopes and fears, joys and sorrows, are here struggling, but the pleasing passion comes off a conqueror. Or we may take it for a conflict between sense and faith, sense objecting and faith answering. I. Faith begins with holy desires towards God and communion with him, ver. 1, 2. II. Sense complains of the darkness and cloudiness of the present condition, aggravated by the remembrance of the former enjoyments, ver. 3, 4. III. Faith silences the complaint with the assurance of a good issue at last, ver. 5. IV. Sense renews its complaints of the present dark and melancholy state, ver. 6, 7. V. Faith holds up the heart, notwithstanding, with hope that the day will dawn, ver. 9. VI. Sense repeats its lamentations (ver. 9, 10) and sighs out the same remonstrance it had before made of its grievances. VII. Faith gets the last word (ver. 11), for the silencing of the complaints of sense. The title does not tell us who was the penman of this psalm, but most probably it was David, and we may conjecture that it was penned by him at a time when, either by Saul's persecution or Absalom's rebellion, he was driven from the sanctuary and cut off from the privilege of waiting upon God in public ordinances.

To the chief musician, Maschil, for the sons of Korah.

Verses 1–5

Holy love to God is the very life and soul of religion. Here we have some of the expressions of that love.

I. Holy love thirsting, love upon the wing, soaring upwards in holy desires towards the Lord and towards the remembrance of his name (v. 1, 2): "My soul panteth, thirsteth, for God, for nothing more than God, but still for more and more of him."

1. David thus expressed his vehement desire towards God, when he was debarred from his outward opportunities of waiting on God, when he was banished to the land of Jordan, a great way off from the courts of God's house. Note, Sometimes God teaches us effectually to know the worth of mercies by the want of them, and whets our appetite for the means of grace by cutting us short in those means. He now went mourning, but he went on panting.

2. What is the object of his desire and what it is he thus thirsts after. He pants after God, he thirsts for God, not the ordinances themselves, but the God of the ordinances. Living souls can never take up their rest anywhere short of a living God. He longs to come and appear before God,—to make himself known to him, as being conscious to himself of his own sincerity,—to attend on him, as a servant appears before his master. To appear before God is as much the desire of the upright as it is the dread of the hypocrite.

3. What is the degree of this desire. His longing for the water of the well of Bethlehem was nothing to this. He compares it to the panting of a hart, or deer, which is naturally hot and dry, especially of a hunted buck, after the water-brooks. Thus earnestly does a gracious soul desire communion with God.

II. Holy love mourning for God's present withdrawings (v. 3): "My tears have been my meat day and night during this forced absence from God's house." Even the royal prophet was a weeping prophet when he wanted the comforts of God's house. His tears were mingled with his meat; nay, they were his meat day and night; he fed, he feasted, upon his own tears. His enemies teased him: They continually say unto me, Where is thy God? Because he was absent from the ark, the token of God's presence, they concluded he had lost his God. Those are mistaken who think that when they have robbed us of our Bibles, and our ministers, and our solemn assemblies, they have robbed us of our God; for, though God has tied us to them when they are to be had, he has not tied himself to them. We know where our God is, and where to find him, when we know not where his ark is, nor where to find that. Wherever we are there is a way open heaven-ward. Because God did not immediately appear for his deliverance they concluded that he had abandoned him; but herein also they were deceived: it does not follow that the saints have lost their God because they have lost all their other friends. However, by this base reflection on God and his people, they added affliction to the afflicted, and that was what they aimed at. Nothing is more grievous to a gracious soul than that which is intended to shake its hope and confidence in God. David remembered the days of old, and then his soul was poured out in him; he melted away, and the thought almost broke his heart. He poured out his soul within him in sorrow, and then poured out his soul before God in prayer. It was not the remembrance of the pleasures at court, or the entertainments of his own house, from which he was now banished, that afflicted him, but the remembrance of the free access he had formerly had to God's house. He went to the house of God, though in his time it was but a tent; at the time of his being persecuted by Saul, the ark was in a private house, 2 Sam. vi. 3. But the meanness of the place did not lessen his esteem of that sacred symbol of the divine presence. He went with the multitude, and thought it no disparagement to his dignity to be at the head of a crowd in attending upon God. Nay, this added to the pleasure of it, that he was accompanied with a multitude, and therefore it is twice mentioned, as that which he greatly lamented the want of now. He went with the voice of joy and praise, not only with joy and praise in his heart, but with the outward expressions of it. He went to keep holy-days, not to keep them in vain mirth and recreation, but in religious exercises.

III. Holy love hoping (v. 5): Why art thou cast down, O my soul? His sorrow was upon a very good account, and yet it must not exceed its due limits, nor prevail to depress his spirits; he therefore communes with his own heart, for his relief. "Thou art disquieted, in confusion and disorder; now why art thou so?" Our disquietudes would in many cases vanish before a strict scrutiny into the grounds and reasons of them. "Why am I cast down? Is there a cause, a real cause? Have not others more cause, that do not make so much ado? Have not we, at the same time, cause to be encouraged?" A believing confidence in God is a sovereign antidote against prevailing despondency and disquietude of spirit. And therefore, when we chide ourselves for our dejections, we must charge ourselves to hope in God; when the soul embraces itself it sinks; if it catch hold on the power and promise of God, it keeps the head above water. Hope thou in God for I shall yet praise him; I shall experience such a change in my spirit that I shall not want a heart for praise. We shall praise him for the help of his countenance, for his favour, the support we have by it and the satisfaction we have in it.

Complaints and comforts here take their turn, like day and night in the course of nature.

I. He complains of the dejections of his spirit, but comforts himself with the thoughts of God, v. 6. His soul was dejected, and he goes to God and tells him so: O my God! my soul is cast down within me. He had often remembered God and was comforted, and therefore had recourse to that expedient now. He was now driven to the utmost borders of the land of Canaan, to shelter himself there from the rage of his persecutors—sometimes to the country about Jordan, and, when discovered there, to the land of the Hermonites, or to a hill called Mizar, or the little hill. Wherever he went he took his religion along with him. In all these places, he remembered God, and lifted up his heart to him, and kept his secret communion with him. Distance and time could not make him forget that which his heart was so much upon and which lay so near it.

II. He complains of the tokens of God's displeasure against him, but comforts himself with the hopes of the return of his favour in due time.

1. He saw his troubles coming from God's wrath, and that discouraged him (v. 7): "Deep calls unto deep, one affliction comes upon the neck of another, as if it were called to hasten after it; and thy waterspouts give the signal and sound the alarm of war." The waves and billows are under a divine check. Let not good men think it strange if they be exercised with many and various trials, and if they come thickly upon them; God knows what he does, and so shall they shortly.

2. He expected his deliverance to come from God's favour (v. 8): Yet the Lord will command his loving-kindness. After the storm there will come a calm, and the prospect of this supported him when deep called unto deep. He eyes the favour of God as the fountain of all the good he looked for. God's conferring his favour is called his commanding it. This intimates the freeness of it; we cannot pretend to merit it, but it is bestowed in a way of sovereignty, he gives like a king. By commanding his lovingkindness, he commands down the waves and the billows, and they shall obey him. This he will do in the daytime, for God's lovingkindness will make day in the soul at any time. If God command his lovingkindness for him, he will meet it, and bid it welcome, with his best affections and devotions. He will rejoice in God: In the night his song shall be with me. My prayer shall be to the God of my life. God is the God of our life, in whom we live and move, the author and giver of all our comforts; and therefore to whom should we apply by prayer, but to him?

III. He complains of the insolence of his enemies, and yet comforts himself in God as his friend, v. 9–11. He did not break out into indecent passions, but silently wept out his grief and for this we cannot blame him: it must needs grieve a man that truly loves his country, to see himself persecuted, as if he were an enemy to it. Yet David ought not hence to have concluded that God had forgotten him and cast him off. Why go I mourning? and why hast thou forgotten me? We may complain to God, but we are not allowed thus to complain of him. They say daily unto me, Where is thy God?—a reproach which was intended to discourage his hope in God. His comfort is that God is his rock (v. 9)—a rock to build upon, a rock to take shelter in. To God his rock he might say what he had to say, and be sure of a gracious audience. He therefore repeats what he had before said (v. 5), and concludes with it (v. 11): Why art thou cast down, O my soul? But here, at length, his faith came off a conqueror and forced the enemies to quit the field. And he gains this victory, (1) By repeating what he had before said, chiding himself, as before, for his dejections and disquietudes, and encouraging himself to trust in the name of the Lord and to stay himself upon his God. It may be of great use to us to think our good thoughts over again, and, if we do not gain our point with them at first, perhaps we may the second time.

PSALM XLIII

This psalm, it is likely, was penned upon the same occasion with the former, and, having no title, may be looked upon as an appendix to it; the malady presently returning, he had immediate recourse to the same remedy, because he had entered it in his book, with a "probatum est—it has been proved", upon it. Christ himself, when there was occasion, prayed a second and third time "saying the same words", Matt. xxvi. 44. In this psalm, I. David appeals to God concerning the injuries that were done him by his enemies, ver. 1, 2. II. He prays to God to restore to him the free enjoyment of public ordinances again, and promises to make a good improvement of them, ver. 3, 4. III. He endeavours to still the tumult of his own spirit with a lively hope and confidence in God (ver. 5).

David here makes application to God, by faith and prayer, as his judge, his strength, his guide, his joy, his hope.

I. As his Judge (v. 1): Judge me, O God! and plead my cause. There were those that impeached him; against them he is defendant. Here was a sinful body of men, whom he calls an ungodly or unmerciful nation. And here was one bad man the head of them, a deceitful and unjust man, most probably Saul, who not only showed no kindness to David, but dealt most perfidiously and dishonestly with him. If Absalom was the man he meant, his character was no better. As to the quarrel God had with him for sin, he prays, "Enter not into judgment with me, for then I shall be condemned"; but, as to the quarrel his enemies had with him he prays, "Lord, judge me, for I know that I shall be justified; plead my cause against them, take my part, and in thy providence appear on my behalf."

II. As his strength, his all-sufficient strength; so he eyes God (v. 2): "Thou art the God of my strength, my God, my strength, from whom all my strength is derived, in whom I strengthen myself, who hast often strengthened me, and without whom I am weak as water and utterly unable either to do or suffer anything for thee." David now went mourning, destitute of spiritual joys, yet he found God to be the God of his strength. If we cannot comfort ourselves in God, we may stay ourselves upon him, and may have spiritual supports when we want spritual delights. "Thou art the God on whom I depend as my strength; why then dost thou cast me off?" This was a mistake; for God never cast off any that trusted in him, whatever melancholy apprehensions they may have had of their own state.

III. As his guide, his faithful guide (v. 3): Lead me, bring me to thy holy hill. His heart is upon the holy hill and the tabernacles, not upon his family-comforts, his court-preferments, or his diversions; but he is impatient to see God's tabernacles again. In order to this he prays, "Send out thy light and thy truth; let me have this as a fruit of thy favour, which is light, and the performance of thy promise, which is truth." We are still to pray for God's light and truth, the Spirit of light and truth, who supplies the want of Christ's bodily presence, to lead us into the mystery of godliness and to guide us in the way to heaven.

IV. As his joy, his exceeding joy. If God guide him to his tabernacles, if he restore him to his former liberties, he knows very well what he has to do: Then will I go unto the altar of God, v. 4. He will get as near as he can unto God, his exceeding joy. Those that come unto God must come to him as their exceeding joy, not only as their future bliss, but as their present joy, and that not a common, but an exceeding joy, far exceeding all the joys of sense and time. The phrase, in the original, is very emphatic—unto God the gladness of my joy, or of my triumph.

V. As his hope, his never-failing hope, v. 5. Here, as before, David quarrels with himself for his dejections and despondencies: Why art thou cast down O my soul? He then quiets himself in the believing expectation he had of giving glory to God (Hope in God, for I shall yet praise him) and of enjoying glory with God; (He is the health of my countenance and my God.)

PSALM XLIV

We are not told who was the penman of this psalm or when and upon what occasion it was penned. It is a psalm calculated for a day of fasting and humiliation upon occasion of some public calamity, either pressing or threatening. In it the church is taught, I. To own with thankfulness, to the glory of God, the great things God has done for their fathers, ver. 1–8. II. To exhibit a memorial of their present calamitous estate, ver. 9–16. III. To file a protestation of their integrity and adherence to God notwithstanding, ver. 17–22. IV. To lodge a petition at the throne of grace for succour and relief, ver. 22–26.

To the chief musician for the sons of Korah, Maschil.

Verses 1–8

In these verses the church, though now trampled upon, calls to remembrance the days of her triumph. This is mentioned here, 1. As an aggravation of the present distress. The yoke of servitude cannot but lie very heavily on the necks of those that used to wear the crown of victory; and the tokens of God's displeasure must needs be most grievous to those that have been long accustomed to the tokens of his favour. 2. As an encouragement to hope that God would yet turn again their captivity; accordingly he mixes prayers and comfortable expectations with his record of former mercies.

I. Their commemoration of the great things God had formerly done for them. Our fathers have told us what work thou didst in their days. "They have told us the work which thou didst"; for there is a wonderful harmony and uniformity in all that God does, and the many wheels make but one wheel (Ezek. x. 13), many works make but one work. It is a debt which every age owes to posterity to keep an account of God's works of wonder, and to transmit the knowledge of them to the next generation. Children must attend to what their parents tell them of the wonderful works of God. How wonderfully God planted Israel in Canaan at first, v. 2, 3. This was not owing to their own merit, but to God's favour and free grace: It was through the light of thy countenance, because thou hadst a favour to them. It was not by their own sword that they got the land in possession, though they had great numbers of mighty men; nor did their own arm save them from being driven back by the Canaanites and put to shame. It was God that planted Israel in that good land, as the careful husbandman plants a tree, from which he promises himself fruit. This is applicable to the planting of the Christian church in the world, by the preaching of the gospel. Paganism was driven out, as the Canaanites, not all at once, but by little and little, not by any human policy or power (for God chose to do it by the weak and foolish things of the world), but by the wisdom and power of God—Christ by his Spirit went forth conquering and to conquer; and the remembrance of that is a great support and comfort to those that groan under the yoke of antichristian tyranny. Thou hast, many a time, saved us from our enemies, and hast put to flight, and so put to shame, those that hated us, witness the successes of the judges against the nations that oppressed Israel. Many a time have the persecutors of the Christian church, and those that hate it, been put to shame by the power of truth, Acts vi. 10.

II. The good use they make of this record of the great things God had done for their fathers of old. They had taken God for their sovereign Lord (v. 4): Thou art my King, O God! The psalmist speaks for himself here: "Lord, Thou art my King; whither shall I go with my petitions, but to thee? The favour I ask is not for myself, but for thy church." They had always applied to him by prayer for deliverance when at any time they were in distress: Command deliverances for Jacob. "Command it, as one having authority, whose command will be obeyed." As they owned it was not their own sword and bow that had saved them (v. 3), so neither did they trust to their own sword or bow to save them for the future (v. 6): "I will not trust in my bow, nor in any of my military preparations, as if those would stand me in stead without God. Through thy name (by virtue of thy wisdom directing us, thy power strengthening us and working for us, and thy promise securing success to us) we shall, we will, tread those under that rise up against us. In God we have boasted; in him we do and will boast, every day, and all the day long."

The people of God here complain to him of the low and afflicted condition that they were now in, under the prevailing power of their enemies and oppressors.

I. They wanted the usual tokens of God's favour to them and presence with them (v. 9): "Thou hast cast off; thou seemest to have cast us off and our cause, and so hast put us to shame." God's people, when they are cast down, are tempted to think themselves cast off and forsaken of God; but it is a mistake.

II. They were put to the worst before their enemies in the field of battle (v. 10): Thou makest us to turn back from the enemy, as Joshua complained when they met with a repulse at Ai (Joshua vii. 8): "We are dispirited. Attempts to shake off the Babylonish yoke have been ineffectual, and we have rather lost ground by them."

III. They were doomed to the sword and to captivity (v. 11): "Thou hast given us like sheep appointed for meat. They make no more scruple of killing an Israelite than of killing a sheep." They looked upon themselves as bought and sold, and charged it upon God, Thou sellest thy people, when they should have charged it upon their own sin. Thou dost not increase thy wealth by their price, intimating that they could have suffered this contentedly if they had been sure that it would redound to the glory of God.

IV. They were loaded with contempt, and all possible ignominy was put upon them. In this also they acknowledge God: "Thou makest us a reproach." The heathen, the people that were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel and aliens to the covenants of promise, made them a by-word. The reproach was constant and incessant (v. 15): My confusion is continually before me. The shame of my face has covered me. It reflected upon God himself; the reproach which the enemy and the avenger cast upon them was downright blasphemy against God, v. 16, and 2 Kings xix. 3.

The people of God, being greatly afflicted and oppressed, here apply to him.

I. By way of appeal, concerning their integrity, though they suffered these hard things, yet they kept close to God and to their duty (v. 17): "All this has come upon us, and it is as bad perhaps as bad can be, yet have we not forgotten thee, neither cast off the thoughts of thee nor deserted the worship of thee; for, though we cannot deny but that we have dealt foolishly, yet we have not dealt falsely in thy covenant, so as to cast thee off and take to other gods. Though idolaters were our conquerors, yet we have not therefore forsaken thee." The trouble they had been long in was very great: "We have been sorely broken in the place of dragons, among men as fierce, and furious, and cruel, as dragons. We have been covered with the shadow of death, that is, we have been under deep melancholy and apprehensive of nothing short of death. Though thou hast slain us, we have continued to trust in thee: Our heart has not turned back; we have not secretly withdrawn our affections from thee, neither have our steps declined from thy way (v. 18), the way which thou hast appointed us to walk in." While our troubles do not drive us from our duty to God we should not suffer them to drive us from our comfort in God; for he will not leave us if we do not leave him. "If we have forgotten the name of our God, under pretence that he had forgotten us, or in our distress have stretched out our hands to a strange god, as more likely to help us, shall not God search this out? Shall he not judge it, and call us to an account for it?" They suffered these hard things because they kept close to God and to their duty (v. 22): "It is for thy sake that we are killed all the day long, because we stand related to thee, are called by thy name, call upon thy name, and will not worship other gods."

II. By way of petition, with reference to their present distress, that God would work deliverance for them. Awake, arise, v. 23. Arise for our help; redeem us (v. 26). They had complained (v. 12) that God had sold them; here they pray (v. 26) that God would redeem them; for there is no appealing from God, but by appealing to him. They had complained (v. 9), Thou hast cast us off; but here they pray (v. 23), "Cast us not off for ever; let us not be finally forsaken of God." The expostulations are very moving: Why sleepest thou? v. 23. The expression is figurative (as lxxviii. 65, Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep); but it was applicable to Christ in the letter (Matt. viii. 24); he was asleep when his disciples were in a storm, and they awoke him, saying, Lord, save us, we perish. They plead the poor sinner's pleas. "Our soul is bowed down to the dust under prevailing grief and fear. We have become as creeping things, the most despicable animals: Our belly cleaves unto the earth; we cannot lift up ourselves, neither revive our own drooping spirits nor recover ourselves out of our low and sad condition, and we lie exposed to be trodden on by every insulting foe. O redeem us for thy mercies' sake."

PSALM XLV

This psalm is an illustrious prophecy of Messiah the Prince: it is all over gospel, and points at him only, as a bridegroom espousing the church to himself and as a king ruling in it and ruling for it. It is probable that our Saviour has reference to this psalm when he compares the kingdom of heaven, more than once, to a nuptial solemnity, the solemnity of a royal nuptial, Matt. xxii. 2; xxv. 1. The preface speaks the excellency of the song, ver. 1. The psalm speaks, I. Of the royal bridegroom, who is Christ. 1. The transcendent excellency of his person, ver. 2. 2. The glory of his victories, ver. 3–5. 3. The righteousness of his government, ver. 6, 7. 4. The splendour of his court, ver. 8, 9. II. Of the royal bride, which is the church. 1. Her consent gained, ver. 10, 11. 2. The nuptials solemnised, ver. 12–15. 3. The issue of this marriage ver. 16, 17.

To the chief musician upon Shoshannim, for the sons of Korah, Maschil. A song of loves.

Some make Shoshannim, in the title, to signify an instrument of six strings; others take it in its primitive signification for lilies or roses, which probably were strewed, with other flowers, at nuptial solemnities. It is a song of loves, concerning the holy love that is between Christ and his church. It is a song of the well-beloved, the virgins, the companions of the bride (v. 14), prepared to be sung by them.

I. The preface (v. 1) speaks, 1. The dignity of the subject. It is a good matter. It is touching the King, King Jesus, and his kingdom and government. 2. The excellency of the management. This song was a confession with the mouth of faith in the heart concerning Christ and his church. My heart is inditing it. We speak best of Christ and divine things when we speak from the heart that which has warmed and affected us. It was well expressed: I will speak of the things which I have made. Not, "I will speak the things I have heard from others," that is speaking by rote; but, "the things which I have myself studied. My tongue is as the pen of a ready writer, guided by my heart in every word as the pen is by the hand." We call the prophets the penmen of scripture, whereas really they were but the pen. The tongue of the most subtle disputant, and the most eloquent orator, is but the pen with which God writes what he pleases.

II. In these verses the Lord Jesus is represented,

1. As most beautiful and amiable in himself. It is a marriage-song; and therefore the transcendent excellencies of Christ are represented by the beauty of the royal bridegroom (v. 2): Thou art fairer than the children of men, than any of them. He proposed (v. 1) to speak of the King, but immediately directs his speech to him. Those that have an admiration and affection for Christ love to go to him and tell him so. Thou art fair, thou art fairer than the children of men.

2. As the great favourite of heaven. He is fairer than the children of men. He has grace, and he has it for us: Grace is poured into thy lips. By his word, his promise, his gospel, the goodwill of God is made known to us and the good work of God is begun and carried on in us. The gospel of grace is poured into his lips; for it began to be spoken by the Lord, and from him we receive it. He has the words of eternal life. The spirit of prophecy is put into thy lips; so the Chaldee. "Therefore, because thou art the great trustee of divine grace for the use and benefit of the children of men, therefore God has blessed thee for ever, has made thee an everlasting blessing, so that in thee all the nations of the earth shall be blessed."

3. As victorious over all his enemies. The royal bridegroom is to rescue his spouse by dint of sword out of her captivity, to conquer her, and to conquer for her, and then to marry her.

(1) His preparations for war (v. 3): Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O Most Mighty! The word of God is the sword of the Spirit. By the promises of that word, and the grace contained in those promises, souls are made willing to submit to Jesus Christ and become his loyal subjects. By the gospel of Christ many Jews and Gentiles were converted.

(2) His expedition to this holy war: He goes forth with his glory and his majesty, as a great king takes the field with abundance of pomp and magnificence—his sword, his glory, and majesty. In his gospel he appears transcendently great and excellent, bright and blessed, in the honour and majesty which the Father has laid upon him. Christ, both in his person and in his gospel, had nothing of external glory or majesty, nothing to charm men (for he had no form nor comeliness), nothing to awe men, for he took upon him the form of a servant; it was all spiritual glory, spiritual majesty. In thy majesty ride prosperously, v. 4. "Thy kingdom come; Go on and prosper."

(3) The glorious cause in which he is engaged—because of truth, and meekness, and righteousness, which were, in a manner, sunk and lost among men, and which Christ came to retrieve and rescue. The gospel itself is truth, meekness, and righteousness; it commands by the power of truth and righteousness; for Christianity has these, incontestably, on its side, and yet it is to be promoted by meekness and gentleness, 1 Cor. iv. 12, 13; 2 Tim. ii. 25. Christ appears in it in his truth, meekness, and righteousness, and these are his glory and majesty, and because of these he shall prosper. Men are brought to believe on him because he is true, to learn of him because he is meek, Matt. xi. 29 (the gentleness of Christ is of mighty force, 2 Cor. x. 1), and to submit to him because he is righteous and rules with equity.

(4) The success of his expedition: "Thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things." In order to the conversion and reduction of souls to him, there are terrible things to be done; the heart must be pricked, conscience must be startled, and the terrors of the Lord must make way for his consolations. The next verse describes these terrible things (v. 5): Thy arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies. Those that were by nature enemies are thus wounded, in order to their being subdued and reconciled. Convictions are like the arrows of the bow, which are sharp in the heart on which they fasten, and bring people to fall under Christ, in subjection to his laws and government.

We have here the royal bridegroom filling his throne with judgment and keeping his court with splendour.

I. He here fills his throne with judgment. It is God the Father that says to the Son here, Thy throne, O God! is for ever and ever, as appears Heb. i. 8, 9, where this is quoted to prove that he is God and and has a more excellent name than the angels. Concerning his government observe, 1. The eternity of it; it is for ever and ever. It shall continue on earth throughout all the ages of time. Even when the kingdom shall be delivered up to God even the Father (1 Cor. xv. 24) the throne of the Redeemer will continue. 2. The equity of it: The sceptre of thy kingdom, the administration of thy government, is right, exactly according to the eternal counsel and will of God, which is the eternal rule and reason of good and evil. 3. The establishment and elevation of it: Therefore God, even thy God (Christ, as Mediator, called God his God, John xx. 17, as commissioned by him, and the head of those that are taken into covenant with him), has anointed thee with the oil of gladness. "In recompence of what thou hast done and suffered for the advancement of righteousness and the destruction of sin God has anointed thee with the oil of gladness, has brought thee to all the honours and all the joys of thy exalted state." Because he humbled himself, God has highly exalted him, Phil. ii. 8, 9. His anointing him denotes the power and glory to which he is exalted; he is invested in all the dignities and authorities of the Messiah.

II. He keeps his court with splendour and magnificence. 1. His robes of state, wherein he appears, are taken notice of, not for their pomp, which might strike an awe upon the spectator, but their pleasantness and the gratefulness of the odours with which they were perfumed (v. 8): They smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia (the oil of gladness with which he and his garments were anointed); these were some of the ingredients of the holy anointing oil which God appointed, the like to which was not to be made up for any common use (Exod. xxx. 23, 24), which was typical of the unction of the Spirit which Christ, the great high priest of our profession, received, and to which therefore there seems here to be a reference. 2. His royal palaces are said to be ivory ones, such as were then reckoned most magnificent. The mansions of light above are the ivory palaces, whence all the joys both of Christ and believers come, and where they will be for ever in perfection. Kings' daughters are among thy honourable women. All true believers are born from above; they are the children of the King of kings. The church is here compared to the queen herself—the queen-consort, whom, by an everlasting covenant, he hath betrothed to himself. She stands at his right hand in gold of Ophir. This is the bride, the Lamb's wife, whose graces, which are her ornaments, are compared to fine linen, clean and white (Rev. xix. 8), for their purity, here to gold of Ophir, for their costliness; for, as we owe our redemption, so we owe our adorning, not to corruptible things, but to the precious blood of the Son of God.

This latter part of the psalm is addressed to the royal bride, standing on the right hand of the royal bridegroom. God, who said to the Son, Thy throne is for ever and ever, says this to the church.

I. He tells her of the duties expected from her, which ought to be considered by all those that come into relation to the Lord Jesus: "Hearken, therefore, and consider this, and incline thy ear, that is, submit to those conditions of thy espousals, and bring thy will to comply with them."

1. She must renounce all others. "Forget thy own people and thy father's house, according to the law of marriage." This shows, (1) How necessary it was for those who were converted from Judaism or paganism to the faith of Christ wholly to cast out the old leaven, and not to bring into their Christian profession either the Jewish ceremonies or the heathen idolatries, for these would make such a mongrel religion in Christianity as the Samaritans had. (2) How necessary it is for us all, when we give up our names to Jesus Christ, to hate father and mother, and all that is dear to us in this world, in comparison, that is, to love them less than Christ. So shall the king greatly desire thy beauty, which intimates that the mixing of her old rites and customs, whether Jewish or Gentile, with her religion, would blemish her beauty. The beauty of holiness, both on the church and on particular believers, is in the sight of Christ of great price.

2. She must reverence him, must love, honour, and obey him: He is thy Lord, and worship thou him. We must worship him as God, and our Lord; for this is the will of God, that all men should honour the Son even as they honour the Father.

II. He tells her of the honours designed for her.

1. Great court should be made to her, and rich presents brought her (v. 12): "The daughter of Tyre," a rich and splendid city, "the daughter of the King of Tyre shall be there with a gift; every royal family round about shall send a branch, as a representative of the whole, to seek thy favour and to make an interest in thee; even the rich among the people shall entreat thy favour, for his sake to whom thou art espoused, that by thee they may make him their friend."

2. She shall be very splendid, and highly esteemed in the eyes of all (v. 13): The king's daughter is all glorious within. The glory of the church is spiritual glory, and that is indeed all glory; it is the glory of the soul, and that is the man; it is glory in God's sight, and it is an earnest of eternal glory. Though all her glory is within yet her clothing also is of wrought gold; the conversation of Christians, in which they appear in the world, must be enriched with good works, like wrought gold, which is worked with a great deal of care and caution.

3. Her nuptials shall be celebrated with a great deal of honour and joy (v. 14, 15): She shall be brought to the king. None are brought to Christ but whom the Father brings, and he has undertaken to do it; none besides are so brought to the king (v. 14) as to enter into the king's palace, v. 15.

4. The progeny of this marriage shall be illustrious (v. 16): Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children. Instead of the Old Testament church, the economy of which had waxed old, and ready to vanish away (Heb. viii. 13), as the fathers that are going off, there shall be a New Testament church, drafted into the same olive.

5. The praise of this marriage shall be perpetual in the praises of the royal bridegroom (v. 17): I will make thy name to be remembered. His Father has given him a name above every name, and here promises to make it perpetual, by keeping up a succession of ministers and Christians in every age, that shall bear up his name, which shall thus endure for ever (lxxii. 17).

PSALM XLVI

This psalm encourages us, I. To take comfort in God when things look very black and threatening, ver. 1–5. II. To mention, to his praise, the great things he has wrought for his church against its enemies, ver. 6–9. III. To assure ourselves that God who has glorified his own name will glorify it yet again, ver. 10, 11. We may, in singing it, apply it either to our spiritual enemies, and the encouragement we have to hope that through Christ we shall be more than conquerors over them, or to the public enemies of Christ's kingdom in the world. It is said of Luther that, when he heard any discouraging news, he would say, Come let us sing the forty-sixth psalm.

To the chief musician for the sons of Korah.
A song upon Alamoth.

Verses 1–5

The psalmist teaches us by his own example.

I. To triumph in God, and his presence with us, especially when we have had some fresh experiences of his appearing in our behalf (v. 1): God is our refuge and strength. Are we in distress? He is a help, a present help, a help found (so the word is), one whom we have found to be so, a help on which we may write Probatum est—It is tried, as Christ is called a tried stone, Isa. xxviii. 16.

II. To triumph over the greatest dangers: God is our strength and our help, a God all-sufficient to us; therefore will not we fear. It is our duty, it is our privilege, to be thus fearless; it is an evidence of a clear conscience, of an honest heart, and of a lively faith in God and his providence and promise. We will suppose the earth to be removed, and thrown into the sea, even the mountains, the strongest and firmest parts of the earth, to lie buried in the unfathomed ocean; we will suppose the sea to roar and rage, even to shake the mountains, v. 3. Though kingdoms and states be in confusion, embroiled in wars, tossed with tumults—though their powers combine against the church and people of God—yet will not we fear, knowing that all these troubles will end well for the church. It is not any private particular concern of our own that we are in pain about; it is the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High; it is the ark of God for which our hearts tremble. But, when we consider what God has provided for the comfort and safety of his church, we shall see reason to have our hearts fixed, and set above the fear of evil tidings. There is a river the streams whereof shall make it glad, even then when the waters of the sea roar and threaten it. The covenant of grace is the river, the promises of which are the streams; or the Spirit of grace is the river (John vii. 38, 39), the comforts of which are the streams, that make glad the city of our God. Though heaven and earth are shaken, yet God is in the midst of her, she shall not be moved, v. 5. The church shall survive the world, and be in bliss when that is in ruins. God shall help her out of her troubles, and that right early—when the morning appears; that is, very speedily, for he is a present help (v. 1), and very seasonably, when things are brought to the last extremity and when the relief will be most welcome.

Verses 6–11

These verses give glory to God both as King of nations and as King of saints.

I. As King of nations. He checks the rage and breaks the power of the nations that oppose him and his interests in the world (v. 6): The heathen raged at David's coming to the throne, and at the setting up of the kingdom of the Son of David; compare ii. 1, 2. The kingdoms were moved with indignation, and rose in a tumultuous furious manner to oppose it; but God uttered his voice, spoke to them in his wrath, and they were moved in another sense, they were struck into confusion and consternation. Such a melting of the spirits of the enemies is described, Judges v. 4, 5; and see Luke xxi. 25, 26. When he pleases he can make great havoc among the nations and lay all waste (v. 8): Come, behold the works of the Lord; they are to be observed (lxvi. 5), and to be sought out, cxi. 2. War is a tragedy which commonly destroys the stage it is acted on; David carried the war into the enemies' country; and O what desolations did it make there! Stand in awe of God; say, How terrible art thou in thy works! lxvi. 3. When he pleases to sheathe his sword, he puts an end to the wars of the nations and crowns them with peace, v. 9. He makes wars to cease unto the end of the earth, sometimes in pity to the nations, that they may have a breathing-time, when, by long wars with each other, they have run themselves out of breath. The total destruction of Gog and Magog is prophetically described by the burning of their weapons of war (Ezek. xxxix. 9, 10), which intimates likewise the church's perfect security and assurance of lasting peace, which made it needless to lay up those weapons of war for their own service. The bringing of a long war to a good issue is a work of the Lord, which we ought to behold with wonder and thankfulness.

II. As King of saints, and as such we must own that great and marvellous are his works, Rev. xv. 3. He does and will do great things. Let his enemies be still, and threaten no more, but know that he is God, one infinitely above them; let them rage no more, for it is all in vain: he that sits in heaven, laughs at them; and, in spite of all their impotent malice, he will be exalted in the earth and not merely in the church. Men will set up themselves, but let them know that God will be exalted, will glorify his own name, and wherein they deal proudly he will be above them, and make them know that he is so. Let his own people be still and tremble no more, but know, to their comfort, that the Lord is God. When we pray, Father, glorify thy name, we ought to exercise faith upon the answer given to that prayer when Christ himself prayed it, I have both glorified it and I will glorify it yet again. Amen. Lord, so be it. Let all believers triumph in this. 1. They have the presence of a God of power, of all power: The Lord of hosts is with us. This sovereign Lord is with us, sides with us, acts with us, and has promised he will never leave us. Hosts may be against us, but we need not fear them if the Lord of hosts be with us. 2. They are under the protection of a God in covenant, who not only is able to help them, but is engaged in honour and faithfulness to help them. He is the God of Jacob, not only Jacob the person, but Jacob the people.

PSALM XLVII

The scope of this psalm is to stir us up to praise God, and, I. We are directed in what manner to do it, publicly, cheerfully, and intelligently, ver. 1, 6, 7. II. We are furnished with matter for praise. 1. God's majesty, ver. 2. 2. His sovereign and universal dominion, ver. 2, 7–9. 3. The great things he had done, and will do, for his people, ver. 3–5. Many suppose that this psalm was penned upon occasion of the bringing up of the ark to Mount Zion, which ver. 5 seems to refer to ("God has gone up with a shout");—but it looks further, to the ascension of Christ into the heavenly Zion, after he had finished his undertaking on earth, and to the setting up of his kingdom in the world.

To the chief musician. A psalm for the sons of Korah.

The psalmist, his own heart filled with great and good thoughts of God, endeavours to engage all about him in the blessed work of praise.

I. Who are called upon to praise God: "All you people, all you people of Israel"; so it may be taken as a prophecy of the conversion of the Gentiles and the bringing of them into the church; see Rom. xv. 11.

II. What they are called upon to do: "Clap your hands, as men that cannot contain themselves; shout unto God, not to make him hear, but to make all about you hear. Shout with the voice of triumph in him, and in his power and goodness, that others may join with you in the triumph."

III. What is suggested to us as matter for our praise. The Lord most high is terrible, a King over all the earth; and he takes a particular care of his people and their concerns, has done so and ever will. This God had done for them, witness the planting of them in Canaan, and their continuance there unto this day. The kingdom of the Messiah was to be set over all the earth, and not confined to the Jewish nation. Jesus Christ shall subdue the Gentiles; he shall bring them in as sheep into the fold (so the word signifies), not for slaughter, but for preservation. He shall choose our inheritance for us. He had chosen the land of Canaan to be an inheritance for Israel; it was the land which the Lord their God spied out for them; see Deut. xxxii. 8. And the setting up of God's sanctuary in it made it the excellency, the honour, of Jacob (Amos vi. 8). Apply this spiritually, 1. The happiness of the saints, that God himself has chosen their inheritance for them, and has laid up for them in the other world an inheritance incorruptible, 1 Pet. i. 4. 2. The faith and submission of the saints to God. This is the language of every gracious soul, "God shall choose my inheritance for me. He knows what is good for me better than I do for myself, and therefore I will have no will of my own but what is resolved into his."

Should not subjects praise their king? God is our God, our King, and therefore we must praise him. But here is a needful rule subjoined (v. 7): Sing you praises with understanding, with Maschil. 1. "Intelligently; as those that do yourselves understand why and for what reasons you praise God and what is the meaning of the service." This is the gospel-rule (1 Cor. xiv. 15). 2. "Instructively, as those that desire to make others understand God's glorious perfections, and to teach them to praise him."

I. We must praise God going up (v. 5): God has gone up with a shout, which may refer, 1. To the carrying up of the ark to the hill of Zion. The ark being the instituted token of God's special presence with them, when that was brought up by warrant from him he might be said to go up. 2. To the ascension of our Lord Jesus into heaven, when he had finished his work on earth, Acts i. 9. Then God went up with a shout, the shout of a King, of a conqueror.

II. We must praise God reigning, v. 7, 8. He sits upon the throne of his holiness, which he has prepared in the heavens, and there he rules over all. See here the extent of God's government; all are born within his allegiance; even the heathen that serve other gods are ruled by the true God, our God, whether they will or no. See the equity of his government; it is a throne of holiness, on which he sits, whence he gives warrants, orders, and judgment, in which we are sure there is no iniquity. Jesus Christ, who is God, and whose throne is for ever and ever, reigns over the heathen; not only is he entrusted with the administration of the providential kingdom, but he shall set up the kingdom of his grace in the Gentile world, and rule in the hearts of multitudes that were bred up in heathenism, Eph. ii. 12, 13.

III. We must praise God as attended and honoured by the princes of the people, v. 9. It was the honour of Israel that they were the people of the God of Abraham. 1. It was their happiness that they had a settled government, princes of their people, who were the shields of their land. Magistracy is the shield of a nation, it is likewise the honour of God that, in another sense, the shields of the earth do belong to him; magistracy is his institution, and he serves his own purposes by it in the government of the world. The unanimous agreement of the great ones of a nation in the things that belong to its peace is a very happy omen, which promises abundance of blessings. 2. It may be applied to the calling of the Gentiles into the church of Christ, and taken as a prophecy that in the days of the Messiah the kings of the earth and their people should join themselves to the church. When the shields of the earth, the ensigns of royal dignity (1 Kings xiv. 27, 28), are surrendered to the Lord Jesus, as the keys of a city are presented to the conqueror or sovereign, when princes use their power for the advancement of the interests of religion, then Christ is greatly exalted.

PSALM XLVIII

This psalm, as the two former, is a triumphant song; some think it was penned on occasion of Jehoshaphat's victory (2 Chron. xx), others of Sennacherib's defeat, when his army laid siege to Jerusalem in Hezekiah's time. Jerusalem is here praised, 1. For its relation to God, ver. 1, 2. II. For God's care of it, ver. 3. III. For the terror it strikes upon its enemies, ver. 4–7. IV. For the pleasure it gives to its friends, who delight to think, 1. Of what God has done, does, and will do for it, ver. 8. 2. Of the gracious discoveries he makes of himself in and for that holy city, ver. 9, 10. 3. Of the effectual provision which is made for its safety, ver. 11–13. 4. Of the assurance we have of the perpetuity of God's covenant with the children of Zion, ver. 14.

A song and psalm for the sons of Korah.

What is here said to the honour of Jerusalem is,

I. Of Zion he said kinder things than ever he said of any place upon earth. This is my rest for ever; here will I dwell, for I have desired it, cxxxii. 13, 14. It is the city of the great King (v. 2), the King of all the earth, who is pleased to declare himself in a special manner present there. In Judah God is known, and his name is great. In Jerusalem God is great (v. 1). It is therefore called the mountain of his holiness, for holiness to the Lord is written upon it and all the furniture of it, Zech. xiv. 20, 21. God was known, not only in the streets, but even in the palaces of Jerusalem, for a refuge. Upon all these accounts, Jerusalem, and especially Mount Zion, on which the temple was built, were universally beloved and admired—beautiful for situation, and the joy of the whole earth, v. 2. The situation must needs be every way agreeable, when Infinite Wisdom chose it for the place of the sanctuary; and that which made it beautiful was that it was the mountain of holiness, for there is a beauty in holiness. Mount Zion was on the north side of Jerusalem and so was a shelter to the city from the cold and bleak winds that blew from that quarter.

II. That the kings of the earth were afraid of it. They had had but too much occasion to fear their enemies; for the kings were assembled, v. 4. They passed, advanced, and marched on together, not doubting but they should soon make themselves masters of that city which should have been the joy, but was the envy of the whole earth. The very sight of Jerusalem struck them into a consternation and gave check to their fury, as the sight of the tents of Jacob frightened Balaam from his purpose to curse Israel (Num. xxiv. 2): They saw it and marvelled, and hasted away, v. 5. Not that there was anything to be seen in Jerusalem that was so very formidable; but the sight of it brought to mind what they had heard concerning the special presence of God in that city and the divine protection it was under. They knew themselves an unequal match for Omnipotence, and therefore fear came upon them, and pain, v. 6. The fright they were in upon the sight of Jerusalem is here compared to the throes of a woman in travail. The defeat hereby given to their designs upon Jerusalem is compared to the dreadful work made with a fleet of ships by a violent storm, when some are split, others shattered, all dispersed (v. 7).

I. Let our faith in the word of God be hereby confirmed. "As we have heard done in former providences, in the days of old, so have we seen done in our own days. We have heard that God is the Lord of hosts, and that Jerusalem is the city of our God, is dear to him, in his particular care; and now we have seen it; we have seen the power of our God; we have seen his goodness; we have seen his care and concern for us, that he is a wall of fire round about Jerusalem and the glory in the midst of her."

II. Let our hope of the stability and perpetuity of the church be hereby encouraged. "From what we have seen, compared with what we have heard, in the city of our God, we may conclude that God will establish it for ever." This was not fulfilled in Jerusalem (that city was long since destroyed, and all its glory laid in the dust), but has its accomplishment in the gospel church.

III. Let our minds be hereby filled with good thoughts of God. "From what we have heard, and seen, and hope for, we may take occasion to think much of God's lovingkindness, whenever we meet in the midst of his temple," v. 9.

IV. Let us give to God the glory of the great things which he has done for us, and mention them to his honour (v. 10): "According to thy name, O God! so is thy praise, not only in Jerusalem, but to the ends of the earth." As far as his name goes his praise will go, at least it should go, and, at length, it shall go, when all the ends of the world shall praise him, xxii. 27; Rev. xi. 15. Some, by his name, understand especially that glorious name of his, the Lord of hosts; according to that name, so is his praise; for all the creatures, even to the ends of the earth, are under his command.

V. Let all the members of the church in particular take to themselves the comfort of what God does for his church in general (v. 11): "Let Mount Zion rejoice, the priests and Levites that attend the sanctuary, and then let all the daughters of Judah, the country towns, and the inhabitants of them, be glad: let the women in their songs and dances, as usual on occasion of public joys, celebrate with thankfulness the great salvation which God has wrought for us."

VI. Let us diligently observe the instances and evidences of the church's beauty, strength, and safety, and faithfully transmit our observations to those that shall come after us (v. 12, 13): Walk about Zion. Some think this refers to the ceremony of the triumph; let those who are employed in that solemnity walk round the walls (as they did, Neh. xii. 31), singing and praising God. In doing this let them tell the towers and mark well the bulwarks, magnify the late wonderful deliverance God had wrought for them. Let them observe, with wonder, that the towers and bulwarks are all in their full strength and none of them damaged by the kings that were assembled. Tell this to the generation following, as a wonderful instance of God's care of his holy city. Set your heart to her bulwarks. This intimates that the principal bulwarks of Zion were not the objects of sense, which they might set their eye upon, but the objects of faith, which they must set their hearts upon. Calvin observes here that when they are directed to transmit to posterity a particular account of the towers, and bulwarks, and palaces of Jerusalem, it is intimated that in process of time they would all be destroyed and remain no longer to be seen; for, otherwise, what need was there to preserve the description and history of them? When the disciples were admiring the buildings of the temple their Master told them that in a little time one stone of it should not be left upon another, Matt. xxiv. 1, 2. This must certainly be applied to the gospel church. See it founded on Christ, the rock fortified by the divine power, guarded by him that neither slumbers nor sleeps.

VII. Let us triumph in God, and in the assurances we have of his everlasting loving-kindness, v. 14. Tell this to the generation following: That this God, who has now done such great things for us, is our God for ever and ever. If he be our God, he will be our guide, our faithful constant guide. He will be our guide above death (so some); he will so guide us as to set us above the reach of death. He will be our guide beyond death (so others); he will conduct us safely to a happiness on the other side death, to a life in which there shall be no more death.

PSALM XLIX

This psalm is a sermon, and so is the next. In most of the psalms we have the penman praying or praising; in these we have him preaching. 1. In the preface he proposes to awaken worldly people out of their security (ver. 1–3) and to comfort himself and other godly people in a day of distress, ver. 4, 5. II. In the rest of the psalm, 1. He endeavours to convince sinners of their folly in doting upon the wealth of this world, by showing them, (1) That they cannot, with all their wealth, save their friends from death, ver. 6–9. (2) They cannot save themselves from death, ver. 10. (3) They cannot secure to themselves a happiness in this world, ver. 11, 12. Much less, (4) Can they secure to themselves a happiness in the other world, ver. 14. 2. He endeavours to comfort himself and other good people, (1) Against the fear of death, ver. 15. (2) Against the fear of the prospering power of wicked people, ver. 16–20.

To the chief musician. A psalm for the sons of Korah.

This is the psalmist's preface to his discourse concerning the vanity of the world and its insufficiency to make us happy.

I. He demands attention (v. 1, 2): Hear, all you people, and give ear, all you inhabitants of the world; for this doctrine is not peculiar to those that are blessed with divine revelation, but even the light of nature witnesses to it. All men may know, and therefore let all men consider, that their riches will not profit them in the day of death. Poor people are as much in danger from an inordinate desire towards the wealth of the world as rich people from an inordinate delight in it. My mouth shall speak of wisdom; what he had to say is wisdom and understanding; it will make those wise and intelligent that receive it. It was what he had himself well digested.

II. He engages his own attention (v. 4): I will incline my ear to a parable. It is called a parable, not because it is figurative and obscure, but because it is a wise discourse and very instructive. It is the same word that is used concerning Solomon's proverbs. Those that undertake to teach others must first learn themselves.

III. He promises to make the matter as plain and as affecting as he could: I will open my dark saying upon the harp. Some understood it not, it was a riddle to them; tell them of the vanity of the things that are seen, and of the reality and weight of invisible things, and they say, Ah Lord God! doth he not speak parables? Others understood it well enough, but they were not moved by it, it never affected them, and for their sake he would open it upon the harp, and try that expedient to work upon them, to win upon them. A verse may find him whom a sermon flies. Herbert.

IV. He begins with the application of it to himself. Wherefore should I fear? he means, Wherefore should I fear their fear (Isa. viii. 12), the fears of worldly people. "Wherefore should I fear in the days of trouble and persecution, when the iniquity of my heels, or of my supplanters that endeavour to trip up my heels, shall compass me about, and they shall surround me with their mischievous attempts? Why should I be afraid of those whose power lies in their wealth? I will not fear their power, for it cannot enable them to ruin me." The iniquity of our heels (or of our steps, our past sins) will compass us about, will be set in order before us. In these days worldly wicked people will be afraid; nothing more dreadful to those that have set their hearts upon the world than to think of leaving it; but wherefore should a good man fear death, who has God with him? (xxiii. 4).

I. A description of the spirit and way of worldly people, whose portion is in this life, xvii. 14. A man may have abundance of the wealth of this world and be made better by it, may thereby have his heart enlarged in love, and thankfulness, and obedience, and may do that good with it which will be fruit abounding to his account; and therefore it is not men's having riches that denominates them worldly, but their setting their hearts upon them as the best things; and so these worldly people are here described. They trust in their wealth (v. 6); they depend upon it as their portion and happiness. Their gold is their hope (Job xxxi. 24), and so it becomes their God. Thus our Saviour explains the difficulty of the salvation of rich people (Mark x. 24): How hard is it for those that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God! See 1 Tim. vi. 17. They call their lands after their own names, hoping thereby to perpetuate their memory, and, if their lands do retain the names by which they called them, it is but a poor honour; but they often change their names when they change their owners. Their inward thought is that their houses shall continue for ever, and with this thought they please themselves.

II. A demonstration of their folly herein. In general (v. 13), This their way is their folly. God himself pronounced him a fool who thought his goods were laid up for many years, and that they would be a portion for his soul, Luke xii. 19, 20. The love of the world is a disease that runs in the blood; men have it by kind, till the grace of God cures it. With all their wealth they cannot save the life of the dearest friend they have in the world, nor purchase a reprieve for him when he is under the arrest of death (v. 7-9). Everlasting life is a jewel of too great a value to be purchased by the wealth of this world. We are not redeemed with corruptible things, such as silver and gold, 1 Pet. i. 18, 19. Christ did that for us which all the riches of the world could not do; well therefore may he be dearer to us than any worldly things. Christ did that for us which a brother, a friend, could not do for us, no, not one of the best estate or interest; and therefore those that love father or brother more than him are not worthy of him. Some rich people are wise, they are politicians, but they cannot outwit death, nor evade his stroke, with all their art and management; others are fools and brutish. These, though they do no good, yet perhaps do no great hurt in the world: but that shall not excuse them; they shall perish, and be taken away by death, as well as the wise that did mischief with their craft. As their wealth will stand them in no stead in a dying hour, so neither will their honour (v. 12): Man, being in honour, abides not. We will suppose a man advanced to the highest pinnacle of preferment, as great and happy as the world can make him, man in splendour, yet then he abides not. His honour does not continue; that is a fleeting shadow. Their condition on the other side death will be very miserable. While a saint can ask proud Death, Where is thy sting? Death will ask the proud sinner, Where is thy wealth, thy pomp? The beauty of holiness is that which the grave, that consumes all other beauty, cannot touch, or do any damage to.

Good reason is here given to good people,

I. Why they should not be afraid of death. There is no cause for that fear if they have such a comfortable prospect as David here has of a happy state on the other side death, v. 15. The believing hopes of the soul's redemption from the grave, and reception to glory, are the great support and joy of the children of God in a dying hour. They hope,

1. That God will redeem their souls from the power of the grave, which includes, (1) The preserving of the soul from going to the grave with the body. The grave has a power over the body, by virtue of the sentence (Gen. iii. 19), and it is cruel enough in executing that power (Cant. viii. 6); but it has no such power over the soul. It has power to silence, and imprison, and consume the body; but the soul then moves, and acts, and converses, more freely than ever (Rev. vi. 9, 10); it is immaterial and immortal. When death breaks the dark lantern, yet it does not extinguish the candle that was pent up in it. (2) The reuniting of the soul and body at the resurrection. "God shall redeem my soul from the sheol of hell" (v. 15), and therefore the first death has no sting and the grave no victory.

2. That he will receive them to himself. He redeems their souls, that he may receive them. Ps. xxxi. 5, Into thy hands I commit my spirit, for thou hast redeemed it. He will receive them into his favour, will admit them into his kingdom, into the mansions that are prepared for them (John xiv. 2, 3), those everlasting habitations, Luke xvi. 9.

II. Why they should not be afraid of the prosperity and power of wicked people in this world.

1. He supposes the temptation very strong to envy the prosperity of sinners, for he supposes, they are made rich, and so are enabled to give law to all about them and have everything at command. They are very easy and secure in themselves and in their own minds (v. 18): In his life-time he blessed his soul; that is, he thought himself a very happy man because he prospered in the world. Believers bless themselves in the God of truth (Isa. lxv. 16), and think themselves happy if he be theirs; carnal people bless themselves in the wealth of the world, and think themselves happy if they have abundance of that. They applaud that in themselves which God condemns, and speak peace to themselves when God denounces war against them. "The worldling magnified himself; but thou that dost not, like him, speak well of thyself, but do well for thyself, in securing thy eternal welfare, thou shalt be praised, if not of men, yet of God, which will be thy everlasting honour."

2. He suggests that which is sufficient to take off the strength of the temptation, by directing us to look forward to the end of prosperous sinners (lxxiii. 17). When he dies it is taken for granted that he goes into another world himself, but he shall carry nothing away with him of all that which he has been so long heaping up. Grace is glory that will ascend with us, but no earthly glory will descend after us. The soul shall go to the generation of his fathers, his worldly wicked fathers, whose sayings he approved and whose steps he trod in, his fathers who would not hearken to the word of God, Zech. i. 4. A fool, a wicked man, in honour, is really as despicable an animal as any under the sun; he is like the beasts that perish (v. 20); nay, it is better to be a beast than to be a man that makes himself like a beast.

PSALM L

This psalm, as the former, is a psalm of instruction, not of prayer or praise. God by his prophet deals in this psalm with those that were in profession, the church's children, to convince them of their sin and folly in placing their religion in ritual services, while they neglected practical godliness. 1. As a proof to the carnal Jews, both those that rested in the external performances of their religion, and were remiss in the more excellent duties of prayer and praise, and those that expounded the law to others, but lived wicked lives themselves. 2. As a prediction of the abolishing of the ceremonial law, and of the introducing of a spiritual way of worship, in and by the kingdom of the Messiah, John iv. 23, 24. 3. As a representation of the day of judgment, in which God will call men to an account concerning their observance of those things which they have thus been taught; men shall be judged "according to what is written in the books"; and therefore Christ is fitly represented speaking as a Judge, and when he speaks as a Lawgiver. Here is, I. The glorious appearance of the Prince that gives law and judgment, ver. 1–6. II. Instruction given to his worshippers, to turn their sacrifices into prayers, ver. 7–15. III. A rebuke to those that pretend to worship God, but live in disobedience to his commands (ver. 16–20), their doom read (ver. 21, 22), and warning given to all to look to their conversation as well as to their devotions, ver. 23.

A psalm of Asaph.

It is probable that Asaph was not only the chief musician, who put a tune to this psalm, but that he was himself the penman of it; in Hezekiah's time they praised God in the words of David and Asaph the seer, 2 Chron. xxix. 30.

I. The court called, in the name of the King of kings (v. 1): The mighty God, even the Lord, hath spoken—El, Elohim, Jehovah, the God of infinite power, justice, and mercy, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. God is the Judge, the Son of God came for judgment into the world, and the Holy Ghost is the Spirit of judgment. All the earth is called to attend.

II. The judgment set, and the Judge taking his seat. As, when God gave the law to Israel in the wilderness, it is said, He came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir, and shone forth from Mount Paran, and then from his right hand went a fiery law (Deut. xxxiii. 2), so when God comes to reprove them for their hypocrisy, and to send forth his gospel to supersede the legal institutions, it is said here, 1. That he shall shine out of Zion, as then from the top of Sinai, v. 2. Because in Zion his oracle was now fixed, thence his judgments upon that provoking people were denounced, and God, who always dwells in Zion, may be said to shine out of Zion. The gospel, which set up spiritual worship, was to go forth from Mount Zion (Isa. ii. 3, Mic. iv. 2), and the preachers of it were to begin at Jerusalem (Luke xxiv. 47). Zion is here called the perfection of beauty, because it was the holy hill; and holiness is indeed the perfection of beauty. 2. That he shall come, and not keep silence, but shall show his displeasure at them, and the partition-wall of the ceremonial law should be taken down; this shall now no longer be concealed. In the great day our God shall come and shall not keep silence, but shall make those to hear his judgment that would not hearken to his law. 3. That his appearance should be majestic and terrible: A fire shall devour before him. The fire of his judgments shall make way for the rebukes of his word, that the sinners in Zion might be startled out of their sins. When his gospel kingdom was to be set up Christ came to send fire on the earth, Luke xii. 49. The Spirit was given in cloven tongues as of fire, introduced by a rushing mighty wind, which was very tempestuous, Acts ii. 2, 3. And in the last judgment Christ shall come in flaming fire, 2 Thess. i. 8. 4. That as on Mount Sinai he came with ten thousands of his saints, so he shall now call to the heavens from above, to take notice of this solemn process (v. 4).

III. The parties summoned (v. 5): Gather my saints together unto me. This may be understood either, 1. Of saints indeed. When God will reject the services of those that only offered sacrifice, resting in the outside of the performance, he will graciously accept those who, in sacrificing, make a covenant with him, and so attend to and answer the end of the institution of sacrifices. It is only by sacrifice, by Christ the great sacrifice (from whom all the legal sacrifices derived what value they had), that we poor sinners can covenant with God so as to be accepted of him. Or, 2. It may be understood of saints in profession, such as the people of Israel were, who are called a kingdom of priests and a holy nation, Exod. xix. 6.

IV. The issue of this solemn trial foretold (v. 6): The heavens shall declare his righteousness, those heavens that were called to be witnesses to the trial (v. 4); the people in heaven shall say, Hallelujah. As the heavens declare the glory, the wisdom and power, of God the Creator (xix. 1), so they shall no less openly declare the glory, the justice and righteousness, of God the Judge; and so loudly do they proclaim both that there is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard, as it follows there, v. 3.

God is here dealing with those that placed all their religion in the observances of the ceremonial law, and thought those sufficient.

I. He lays down the original contract between him and Israel.

II. He puts a slight upon the legal sacrifices, v. 8.

1. This may be considered as looking back to the use of these under the law. God had a controversy with the Jews; but what was the ground of the controversy? They thought God was mightily beholden to them for the many sacrifices they had brought to his altar; but God here shows them he did not need their sacrifices. What occasion had he for their bullocks and goats who has the command of all the beasts of the forest, and the cattle upon a thousand hills (v. 9, 10). God's infinite self-sufficiency proves our utter insufficiency to add anything to him. He could not be benefited by their sacrifices. Will I eat the flesh of bulls? It is as absurd to think that their sacrifices could, of themselves, and by virtue of any innate excellency in them, add any pleasure or praise to God, as it would be to imagine that an infinite Spirit could be supported by meat and drink, as our bodies are. No; to obey is better than sacrifice, and to love God and our neighbour better than all burnt-offerings.

2. This may be considered as looking forward to the abolishing of these by the gospel of Christ. When God shall set up the kingdom of the Messiah he shall abolish the old way of worship by sacrifice and offerings; he will no more have those to be continually before him (v. 8); he will no more require of his worshippers to bring him their bullocks and their goats, to be burnt upon his altar, v. 9.

III. He directs to the best sacrifices of prayer and praise as those which, under the law, were preferred before all burnt-offerings and sacrifices, and on which then the greatest stress was laid, and which now, under the gospel, come in the room of those carnal ordinances which were imposed until the times of reformation. He shows us here (v. 14, 15) what is good, and what the Lord our God requires of us, and will accept, when sacrifices are slighted and superseded. 1. We must make a penitent acknowledgment of our sins: Offer to God confession. A broken and contrite heart is the sacrifice which God will not despise, li. 17. If the sin was not abandoned the sin-offering was not accepted. 2. We must give God thanks for his mercies to us: Offer to God thanksgiving, every day, often every day (seven times a day will I praise thee): and this shall please the Lord, if it come from a humble thankful heart, better than an ox or bullock that has horns and hoofs, lxix. 30, 31. 3. We must make conscience of performing our covenants with him: Pay thy vows to the Most High, forsake thy sins, and do thy duty better. Dr. Hammond applies this to the great gospel ordinance of the eucharist, in which we are to give thanks to God for his great love in sending his Son to save us. Instead of all the Old Testament types of a Christ to come, we have that blessed memorial of a Christ already come. 4. In the day of distress we must address ourselves to God by faithful and fervent prayer (v. 15): Call upon me in the day of trouble.

God, by the psalmist, having instructed his people in the right way of worshipping him, here directs his speech to the wicked.

I. The charge drawn up against them. 1. They are charged with invading and usurping the honours and privileges of religion (v. 16): What hast thou to do, O wicked man! to declare my statutes? This is a challenge to those that are really profane, but seemingly godly, to show what title they have to the cloak of religion. Some think it points prophetically at the scribes and Pharisees that were the teachers and leaders of the Jewish church at the time when the kingdom of the Messiah, and that evangelical way of worship spoken of in the foregoing verses, were to be set up. They violently opposed that great revolution, and used all the power and interest which they had by sitting in Moses's seat to hinder it; but the account which our blessed Saviour gives of them

(Matt. xxiii), and St. Paul (Rom. ii. 21, 22), makes this expostulation here agree very well to them. They took on them to declare God's statutes, but they hated Christ's instruction; and therefore what had they to do to expound the law, when they rejected the gospel? But it is applicable to all those that are practisers of iniquity, and yet professors of piety, especially if withal they be preachers of it. 2. They are charged with transgressing and violating the laws and precepts of religion. Thou hatest instruction. They loved to give instruction, and to tell others what they should do, for this fed their pride; but they hated to receive instruction from God himself, for that would be a mortification to them. Thou castest my words behind thee. 1, A close confederacy with the worst of sinners (v. 18): "When thou sawest a thief, instead of reproving him, thou consentedst with him, didst approve of his practices, and desire to share in the profits of his cursed trade; and thou hast been partaker with adulterers." 2. A constant persisting in the worst of tongue-sins (v. 19): "Thou givest thy mouth to evil, not only allowest thyself in, but addictest thyself wholly to, all manner of evil-speaking." Lying: Thy tongue frames deceit. Slandering (v. 20): "Thou sittest, and speakest against thy brother, dost basely abuse and misrepresent him; thou sittest and doest this, as a judge upon the bench, with authority; thou sittest in the seat of the scornful, to deride and backbite those whom thou oughtest to respect and be kind to."

II. The proof of this charge (v. 21): "These things thou hast done; the fact is too plain to be denied, the fault too bad to be excused; these things God knows, and thy own heart knows, thou hast done."

III. The Judge's patience, and the sinner's abuse of that patience: I kept silence, did not give thee any disturbance in thy sinful way, but let thee alone to take thy course; sentence against thy evil works was respited, and not executed speedily." His patience is the more wonderful because the sinner makes such an ill use of it. Sinners take God's silence for consent and his patience for connivance; and therefore the longer they are reprieved the more are their hearts hardened.

IV. The fair warning given of the dreadful doom of hypocrites (v. 22): "Now consider this, you that forget God, consider that God knows and keeps account of all your sins, patience abused will turn into the greater wrath, for if these things be not considered, and the consideration of them improved, he will tear you in pieces, and there will be none to deliver."

V. Full instructions given to us all how to prevent this fearful doom. 1. Man's chief end is to glorify God, and we are here told that whoso offers praise glorifies him; whether he be Jew or Gentile, those spiritual sacrifices shall be accepted from him. We must praise God, direct it to God, as every sacrifice was directed; see that it be made by fire, sacred fire, that it be kindled with the flame of holy and devout affection. 2. Man's chief end, in conjunction with this, is to enjoy God; and we are here told that those who order their conversation aright shall see his salvation. Thanksgiving is good, but thanks-living is better.

PSALM LI

This psalm is the most eminent of the penitential psalms, and most expressive of the cares and desires of a repenting sinner. In this psalm, I. David confesses his sin, ver. 3–6. II. He prays earnestly for the pardon of his sin, ver. 1, 2, 7, 9. III. For peace of conscience, ver. 8, 12. IV. For grace to go and sin no more, ver. 10, 11, 14. V. For liberty of access to God, ver. 15. VI. He promises to do what he could for the good of the souls of others ver. 13) and for the glory of God, ver. 16, 17, 19. And, lastly, concludes with a prayer for Zion and Jerusalem, ver. 18. Those whose consciences charge them with any gross sin should, with a believing regard to Jesus Christ, the Mediator, again and again pray over this psalm.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David, when Nathan the prophet came unto him, after he had gone in to Bathsheba.

Verses 1–6

The title has reference to a very sad story, that of David's fall. 1. The sin which, in this psalm, he laments, was the folly and wickedness he committed with his neighbour's wife. This sin of David's is recorded for warning to all, that he who thinks he stands may take heed lest he fall. 2. The repentance which, in this psalm, he expresses, was brought through the ministry of Nathan, who was sent of God to convince him of his sin. But those that have been overtaken in any fault ought to reckon a faithful reproof the greatest kindness that can be done them and a wise reprover their best friend. Let the righteous smite me, and it shall be excellent oil. 3. David, being convinced of his sin, poured out his soul to God in prayer for mercy and grace. 4. He drew up, by divine inspiration, the workings of his heart towards God, upon this occasion, into a psalm.

In these words we have,

I. David's humble petition, v. 1, 2. His prayer is much the same with that which our Saviour puts into the mouth of his penitent publican in the parable: God be merciful to me a sinner! Luke xviii. 13. David does not balance his evil deeds with his good deeds, nor can he think that his services will atone for his offences; but he flies to God's infinite mercy, and depends upon that only for pardon and peace: Have mercy upon me, O God!

1. What his plea is for this mercy: "Have mercy upon me, O God! Have mercy upon me for mercy's sake. I have nothing to plead with thee but," (1) "The freeness of thy mercy, according to thy loving-kindness, thy clemency, the goodness of thy nature, which inclines thee to pity the miserable." (2) "The fulness of thy mercy."

2. What is the particular mercy that he begs—the pardon of sin. Blot out my transgressions, as a debt is blotted or crossed out of the book, when either the debtor has paid it or the creditor has remitted it. "Wash me thoroughly from my iniquity. Cleanse me from my sin." Nathan had assured David, upon his first profession of repentance, that his sin was pardoned. The Lord has taken away thy sin; thou shalt not die, 2 Sam. xii. 13. Yet he prays, Wash me, cleanse me, blot out my transgressions. God had forgiven him, but he could not forgive himself; and therefore he is thus importunate for pardon.

II. David's penitential confessions, v. 3–5.

1. He was very free to own his guilt before God: I acknowledge my transgressions; this he had formerly found the only way of easing his conscience, xxxii. 4, 5. Nathan said, Thou art the man. I am, says David; I have sinned.

2. He had such a deep sense of it that he was continually thinking of it with sorrow and shame. "My sin is ever before me. It is ever against me."

(1) He confesses his actual transgressions (v. 4): Against thee, thee only, have I sinned. The best men, if they sin, should give the best example of repentance. David published his confession of sin that when hereafter he should come into trouble none might say God had done him any wrong; for he owns the Lord is righteous: thus will all true penitents justify God by condemning themselves. Thou art just in all that is brought upon us.

(2) He confesses his original corruption (v. 5): Behold, I was shapen in iniquity. David elsewhere speaks of the admirable structure of his body (cxxxix. 14, 15); it was curiously wrought; and yet here he says it was shapen in iniquity, sin was twisted in with it; not as it came out of God's hands. It is to be sadly lamented by everyone of us that we brought into the world with us a corrupt nature, wretchedly degenerated from its primitive purity and rectitude. This is what we call original sin, because it is as ancient as our original, and because it is the original of all our actual transgressions. It is a bent to backslide from God.

III. David's acknowledgment of the grace of God (v. 6), both his goodwill towards us (thou desirest truth in the inward parts, thou wouldst have us all honest and sincere, and true to our profession") and his good work in us—"In the hidden part thou hast made," or shalt make, "me to know wisdom." Truth and wisdom will go very far towards making a man a good man. What God requires of us he himself works in us, and he works it in the regular way, enlightening the mind, and so gaining the will. David was conscious of the uprightness of his heart towards God in his repentance, and therefore doubted not but God would accept him. He hoped that God would enable him to make good his resolutions, that in the hidden part, in the new man, which is called the hidden man of the heart (1 Pet. iii. 4), he would make him to know wisdom so as to discern and avoid the designs of the tempter another time.

I. See here what David prays for. Many petitions he here puts up, to which if we do but add, "for Christ's sake," they are as evangelical as any other.

1. He prays that God would cleanse him from his sins and the defilement he had contracted by them (v. 7): Purge me with hyssop. The expression here alludes to a ceremonial distinction, that of cleansing the leper, or those that were unclean by the touch of a body by sprinkling water, or blood, or both upon them with a bunch of hyssop, by which they were, at length, discharged from the restraints they were laid under by their pollution. "Lord, let me be as well assured of my restoration to thy favour, and to the privilege of communion with thee, as they were thereby assured of their re-admission to their former privileges." But it is founded upon gospel-grace: Purge me with hyssop, that is, with the blood of Christ applied to my soul by a lively faith, as water of purification was sprinkled with a bunch of hyssop. It is the blood of Christ (which is therefore called the blood of sprinkling, Heb. xii. 24), that purges the conscience from dead works, from that guilt of sin and dread of God which shut us out of communion with him, as the touch of a dead body, under the law, shut a man out from the courts of God's house.

2. He prays that, his sins being pardoned, he might have the comfort of that pardon. He asks not to be comforted till first he is cleansed; but if sin, the bitter root of sorrow, be taken away, he can pray in faith, "Make me to hear joy and gladness (v. 8), that is, let me have a well-grounded peace, of thy creating, thy speaking." The pain of a heart truly broken for sin may well be compared to that of a broken bone; and it is the same Spirit who as a Spirit of bondage smites and wounds and as a Spirit of adoption heals and binds up.

3. He prays for a complete and effectual pardon. This is that which he is most earnest for as the foundation of his comfort (v. 9): "Hide thy face from my sins, that is, be not provoked by them to deal with me as I deserve; they are ever before me, let them be cast behind thy back. Blot out all my iniquities out of the book of thy account; blot them out, as a cloud is blotted out and dispelled by the beams of the sun," Isa. xliv. 22.

4. He prays for sanctifying grace. His great concern is to get his corrupt nature changed, and therefore he prays, Create in me a clean heart, O God! "Lord, renew a right spirit within me"; repair the decays of spiritual strength. Renew a constant spirit within me, so some. He had, in this matter, discovered much inconstancy and inconsistency with himself, and therefore he prays, "Lord, fix me for the time to come, that I may never in like manner depart from thee."

5. He prays for the continuance of God's goodwill towards him and the progress of his good work in him, v. 11. "Cast me not away from thy presence, as one whom thou abhorrest and canst not endure to look upon." Take not thy Holy Spirit from me. We are undone if God take his Holy Spirit from us. Saul was a sad instance of this. How exceedingly sinful, how exceedingly miscrable, was he, when the Spirit of the Lord had departed from him! David knew it, and therefore begs thus earnestly: "Lord, whatever thou take from me, my children, my crown, my life, yet take not thy Holy Spirit from me."

6. He prays for the restoration of divine comforts and the perpetual communications of divine grace, v. 12. Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation. A child of God knows no true nor solid joy but the joy of God's salvation, joy in God his Saviour and in the hope of eternal life. "Uphold me with thy free Spirit: I am ready to fall, either into sin or into despair; Lord, sustain me; my own spirit is not sufficient; if I be left to myself, I shall certainly sink."

II. David here promises, v. 13, I will teach transgressors thy ways. He had been himself a transgressor, and therefore could speak experimentally to transgressors, and having found mercy with God in the way of repentance, could teach others God's ways. Penitents should be preachers. Sinners shall be converted unto thee.

Verses 14–19

I. David prays against the guilt of sin, and prays for the grace of God, enforcing both petitions from a plea taken from the glory of God, which he promises with thankfulness to show forth. The particular sin he prays against is blood-guiltiness, the sin he had now been guilty of, having slain Uriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. He promises that, if God would deliver him, his tongue should sing aloud of his righteousness; God should have the glory both of pardoning mercy and of preventing grace. He prays for the grace of God and promises to improve that grace to his glory (v. 15): "O Lord! open thou my lips, not only that I may teach and instruct sinners, but that my mouth shall show forth thy praise, that I may have a heart enlarged in praise." Guilt had closed his lips, and therefore he had little confidence towards God. To those that are tonguetied by reason of guilt the assurance of the forgiveness of their sins says effectually, Ephphatha—Be opened; and, when the lips are opened, what should they speak but the praises of God.

II. David offers the sacrifice of a penitent contrite heart. He knew that the sacrificing of beasts was in itself of no account with God (v. 16). As they cannot make satisfaction for sin, so God cannot take any sactisfaction in them, any otherwise than as the offering of them is expressive of love and duty to him. He knew also how acceptable true repentance is to God (v. 17): The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit. It is a sharp work wrought there, no less than the breaking of the heart; not in despair but in necessary humiliation and sorrow for sin. It is a heart pliable to the word of God, a heart subdued and brought into obedience; it is a heart that is tender, like Josiah's, and trembles at God's word. The breaking of Christ's body for sin is the only sacrifice of atonement, for no sacrifice but that could take away sin; but the breaking of our hearts for sin is a sacrifice of acknowledgment.

III. David intercedes for Zion and Jerusalem.

1. For the good of the church of God (v. 18): Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion, that is, "To all the particular worshippers in Zion, to all that love and fear thy name; keep them from falling into such wounding wasting sins as these of mine; defend and succour all that fear thy name." Those that have been in spiritual troubles themselves know how to pity and pray for those that are in like manner afflicted. We must not forget to pray for the church of God; nay, our Master has taught us in our daily prayers to begin with that, Hallowed be thy name, Thy kingdom come.

2. For the honour of the churches of God, v. 19. They will come to his tabernacle with whole burnt-offerings, which were intended purely for the glory of God, and they shall offer, not lambs and rams only, but bullocks, the costliest sacrifices, upon his altar. "Thou shalt he pleased with them, that is, we shall have reason to hope so when we perceive the sin taken away which threatened to hinder thy acceptance." It is a great comfort to think of the communion that is between God and his people in their public assemblies, how he is honoured by their humble attendance on him and they are happy in his gracious acceptance of it.

PSALM LII

David was in very great grief when he said to Abiathar (1 Sam. xxii. 22), "I have occasioned the death of all the persons of thy father's house", who were put to death upon Doeg's malicious information; and to gain some relief to his mind he penned this psalm. I. He arraigns Doeg for what he had done, ver. 1. II. He accuses him, ver. 2–4. III. He passes sentence upon him, ver. 5. IV. He foretells the triumphs of the righteous in the execution of the sentence, ver. 6, 7. V. He comforts himself in the mercy of God, ver. 8, 9.

To the chief musician, Maschil. A psalm of David, when Doeg the Edomite came and told Saul, and said unto him, David has come to the house of Ahimelech.

The title is a brief account of the story to which the psalm refers, 1 Sam. xxii. 1–23.

I. David argues the case fairly with this proud and mighty man, v. 1. Doeg was, by his office, a mighty man, for he was set over the servants of Saul, chamberlain of the household. This was he that boasted himself, not only in the power he had to do mischief, but in the mischief he did. It is uncertain how the following words come in: The goodness of God endures continually. The patience and forbearance of God are abused by sinners to the hardening of their hearts in their wicked ways. Because God is continually doing them good, therefore they boast in mischief. But it is rather to be taken to show the sinfulness of his sin: "God is continually doing good, and those that therein are like him have reason to glory in their being so; but thou art continually doing mischief, and therein art utterly unlike him, and contrary to him, and yet gloriest in being so."

II. He draws up a high charge against him in the court of heaven, v. 2–4. He accuses him of the wickedness of his tongue and the wickedness of his heart. Four things he charges him with:—1. Malice. His tongue does mischief, not only pricking like a needle, but cutting like a sharp razor. 2. Falsehood. It was a deceitful tongue that he did this mischief with (v. 4); he loved lying (v. 3), and this sharp razor did work deceitfully (v. 2). He told the truth, but not all the truth. It will not save us from the guilt of lying to be able to say, "There was some truth in what we said," if we pervert it, and make it to appear otherwise than it was. 3. Subtlety in sin: "Thy tongue devises mischiefs; that is, it speaks the mischief which thy heart devises." 4. Affection to sin: "Thou lovest evil more than good; that is, thou lovest evil. Thou wouldst rather please Saul by telling a lie than please God by speaking truth." Those are of Doeg's spirit who, instead of being pleased with an opportunity of doing a man a kindness, are glad when they have a fair occasion to do a man a mischief.

III. He reads his doom and denounces the judgments of God against him for his wickedness (v. 5): "Thou hast destroyed the priests of the Lord and cut them off, and therefore God shall likewise destroy thee for ever." Doeg is here condemned, 1. To be driven out of the church: He shall pluck thee out of the tabernacle, not thy dwelling-place, but God's." Justly was he deprived of all the privileges of God's house who had been so mischievous to his servants. 2. To be driven out of the world: "He shall root thee out of the land of the living, in which thou thoughtest thyself so deeply rooted."

David was at this time in great distress; the mischief Doeg had done him was but the beginning of his sorrows; and yet here we have him triumphing in tribulation.

I. In the fall of Doeg. They shall observe God's judgments on Doeg, and speak of them, 1. To the glory of God: They shall see and fear (v. 6); that is, they shall reverence the justice of God. 2. To the shame of Doeg. They shall laugh at him, not with a ludicrous, but a rational serious laughter, as he that sits in heaven shall laugh at him, ii. 4. He shall appear ridiculous, and worthy to be laughed at. Lo, this is the man that made not God his strength. Now that which ruined Doeg's prosperity was, (1) That he did not build it upon a rock: He made not God his strength. Those wretchedly deceive themselves that think to support themselves in their power and wealth without God and religion. (2) That he did build it upon the sand. He thought his wealth would support itself: He trusted in the abundance of his riches, which, he imagined, were laid up for many years.

II. In his own stability, v. 8, 9. "This mighty man is plucked up by the roots; but I am like a green olive-tree, planted and rooted, fixed and flourishing; he is turned out of God's dwelling-place, but I am established in it." Now what must we do that we may be as green olive-trees? 1. We must live a life of faith and holy confidence in God and his grace: I trust in the mercy of God for ever and ever. 2. We must live a life of thankfulness and holy joy in God (v. 9): "I will praise thee for ever, because thou hast done it, hast performed thy promise to me." 3. We must live a life of expectation and humble dependence upon God: "I will wait on thy name; I will attend upon thee in all those ways wherein thou hast made thyself known, hoping for the discoveries of thy favour to me and willing to tarry till the time appointed for them; for it is good before thy saints."

PSALM LIII

God, in this psalm, speaks twice, for this is the same almost verbatim with the fourteenth psalm. The scope of it is to convince us of our sins. The word, as a convincing word, is compared to a hammer, the strokes whereof must be frequently repeated. God, by the psalmist here, I. Shows us how bad we are, ver. 1. II. Proves it upon us by his own certain knowledge, ver. 2, 3. III. He speaks terror to persecutors, the worst of sinners, ver. 4, 5. IV. He speaks encouragement to God's persecuted people, ver. 6.

To the chief musician upon Mahalath, Maschil. A psalm of David.

1. The fact of sin. Is that proved? Yes, God is a witness to it. All the sinfulness of their hearts and lives is naked and open before him. 2. The fault of sin. It is that which makes this world such an evil world as it is; it is going back from God, v. 3. 3. The fountain of sin. How comes it that men are so bad? Surely it is because there is no fear of God before their eyes. Men's bad practices flow from their bad principles. 4. The folly of sin. He is a fool that harbours corrupt thoughts. Atheists, whether in opinion or practice, are the greatest fools in the world. Those that do not seek God do not understand; they are like brute-beasts, for man is distinguished from the brutes, not so much by the powers of reason as by a capacity for religion. The workers of iniquity may truly be said to know nothing that do not know God, v. 4. 5. The filthiness of sin. Sinners are corrupt (v. 1); their nature is vitiated and spoiled, and the more noble the nature is the more vile it is when it is depraved. 6. The fruit of sin. See to what a degree of barbarity it brings men at last; when men's hearts are hardened through the deceitfulness of sin see their cruelty to their brethren, that are bone of their bone—because they will not run with them to the same excess of riot, they eat them up as they eat bread; as if they had not only become beasts, but beasts of prey. 7. The fear and shame that attend sin (v. 5): There were those in great fear who had made God their enemy. The wicked flees when none pursues. See the ground of this fear; it is because God has formerly scattered the bones of those that encamped against his people, not only broken their power and dispersed their forces, but slain them. 8. The faith of the saints, and their hope and power touching the cure of this great evil, v. 6. There will come a Saviour, a great salvation, a salvation from sin.

PSALM LIV

The key of this psalm hangs at the door, for the title tells us upon what occasion it was penned—when the inhabitants of Ziph, men of Judah (types of Judas the traitor), betrayed David to Saul, by informing him where he was and putting him in a way how to seize him. This they did twice (1 Sam. xxiii. 19; xxvi. 1), and it is upon record to their everlasting infamy. The psalm is sweet; the former part of it, perhaps, was meditated when he was in his distress and put into writing when the danger was over, with the addition of the last two verses, which express his thankfulness for the deliverance, which yet might be written in faith, even when he was in the midst of his fright. Here, I. He complains to God of the malice of his enemies, and prays for help against them, ver. 1–3 II. He comforts himself with an assurance of the divine favour and protection, and that, in due time, his enemies should be confounded and he delivered, ver. 4–7.

To the chief musician on Neginoth, Maschil. A psalm of David, when the Ziphim came and said to Saul, Doth not David hide himself with us?

1. The great distress that David was now in. The Ziphim came of their own accord, and informed Saul where David was, with a promise to deliver him into his hand. Never let a good man expect to be safe and easy till he comes to heaven. How treacherous, how officious, were these Ziphim! 2. His prayer to God for succour and deliverance, v. 1, 2. David has no other plea to depend upon than God's name, no other power to depend upon than God's strength, and those he makes his refuge and confidence. Even in his flight, when he had not opportunity for solemn address to God, he was ever and anon lifting up to heaven: Hear my prayer, which comes from my heart, and give ear to the words of my mouth. 3. His plea which is taken from the character of his enemies, v. 3. They are strangers; such were the Ziphites, unworthy the name of Israelites. "They have used me more basely and barbarously than the Philistines themselves would have done." They are oppressors; such was Saul, who, as a king, should have used his power for the protection of all his good subjects, but abused it for their destruction. They were very formidable and threatening; they not only hated him and wished him ill, but they rose up against him in a body, joining their power to do him a mischief. They were very spiteful and malicious: They seek after my soul. They have not set God before them, that is, they have quite cast off the thoughts of God; they do not consider that in fighting against his people, they fight against him.

Verses 4–7

David's faith in his prayer.

I. He was sure that he had God on his side. Behold, God is my helper. Though men and devils aim to be our destroyers, they shall not prevail while God is our helper: The Lord is with those that uphold my soul. Compare cxviii. 7, "The Lord taketh my part with those that help me."

II. God taking part with him, he doubted not but his enemies should fall before him (v. 5): "He shall reward evil unto my enemies that observe me. The evil they designed against me the righteous God will return upon their own heads." David would not render evil to them, but he knew God would: I as a deaf man heard not, for thou wilt hear. We must not avenge ourselves, because God has said, Vengeance is mine. But he prays, Cut them off in thy truth. This is not a prayer of malice, but a prayer of faith; for it has an eye to the word of God, and only desires the performance of that.

III. He promises to give thanks to God for all the experiences he had had of his goodness to him (v. 6): I will sacrifice unto thee. I will praise thy name. A thankful heart, and our lips giving thanks to his name, are the sacrifices God will accept.

IV. He speaks of his deliverance as a thing done (v. 7): I will praise thy name, and say, "He has delivered me; this shall be my song then." My eye has seen its desire upon my enemies, not seen them cut off and ruined, but forced to retreat, tidings being brought to Saul that the Philistines were upon him, 1 Sam. xxiii. 27, 28. All David desired was to be himself safe; when he saw Saul draw off his forces he saw his desire. This may perhaps point at Christ, of whom David was a type; God would deliver him out of all the troubles of his state of humiliation, and he was perfectly sure of it; and all things are said to be put under his feet; for, though we see not yet all things put under him, yet we are sure he shall reign till all his enemies be made his footstool, and he shall see his desire upon them.

PSALM LV

It is the conjecture of many expositors that David penned this psalm upon occasion of Absalom's rebellion, and that the particular enemy he here speaks of, that dealt treacherously with him, was Ahithophel, and some will therefore make David's troubles here typical of Christ's sufferings, and Ahithophel's treachery a figure of Judas's, because they both hanged themselves. But there is nothing in it that is particularly applied to Christ in the New Testament. David was in great distress when he penned this psalm. I. He prays that God would manifest his favour to him, and pleads his own sorrow and fear, ver. 1–8. II. He prays that God would manifest his displeasure against his enemies, and pleads their great wickedness and treachery, ver. 9–15 and again, ver. 20, 21. III. He assures himself that God would, in due time, appear for him against his enemies, comforts himself with the hopes of it, and encourages others to trust in God, ver. 16–19 and again ver. 22, 23.

To the chief musician on Neginoth, Maschil. A psalm of David.

I. David praying. Prayer is a salve for every sore and a relief to the spirit under every burden: Give ear to my prayer, O God! v. 1. Hide not thyself from my supplication. If we, in our prayers, sincerely lay open ourselves, our case, our hearts to God, we have reason to hope that he will not hide himself, his favours, his comforts, from us.

II. David weeping; for in this he was a type of Christ that he was a man of sorrows and often in tears (v. 2): "I mourn in my complaint" (or in my meditation, my melancholy musings), "and I make a noise; I cannot forbear such sighs and groans, and other expressions of grief, as discover it to those about me." It is because of the voice of the enemy, the menaces and insults of Absalom's party, that swelled, and hectored, and stirred up the people to cry out against David, and shout him out of his palace and capital city, as afterwards the chief priests stirred up the mob to cry out against the Son of David, Away with him—Crucify him. They cast iniquity upon me. They hated him themselves, and therefore they studied to make him odious, that others also might hate him. This made him mourn, and the more because he could remember the time when he was the darling of the people, and answered to his name, David—a beloved one.

III. David trembling, and in great consternation. We may well suppose him to be so upon the breaking out of Absalom's conspiracy and the general defection of the people. David was a man of great boldness, and in some very eminent instances had signalized his courage, and yet, when the danger was surprising and imminent, his heart failed him. Now David's heart is sorely pained within him; the terrors of death have fallen upon him, v. 4. Fearfulness of mind and trembling of body came upon him, and horror covered and overwhelmed him, v. 5. Sometimes David's faith made him, in a manner, fearless, and he could boldly say, when surrounded with enemies, I will not be afraid what man can do unto me. But at other times his fears prevail and tyrannize; for the best men are not always alike strong in faith. How desirous he was, in this fright, to retire into a desert, anywhere to be far enough from hearing the voice of the enemy and seeing their oppressions. He said (v. 6), to God in prayer, to himself in meditation, to his friends in complaint, O that I had wings like a dove! He was so surrounded with enemies that he saw not how he could escape but upon the wing, and therefore he wishes, O that I had wings! not like a hawk that flies strongly, but like a dove that flies swiftly; he wishes for wings, not to fly upon the prey, but to fly from the birds of prey, for such his enemies were. The dove flies low, and takes shelter as soon as she can, and thus would David fly. He would make his escape —from the wind, storm, and tempest, the tumult and ferment that the city was now in, and the danger to which he was exposed. "I would fly away and be at rest, v. 6. I would fly anywhere, if it were to a barren frightful wilderness, ever so far off, so I might be quiet," v. 7.

David here complains of his enemies, whose wicked plots had brought him, though not to his faith's end, yet to his wits' end.

I. The character he gives of the enemies. They were of the worst sort of men, and his description of them agrees very well with Absalom and his accomplices. He complains of the city of Jerusalem, which strangely fell in with Absalom and fell off from David: How has that faithful city become a harlot! David did himself see nothing but violence and strife in the city (v. 9). He saw that violence and strife went about it day and night, and mounted its guards, v. 10. Wickedness, all manner of wickedness, is in the midst thereof. Deceit and guile, and all manner of treacherous dealing, departed not from her streets, v. 11. Is Jerusalem, the headquarters of God's priests, so ill taught? Can Jerusalem be ungrateful to David himself, its own illustrious founder, and be made too hot for him, so that he cannot reside in it? He complains of one of the ringleaders of the conspiracy, that had been very industrious to foment jealousies, to misrepresent him and his government, and to incense the city against him. Who was most active in it? "Not a sworn enemy, not Shimei, nor any of the nonjurors; then I could have borne it, for I should not have expected better from them." But it was thou, a man, my equal, v. 13. The Chaldee-paraphrase names Ahithophel as the person here meant. "We took counsel together, spent many an hour together, with a great deal of pleasure, in religious discourse," or, as Dr. Hammond reads it, "We joined ourselves together to the assembly; I gave him the right hand of fellowship in holy ordinances, and then we walked to the house of God in company, to attend the public service." There always has been, and always will be, a mixture of good and bad, sound and unsound, in the visible church. We must not wonder if we be sadly deceived in some that have made great pretensions to those two sacred things, religion and friendship; David himself, though a very wise man, was thus imposed upon, which may make similar disappointments the more tolerable. to us

II. His prayers against them. He prays, 1. That God would disperse them, as he did the Babel-builders (v. 9): "Destroy, O Lord! and divide their tongues; by making them to disagree among themselves, and clash with one another." God often destroys the church's enemies by dividing them; nor is there a surer way to the destruction of any people than their division. 2. That God would destroy them, as he did Dathan and Abiram, Num. xvi. 30. "Let death seize upon them by divine warrant, and let them go down quickly into hell; let them be dead, and buried, and so utterly destroyed, in a moment; for wickedness is wherever they are; it is in the midst of them."

In these verses,

I. David perseveres in his resolution to call upon God, being well assured that he should not seek him in vain (v. 16): "As for me, let them take what course they please to secure themselves, let violence and strife be their guards, prayer shall be mine; this I have found comfort in, and therefore this will I abide by: I will call upon God, and commit myself to him, and the Lord shall save me." "I will pray and cry aloud. I will meditate" (so the former word signifies). He will pray frequently, every day, and three times a day—evening, and morning, and at noon. Those that think three meals a day little enough for the body ought much more to think three solemn prayers a day little enough for the soul, and to count it a pleasure, not a task. It was Daniel's practice to pray three times a day (Dan. vi. 10), and noon was one of Peter's hours of prayer, Acts x. 9.

II. He assures himself that God would in due time give an answer of peace to his prayers.

1. That he himself should be delivered and his fears prevented. He begins to rejoice in hope (v. 18): God has delivered my soul in peace, that is, he will deliver it; David is as sure of the deliverance as if it were already wrought. With an eye of faith he now sees himself surrounded, as Elisha was, with chariots of fire and horses of fire, and therefore triumphs thus, There are many with me, more with me than against me, 2 Kings vi. 16, 17.

2. That his enemies should be reckoned with, and brought down.

(1) David here gives their character as the reason why he expected God would bring them down. They stand in no awe of God (v. 19): "Because they have no changes (no afflictions, no interruption to the constant course of their prosperity, no crosses to empty them from vessel to vessel) therefore they fear not God." They are treacherous and false, and will not be held by the most sacred and solemn engagements (v. 20). They are base and hypocritical, pretending friendship while they design mischief (v. 21): "The words of his mouth" (probably, he means Ahithophel particularly) "were smoother than butter and softer than oil, yet, at the same time, war was in his heart, and those very words had such a mischievous design in them that they were as drawn swords designed to stab."

(2) David here foretells their ruin. God shall hear and afflict them. God shall bring them down. They were bloody men, and cut others off, and therefore God will justly cut them off: they were deceitful men, and defrauded others of the one-half perhaps of what was their due, and now God will cut them short.

III. He encourages himself and all good people to commit themselves to God, with confidence in him. "I will trust in thee, in thy providence, and power, and mercy, and not in my own prudence, strength, or merit; when bloody and deceitful men are cut off in the midst of their days I shall still live by faith in thee." And this he will have others to do (v. 22): "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, whoever thou art that art burdened, and whatever the burden is." Cast thy care upon the Lord, so the LXX, to which the apostle refers, 1 Pet. v. 7. Care is a burden; it makes the heart stoop (Prov. xii. 25). To cast our burden upon God is to stay ourselves on his providence and promise. If we do so, it is promised, 1. That he will sustain us. He has not promised to free us immediately from that trouble which gives rise to our cares and fears; but he will provide that we be not tempted above what we are able. 2. That he will never suffer the righteous to be moved, to be so shaken by any troubles as to quit either their duty to God, or their comfort in him.

PSALM LVI

It seems by this, and many other psalms, that even in times of the greatest trouble and distress David never hung his harp upon the willow-trees, but that when his dangers and fears were greatest he was still in tune for singing God's praises. He was in imminent peril when he penned this psalm. I. He complains of the malice of his enemies, and begs mercy for himself and justice against them, ver. 1, 2, 5–7. II. He confides in God, being assured that he took his part and that while he lived he should praise God, ver. 3, 4, 8–13.

To the chief musician, upon Jonath-elem-rechokim, Michtam of David, when the Philistines took him to Gath.

David, in this psalm, by his faith throws himself into the hands of God, even when he had by his fear and folly thrown himself into the hands of the Philistines. 1 Sam. xxi. 10, 11. This is called Michtam —a golden psalm. So some other psalms are entitled, but this has something peculiar in the title; it is upon Jonath-elem-rechokim, which signifies the silent dove afar off. Some apply this to David himself, who wished for the wings of a dove on which to fly away. He was forced to wander afar off, to seek for shelter in distant countries; there he was like the doves of the valleys, mourning and melancholy; but silent, neither murmuring against God nor railing at the instruments of his trouble.

I. He complains to God the malice of his enemies, to show what reason he had to fear them (v. 1): Be merciful unto me, O God! That petition includes all the good we come to the throne of grace for. He prays that he might find mercy with God, for with men he could find no mercy. When he fled from the cruel hands of Saul he fell into the cruel hands of the Philistines. "Lord" (says he), "be thou merciful to me now, or I am undone." "They are many that fight against me, and think to overpower me with numbers; take notice of this, O thou Most High! and make it to appear that wherein they deal proudly thou art above them." They were very barbarous: they would swallow him up, v. 1 and again v. 2. They were very unanimous (v. 6): They gather themselves together; though they were many, and of different interests among themselves, yet they united and combined against David, as Herod and Pilate against the Son of David. They were very powerful, quite too hard for him if God did not help him: "They fight against me (v. 2); they oppress me, v. 1. I am almost overcome and borne down by them, and reduced to the last extremity." They were very subtle and crafty (v. 6): "They hide themselves; they cover their designs, that they may the more effectually prosecute and pursue them. They hide themselves as a lion in his den, that they may mark my steps"; that is, "they observe everything I say and do with a critical eye, that they may have something to accuse me of." They were very spiteful and malicious. "They wrest my words, put them upon the rack, to extort that out of them which was never in them." They were very restless and unwearied. They continually waited for his soul; it was the life, the precious life, they hunted for; it was his death they longed for, v. 6.

II. He encourages himself in God, and in his promises, power, and providence, v. 3, 4. "What time I am afraid, in the day of my fear, when I am most terrified from without and most timorous within, then I will trust in thee, and thereby my fears shall be silenced." He resolves to make God's promises the matter of his praises, In God I will praise, not only his work which he has done, but his word which he has spoken. Some understand by his word his providences, every event that he orders and appoints: "When I speak well of God I will with him speak well of everything that he does." Thus supported, he will bid defiance to all adverse powers: "When in God I have put my trust, I am safe, I am easy, and I will not fear what flesh can do unto me." As we must not trust to an arm of flesh when it is engaged for us, so we must not be afraid of an arm of flesh when it is stretched out against us.

III. He foresees and foretells the fall of those that fought against him (v. 7): Shall they escape by iniquity? They hope to escape God's judgments, as they escape men's, by violence and fraud, and the arts of injustice and treachery; but shall they escape? No, certainly they shall not. The sin of sinners will never be their security.

Several things David here comforts himself with in the day of his distress and fear.

I. That God took particular notice of all his grievances and all his griefs, v. 8. Thou tellest my wanderings, my flittings, so the old translation. David was now but a young man (under thirty) and yet he had had many removes, from his father's house to the court, thence to the camp, and now he was hunted like a partridge upon the mountains; but this comforted him, that God kept a particular account of all his motions, and numbered all the weary steps he took, by night or by day. When he was wandering he was often weeping, and therefore prays, "Put thou my tears into thy bottle, to be preserved and looked upon: nay, I know they are in thy book, the book of thy remembrance." God has a bottle and a book for his people's tears, both those for their sins and those for their afflictions. He observes them with compassion and tender concern; he is afflicted in their afflictions, and knows their souls in adversity. Paul was mindful of Timothy's tears (2 Tim. i. 4), and God will not forget the sorrows of his people. God will comfort his people according to the time wherein he has afflicted them, and give to those to reap in joy who sowed in tears. What was sown a tear will come up a pearl.

II. That his prayers would be powerful for the defeat and discomfiture of his enemies, as well as for his own support and encouragement (v. 9): "When I cry unto thee, then shall my enemies turn back; I need no other weapons than prayers and tears; this I know, for God is for me, to plead my cause, to protect and deliver me; and, if God be for me, who can be against me so as to prevail?" We fight best upon our knees, Eph. vi. 18.

III. That his faith in God would set him above the fear of man, v. 10, 11. Here he repeats, with a strong pathos, what he had said (v. 4), "In God will I praise his word; that is, I will firmly depend upon the promise for the sake of him that made it." In God have I put my trust, and in him only, and therefore "I will not be afraid what man can do unto me (v. 11), though I know very well what he would do if he could," v. 1, 2.

IV. That he was in bonds to God (v. 12): "Thy vows are upon me, O God!—not upon me as a burden which I am loaded with, but as a badge which I glory in. It ought to be the matter of our consideration and joy that the vows of God are upon us—our baptismal vows renewed at the Lord's table, our occasional vows under convictions, under corrections, by these we are bound to live to God.

V. That he should still have more and more occasion to praise him: I will render praises unto thee. This is part of the performance of his vows; for vows of thankfulness properly accompany prayers for mercy, and when the mercy is received must be made good. "Thou hast delivered my soul, my life, from death, which was just ready to seize me." If God have delivered us from sin, either from the commission of it by preventing grace or from the punishment of it by pardoning mercy, we have reason to own that he has thereby delivered our souls from death, which is the wages of sin. "Thou wilt deliver my feet from falling; thou hast done the greater, and therefore thou wilt do the less; thou hast begun a good work, and therefore thou wilt carry it on and perfect it." Those that think they stand must take heed lest they fall, because the best stand no longer than God is pleased to uphold them. God never brought his people out of Egypt to slay them in the wilderness. He that in conversion delivers the soul from so great a death as sin is will not fail to preserve it to his heavenly kingdom.

PSALM LVII

This psalm is very much like that which goes next before it; it was penned upon a like occasion, when David was both in danger of trouble and in temptation to sin; it begins as that did, "Be merciful to me"; the method also is the same. I. He begins with prayer and complaint, yet not without some assurance of speeding in his request, ver. 1–6. II. He concludes with joy and praise, ver. 7–11.

To the chief musician, Al-taschith, Michtam of David, when he fled from Saul in the cave.

The title of this psalm has one word new in it, Al-taschith—Destroy not. Some make it to be only some known tune to which this psalm was set; others apply it to the occasion and matter of the psalm. Destroy not; that is, David would not let Saul be destroyed, when now in the cave there was a fair opportunity of killing him, and his servants would fain have done so. No, says David, destroy him not, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4, 6. Or, rather, God would not let David be destroyed by Saul; he suffered him to persecute David, but still under his limitation, Destroy him not.

I. He supports himself with faith and hope in God, and prayer to him, v. 1, 2. Be merciful to me, O Lord! It was the publican's prayer, Luke xviii. 13. To recommend himself to God's mercy, he here professes,

1. That all his dependence is upon God: My soul trusteth in thee, v. 1. At the footstool of the throne of his grace, he humbly professes his confidence in him: In the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge, as the chickens take shelter under the wings of the hen when the birds of prey are ready to strike at them, until these calamities be over-past. He was confident his troubles would end well, in due time; these calamities will be over-past. He comforted himself in the goodness of God's nature, by which he is inclined to succour and protect his people, as the hen is by instinct to shelter her young ones.

2. That all his desire is towards God (v. 2): "I will cry unto God most high, for succour and relief; to him that is most high will I lift up my soul, and pray earnestly, even unto God that performs all things for me."

3. That all his expectation is from God (v. 3): He shall send from heaven, and save me. Those that make God their only refuge, and fly to him by faith and prayer, may be sure of salvation, in his way and time. Look which way he will, on this earth, refuge fails, no help appears; but he looks for it from heaven. Those that lift up their hearts to things above may thence expect all good. God shall send forth his mercy and truth. We need no more to make us happy than to have the benefit of the mercy and truth of God, xxv. 10.

II. He represents the power and malice of his enemies (v. 4): My soul is among lions. He describes their malicious projects against him (v. 6) and shows the issue of them: "They have prepared a net for my steps, in which to take me, and I might not again escape out of their hands; they have digged a pit before me, that I might, ere I am aware, run headlong into it." But let us see what comes of it. 1. It is indeed some disturbance to David: My soul is bowed down. But, 2. It was destruction to themselves; they dug a pit for David, into the midst whereof they have fallen.

III. He prays to God to glorify himself and his own great name (v. 5): "Whatever becomes of me and my interest, be thou exalted, O God! above the heavens, and let thy glory be above or over all the earth; let all the inhabitants of this earth be brought to know and praise thee." Thus God's glory should lie nearer our hearts, and we should be more concerned for it, than for any particular interests of our own. When David was in the greatest distress and disgrace he did not pray, Lord, exalt me, but, Lord, exalt thy own name. Thus the Son of David, when his soul was troubled, and he prayed, Father, save me from this hour, immediately withdrew that petition, and presented this in the room of it, For this cause came I to this hour; Father, glorify thy name, John xii. 27, 28.

How strangely is the tune altered here! David's prayer and complaints, by the lively actings of faith, are here, all of a sudden, turned into praises and thanksgivings. Observe,

I. How he prepares himself for the duty of praise (v. 7): My heart is fixed, O God! my heart is fixed. My heart is erect, or lifted up (so some), which was bowed down, v. 6. My heart is fixed, it is prepared for every event, being stayed upon God, cxii. 7; Isa. xxvi. 3. My heart is fixed to sing and give praise, attending on the Lord without distraction.

II. How he excites himself to the duty of praise (v. 8): Awake up my glory, that is, my tongue (our tongue is our glory, and never more so than when it is employed in praising God), or my soul, that must be first awakened; dull and sleepy devotions will never be acceptable to God.

III. How he pleases himself, and even prides himself, in the work of praise. He resolves to praise him among the people and to sing unto him among the nations, v. 9. This intimates, 1. That he would even make the earth ring with his sacred songs, that all might take notice how much he thought himself indebted to the goodness of God. 2. That he desires to bring others in to join with him in praising God. He will publish God's praises among the people. David, in his psalms, which fill the universal church, and will to the end of time, may be said to be still praising God among the people and singing to him among the nations; for all good people make use of his words in praising God.

IV. How he furnishes himself with matter for praise, v. 10. Thy mercy is great unto the heavens, great beyond conception and expression; and thy truth unto the clouds, great beyond discovery, for what eye can reach that which is wrapped up in the clouds?

V. How he leaves it at last to God to glorify his own name (v. 11): Be thou exalted, O God!

PSALM LVIII

It is the probable conjecture of some that before Saul began to persecute David by force of arms, he formed a process against him by course of law, upon which he was condemned unheard, and attainted as a traitor, by the great council, and then proclaimed "an outlawed wolf", whom any man might kill and no man might protect. The elders, in order to curry favour with Saul, having passed this bill of attainder, it is supposed that David penned this psalm on the occasion. I. He describes their sin, ver. 1–5. II. He imprecates and foretells their ruin (ver 6–9), which would redound, 1. To the comfort of the saints, ver. 10. 2. To the glory of God, ver. 11.

To the chief musician, Al-taschith, Michtam of David.

We have reason to think that this psalm refers to the malice of Saul against David.

In these verses David, not as a king, for he had not yet come to the throne, but as a prophet, in God's name arraigns and convicts his judges. Two things he charges them with:—

I. The corruption of their government. They were a congregation, a bench of justices. One would not have thought a congregation of such could be bribed and biassed with pensions, and yet, it seems, they were, because the son of Kish could do that for them which the son of Jesse could not, 1 Sam. xxii. 7. The judges would not do right, would not protect or vindicate oppressed innocency (v. 1): "Do you indeed speak righteousness, or judge uprightly? No; your own consciences cannot but tell you that you do not discharge the trust reposed in you as magistrates, by which you are bound to be a terror to evildoers and a praise to those that do well. Remember you are sons of men; mortal and dying, and that you stand upon the same level before God with the meanest of those you trample upon, and must yourselves be called to an account and judged. In heart you work wickedness. The more there is of the heart in any act of wickedness the worse it is, Eccles. viii. 11. And what was their wickedness? "You weigh the violence of your hands in the earth" (or in the land), "the peace of which you are appointed to be the conservators of." They did all the vioence and injury they could, either to enrich or avenge themselves, and they weighed it. They did it with a great deal of craft and caution: "You frame it by rule and lines" (so the word signifies). They did it under colour of justice.

II. The corruption of their nature. This was the root of bitterness from which that gall and wormwood sprang (v. 3): The wicked, who in heart work wickedness, are estranged from the womb, estranged from God and all good, alienated from the divine life, and its principles, powers, and pleasures, Eph. iv. 18. They are called, and not miscalled, transgressors from the womb; one can therefore expect no other than that they will deal very treacherously; see Isa. xlviii. 8. They go astray from God and their duty as soon as they are born (that is, as soon as possibly they can); the foolishness that is bound up in their hearts appears with the first operations of reason. Three instances are here given of the corruption of nature:—1. Falsehood. They soon learn to speak lies, and bend their tongues, like their bows, for that purpose, Jer. ix. 3. 2. Malice. Their poison (that is, their ill-will, and the spite they bore to goodness and all good men, particularly to David) was like the poison of a serpent, innate, venomous, and very mischievous, and that which they can never be cured of. 3. Untractableness. They are malicious, and nothing will work upon them, no reason, no kindness, to mollify them, and bring them to a better temper. They are like the deaf adder that stops her ear, v. 4, 5. David compares them to the deaf adder or viper, concerning which there was then this tradition, that whereas, by music or some other art, they had a way of charming serpents, to destroy them or at least disable them to do mischief, this deaf adder would lay one ear to the ground and stop the other with her tail, so that she could not hear the voice of the enchantment, and so defeated the intention of it and secured herself.

In these verses we have,

I. David's prayers against his enemies, and all the enemies of God's church and people. 1. He prays that they might be disabled to do any further mischief (v. 6): Break their teeth, O God! Not so much that they might not feed themselves as that they might not be able to make prey of others, iii. 7. He does not say, "Break their necks" (no; let them live to repent, slay them not, lest my people forget), but, "Break their teeth, for they are lions, they are young lions, that live by rapine." 2. That they might be disappointed in the plots they had already laid, and might not gain their point: "When he bends his bow, and takes aim to shoot his arrows at the upright in heart, let them be as cut in pieces, v. 7. Let them fall at his feet, and never come near the mark." 3. That they and their interest might waste and come to nothing, that they might melt away as waters that run continually; that is, as water spilt upon the ground, which cannot be gathered up again, but gradually dries away and disappears. He prays (v. 8) that they might melt as a snail, which wastes by its own motion, in every stretch it makes leaving some of its moisture behind, which, by degrees, must needs consume it, though it makes a path to shine after it. And he prays that they might be like the untimely birth of a woman, which dies as soon as it begins to live and never sees the sun.

II. His prediction of their ruin (v. 9): "Before your pots can feel the heat of a fire of thorns made under them." 1. The proverbial expressions are somewhat difficult, but the sense is plain, that the judgments of God often surprise wicked people in the midst of their jollity, and hurry them away of a sudden. 2. There are two things which the psalmist promises himself as the effects of sinners' destruction: (1) That saints would be encouraged and comforted by it (v. 10): The righteous shall rejoice when he sees the vengeance. The prosperity and success of the wicked are a discouragement to the righteous; they sadden their hearts, and are sometimes a strong temptation to them to question their foundations, lxxiii. 2, 13. But when they see the judgments of God they rejoice in the confirmation thereby given to their faith in the providence of God and his justice and righteousness in governing the world. (2) That sinners would be convinced and converted by it, v. 11. The vengeance God sometimes takes on the wicked in this world will bring men to say, Verily, there is a reward for the righteous. Some shall have their minds so changed that they shall willingly own it, and see with satisfaction, That God is, and, [1] That he is the bountiful rewarder of his saints and servants: Verily (however it be, so it may be read) there is a fruit to the righteous. Even in this world there is a reward for the righteous. [2] That he is the righteous governor of the world, and will surely reckon with the enemies of his kingdom. He is a God (so we read it), not a weak man, not an angel, not a mere name, not (as the atheists suggest) a creature of men's fear and fancy, not a deified hero, not the sun and moon, as idolaters imagined, but a God, a self-existent perfect Being; he it is that judges the earth.

PSALM LIX

This psalm is of the same nature and scope with six or seven foregoing psalms; they are all filled with David's complaints of the malice of his enemies and of their cursed and cruel designs against him, his prayers and prophecies against them, and his comfort and confidence in God as his God. The first is the language of nature, and may be allowed; the second of a prophetical spirit, looking forward to Christ and the enemies of his kingdom, and therefore not to be drawn into a precedent; the third of grace and a most holy faith, which ought to be imitated by every one of us. In this psalm, I. He prays to God to defend and deliver him from his enemies, ver. 1–7. II. He foresees and foretells the destruction of his enemies, ver. 8–17.

To the chief musician, Al-taschith, Michtam of David, when Saul sent and they watched the house to kill him.

Saul sent a party of his guards to beset David's house in the night, that they might seize him and kill him; we have the story 1 Sam. xix. 11. It was when his hostilities against David were newly begun, and he had but just before narrowly escaped Saul's javelin. These first cruptions of Saul's malice could not but put David into disorder and be both grievous and terrifying, and yet he kept up his communion with God, and such a composure of mind as that he was never out of frame for prayer and praises.

I. David prays to be delivered out of the hands of his enemies, "Deliver me from my enemies, O my God! thou art God, and canst deliver me, my God, under whose protection I have put myself. Set me on high out of the reach of the power and malice of those that rise up against me. O deliver me! and save me." He prays (v. 4), "Awake to help me, take cognizance of my case, behold that with an eye of pity, and exert thy power for my relief." Thus the disciples, in the storm, awoke Christ, saying, Master, save us, we perish. And thus earnestly should we pray daily to be defended and delivered from our spiritual enemies, the temptations of Satan, and the corruptions of our own hearts, which war against our spiritual life.

II. He pleads for deliverance. Our God gives us leave to plead, not to move him, but to move ourselves. David does so here.

1. He pleads the bad character of his enemies. They are workers of iniquity, and therefore not only his enemies, but God's enemies; they are bloody men, and therefore not only his enemies, but enemies to all mankind.

2. He pleads their malice against him, and the imminent danger he was in from them, v. 3. "They lie in wait, taking an opportunity to do me a mischief. They are united by league, and actually gathered together against me. They are very ingenious in their contrivances and (v. 4): They run and prepare themselves, with the utmost speed and fury, to do me a mischief." He takes particular notice of the brutish conduct of the messengers that Saul sent to take him (v. 6): "They return at evening from the posts assigned them in the day, to apply themselves to their works of darkness, and then they make a noise like a hound in pursuit of the hare." They belch out with their mouth the malice that boils in their hearts, v. 7. Swords are in their lips; that is, reproaches that wound my heart with grief (xlii. 10), and slanders that stab and wound my reputation.

3. He pleads his own innocency, not as to God (he was never backward to own himself guilty before him), but as to his persecutors, "Not for my transgression, nor for my sin, O Lord! thou knowest, who knowest all things." And again (v. 4), without my fault. The innocency of the godly will not secure them from the malignity of the wicked. Though our innocency will not secure us from troubles, yet it will greatly support and comfort us under our troubles. If we are conscious to ourselves of our innocency, we may with humble confidence appeal to God and beg of him to plead our injured cause.

4. He pleads that his enemies were profane and atheistical, and bolstered themselves up in their enmity to David, with the contempt of God: For who, say they, doth hear? v. 7. Not God himself, x. 11; xciv. 7.

III. He refers himself and his cause to the just judgment of God, v. 5. Be not merciful to any wicked transgressors. Selah—Mark that. Though he had transgressed, he was a penitent transgressor, and did not obstinately persist in what he had done amiss. Therefore he could appeal to God in this way.

Verses 8–17

David here encourages himself, in reference to the threatening power of his enemies, with a pious resolution to wait upon God.

I. He resolves to wait upon God (v. 9): "Because of his strength." It is our wisdom and duty, in times of danger and difficulty, to wait upon God; for he is our defence. He hopes God will be to him a God of mercy (v. 10): "The God of my mercy shall prevent me with the blessings of his goodness and the gifts of his mercy, and be better to me than my own expectations." Whatever mercy there is in God, it is laid up for us; and is ready to be laid out upon us. Here are several things which he foretells concerning his enemies. He foresees that God would expose them to scorn, as they had indeed made themselves ridiculous, v. 8. "They think God does not hear them, but thou, O Lord! shalt laugh at them for their folly, to think that he who planted the ear shall not hear, and thou shalt have all such other heathenish people that live without God in the world, in derision." God would make them standing monuments of his justice (v. 11): Slay them not; let them not be killed outright, lest my people forget. Thus Cain himself, though a murderer, was not slain, lest the vengeance should be forgotten, but was sentenced to be a fugitive and a vagabond. "So scatter them that they may never again unite to do mischief, bring them down, O Lord, our shield!" For the sin of their mouth, even for the words of their lips, let them for this be taken in their pride, even for their cursing others and themselves (a sin Saul was subject to, 1 Sam. xiv. 28, 44), and lying. Saul and his party think to rule and carry all before them, but they shall be made to know that there is a higher than they, that there is one who does and will overrule them. He rules in Jacob; for there he keeps his court; there he is known, and his name is great. But he rules to the end of the earth; for all nations are within the territories of his kingdom. Their sin was their hunting for David to make a prey of him; their punishment should be that they should be reduced to such extreme poverty that they should hunt about for meat to satisfy their hunger. Thus they should be, not cut off at once, but scattered (v. 11). He foretells that they should be forced to beg their bread from door to door. They shall make a noise like a dog. When they were in quest of David they made a noise like an angry dog snarling and barking; now, when they are in quest of meat, they shall make a noise like a hungry dog howling and wailing. Those that repent of their sins mourn, when in trouble, like doves; those whose hearts are hardened make a noise, when in trouble, like dogs, like a wild bull in a net, full of the fury of the Lord. If they be not satisfied, they will tarry all night, so that what people do give them is not with goodwill, but only to get rid of them, lest by their continual coming they weary them. It is not poverty, but discontent, that makes a man unhappy.

II. He expects to praise God, that God's providence would find him matter for praise and that God's grace would work in him a heart for praise, v. 16, 17.

1. He would praise his power and his mercy; both should be the subject-matter of his song. Power, without mercy, is to be dreaded; mercy, without power, is not what a man can expect much benefit from; but God's power by which he is able to help us, and his mercy by which he is inclined to help us, will justly be the everlasting praise of all the saints. He would praise him because he had, many a time, found him his defence and his refuge in the day of trouble.

2. He would sing aloud, as one much affected with the glory of God, that was not ashamed to own it, and that desired to affect others with it.

PSALM LX

After many psalms which David penned in a day of distress this was calculated for a day of triumph; it was penned after he was settled in the throne, upon occasion of an illustrious victory which God blessed his forces with over the Syrians and Edomites; it was when David was in the zenith of his prosperity, and the affairs of his kingdom seem to have been in a better posture than ever they were either before or after. See 2 Sam. viii. 3, 13; 1 Chron. xviii. 3, 12. David, in prosperity, was as devout as David in adversity. In this psalm, I. He reflects upon the bad state of the public interests, for many years, ver. 1–3. II. He takes notice of the happy turn lately given to their affairs, ver. 4. III. He prays for the deliverance of God's Israel from their enemies, ver. 5. IV. He triumphs in hope of their victories, ver. 6–12.

To the chief musician, upon Shushan-eduth, Michtam of David, to teach, when he strove with Aram-naharaim, and with Aramzobah, when Joab returned and smote of Edom in the valley of salt 12,000.

The general design of the psalm. It is Michtam—David's jewel, and it is to teach. The Levites must teach it to the people, and by it teach them both to trust in God and to triumph in him. He was at war with the Syrians, and still had a conflict with them, both those of Mesopotamia and those of Zobah. He had gained a great victory over the Edomites, by his forces, under the command of Joab, who had left 12,000 of the enemy dead upon the spot. He is in care about his strife with the Assyrians, and in reference to that he prays.

In these verses, which begin the psalm, we have,

I. A melancholy memorial of the many disgraces and disappointments which God had, for some years past, put the people under. 1. He complains of hard things which they had seen (that is, which they had suffered), while the Philistines and other ill-disposed neighbours took all advantages against them, v. 3. 2. He owns God's displeasure to be the cause of all the hardships they had undergone: "Thou hast been displeased by us, displeased against us (v. 1), and in thy displeasure hast cast us off and scattered us, else our enemies could not have prevailed thus against us." 3. He laments the ill effects and consequences of the miscarriages of the late years. The whole nation was in a convulsion: Thou hast made the earth (or the land) to tremble, v. 2. The good people themselves were in a consternation: "Thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment (v. 3); we were like men intoxicated, and at our wits' end, not knowing how to reconcile these dispensations with God's promises; we can do nothing, nor know we what to do." When God is turning his hand in our favour, it is good to remember our former calamities. Our calamities serve as foils to our joys.

II. A thankful notice of the encouragement God had given them to hope that, though things had been long bad, they would now begin to mend (v. 4): "Thou hast given a banner to those that fear thee (for, as bad as the times are, there is a remnant among us that desire to fear thy name, for whom thou hast a tender concern), that it may be displayed by thee, because of the truth of thy promise which thou wilt perform, and to be displayed by them, in defence of truth and equity," xlv. 4. This banner was David's government, the establishment and enlargement of it over all Israel. It united them, as soldiers are gathered together to their colours. It animated them, and put life and courage into them. It struck a terror upon their enemies, to whom they could now hang out a flag of defiance. Christ, the Son of David, is given for an ensign of the people (Isa. xi. 10), for a banner to those that fear God; in him, as the centre of their unity, they glory and take courage. His love is the banner over them; in his name and strength they wage war with the powers of darkness, and under him the church becomes terrible as an army with banners.

III. A humble petition for seasonable mercy. O turn thyself to us again! (v. 1); smile upon us, be at peace with us, and in that peace we shall have peace. "Heal the breaches of our land (v. 2), not only the breaches made upon us by our enemies, but the breaches made among ourselves by our unhappy divisions." Thus they might be preserved out of the hands of their enemies (v. 5): "That thy beloved may be delivered, save with thy right hand, and by such instruments as thou art pleased to make the men of thy right hand, and hear me." God's praying people may take the general deliverances of the church as answers to their prayers in particular.

David is here rejoicing in hope and praying in hope (v. 6): "God has spoken in his holiness (that is, he has given me his word of promise, has sworn by his holiness, and he will not lie unto David, lxxxix. 35), therefore I will rejoice with the hopes of the performance of the promise, which was intended for more than a pleasing promise."

I. David here rejoices in prospect of two things:—

1. The perfecting of this revolution in his own kingdom. God having spoken in his holiness that David shall be king, he doubts not but the kingdom is all his own, as sure as if it were already in his hand: I will divide Shechem (a pleasant city in Mount Ephraim) and mete out the valley of Succoth, as my own. Gilead is mine, and Manasseh is mine, and both are entirely reduced, v. 7. Ephraim would furnish him with soldiers for his lifeguards and his standing forces; Judah would furnish him with able judges for his courts of justice; and thus Ephraim would be the strength of his head and Judah his lawgiver. Thus may an active believer triumph in the promises, for they are all yea and amen in Christ. "God has spoken in his holiness, and then pardon is mine, peace mine, grace mine, Christ mine, heaven mine, God himself mine." All is yours, for you are Christ's, 1 Cor. iii. 22, 23.

2. The conquering of the neighbouring nations, which had been vexatious to Israel, and which were still dangerous, and opposed to David, v. 8. Moab shall be enslaved, and put to the meanest drudgery. The Moabites became David's servants, 2 Sam. viii. 2. Edom shall be made a dunghill to throw old shoes upon; at least David shall take possession of it as his own, which was signified by drawing off his shoe over, it, Ruth iv. 7. As for the Philistines, let them, if they dare, triumph over him as they had done; he will soon force them to change their note. But the war is not yet brought to an end; there is a strong city, Rabbah (perhaps) of the children of Ammon, which yet holds out; Edom is not yet subdued. Now David is here enquiring for help to carry on the war: "Who will bring me into the strong city? Wilt not thou, O God? For thou hast spoken in thy holiness; and wilt not thou be as good as thy word?" He takes notice of the frowns of Providence they had been under: Thou hadst, in appearance, cast us off; thou didst not go forth with our armies. At the same time that they own God's justice in what was past they hope in his mercy for what was to come.

II. He prays in hope. His prayer is, Give us help from trouble, v. 11. Even in the day of their triumph they see themselves in trouble, because still in war, which is troublesome even to the prevailing side. Though now they were conquerors yet (so uncertain are the issues of war), unless God gave them help in the next engagement, they might be defeated; therefore, Lord, send us help from the sanctuary. Help from trouble is rest from war, which they prayed for, as those that contended for equity, not for victory. "Through God we shall do valiantly, and so we shall do victoriously; for he it is, and he only, that shall tread down our enemies, and shall have the praise of doing it." Though it is God that performs all things for us, yet there is something to be done by us. Hope in God is the best principle of true courage. Those that do their duty under his conduct may afford to do it valiantly; for what need those fear who have God on their side?

PSALM LXI

David, in this psalm, as in many others, begins with prayers and tears, but ends with songs of praise. Thus the soul, by being lifted up to God, returns to the enjoyment of itself. It should seem David was driven out and banished when he penned this psalm, whether by Saul or Absalom is uncertain. I. He will call upon God because God had protected him, ver. 1–3. II. He will call upon God because God had provided well for him, ver. 4, 5. III. He will praise God because he had an assurance of the continuance of God's favour to him, ver. 6–8.

To the chief musician upon Neginah. A psalm of David.

I. David's close adherence and application to God by prayer in the day of his distress and trouble: "Whatever comes, I will cry unto thee (v. 2). as one that will not let thee go except thou bless me." This he will do, "From the end of the earth, or of the land, from the most remote and obscure corner of the country, will I cry unto thee. Though my heart is overwhelmed, it is not so sunk, so burdened, but that it may be lifted up to God in prayer. Nay, because my heart is ready to be overwhelmed, therefore I will cry unto thee, for by that means it will be supported and relieved." Weeping must quicken praying, and not deaden it.

II. The particular petition he put up to God when his heart was overwhelmed and he was ready to sink: Lead me to the rock that is higher than I; that is, "To the rock which is too high for me to get up to unless thou help me to it. To the rock on the top of which I shall be set further out of the reach of my troubles, and nearer the serene and quiet region, than I can be by any power or wisdom of my own." This rock is Christ; those are safe that are in him.

III. His desire and expectation of an answer of peace. He begs in faith (v. 1): "Hear my cry, O God! attend unto my prayer; that is, let me have the present comfort of knowing that I am heard (xx. 6), and in due time let me have that which I pray for."

IV. The ground of this expectation, and the plea he uses to enforce his petition (v. 3): "Thou hast been a shelter for me; I have found in thee a rock higher than I: therefore I trust thou wilt still lead me to that rock."

V. His resolution to continue in the way of duty to God and dependence on him, v. 4. David was now banished from the tabernacle, which was his greatest grievance, but he is assured that God by his providence would bring him back. He speaks of abiding in it for ever because that tabernacle was a type and figure of heaven, Heb. ix. 8, 9, 24. Those that dwell in God's tabernacle, as it is a house of duty, during their short ever on earth, shall dwell in that tabernacle which is the house of glory during an endless ever. I will make my refuge in the covert of his wings, as the chickens seek both warmth and safety under the wings of the hen.

Verses 5–8

I. With what pleasure David looks back upon what God had done for him formerly (v. 5): Thou, O God! hast heard my vows. God is a witness to all our vows, all our good purposes, and all our solemn promises of new obedience. "The prayers thou hast graciously heard and answered," encouraged him now to pray, O God! hear my cry. "Thou hast heard my vows, and given a real answer to them; for thou hast given me a heritage of those that fear thy name." We need desire no better heritage than that of those who fear God.

II. With what assurance he looks forward to the continuance of his life (v. 6): Thou shalt prolong the king's life. His resolution was to abide in God's tabernacle for ever (v. 4), in a way of duty; and now his hope is that he shall abide before God for ever, in a way of comfort.

III. With what importunity he begs of God to take him and keep him always under his protection: O prepare mercy and truth which may preserve him! David is sure that God will prolong his life, and therefore prays that he would preserve it, not that he would prepare him a strong lifeguard, or a well-fortified castle, but that he would prepare mercy and truth for his preservation. We need not desire to be better secured than under the protection of God's mercy and truth.

IV. With what cheerfulness he vows the grateful returns of duty to God (v. 8): So will I sing praise unto thy name for ever. That I may daily perform my vows. His praising God was itself the performance of his vows.

PSALM LXII

This psalm has nothing in it directly either of prayer or praise, nor does it appear upon what occasion it was penned, nor whether upon any particular occasion, whether mournful or joyful. But in it, I. David with a great deal of pleasure professes his own confidence in God and dependence upon him, ver. 1–7. II. With a great deal of earnestness he excites and encourages others to trust in God likewise, and not in any creature, ver. 8–12.

To the chief musician, to Jeduthun. A psalm of David.

Verses 1–7

I. David's profession of dependence upon God, and upon him only, for all good (v. 1): Truly my soul waiteth upon God. Nevertheless (so some) or "However it be, whatever difficulties or dangers I may meet with, though God frown upon me and I meet with discouragements in my attendance on him, yet still my soul waits upon God" (or is silent to God, as the word is), "says nothing against what he does, but quietly expects what he will do." "From him I know it will come, and therefore on him will I patiently wait till it does come, for his time is the best time."

II. The ground and reason of this dependence (v. 2): He only is my rock and my salvation; he is my defence. Creatures are insufficient; they are nothing without him, and therefore I will look above them to him.

III. The improvement he makes of his confidence in God. "If God is my strength and mighty deliverer, I shall not be greatly moved (that is, I shall not be undone and ruined); I may be shocked, but I shall not be sunk." His enemies are slighted, and all their attempts against him looked upon by him with contempt, v. 3, 4. "How long will you do it? Will you never be convinced of your error? Will your malice never have spent itself?" Envy was at the bottom of their malice; they were grieved at David's advancement, and therefore plotted, by diminishing his character, to hinder his preferment. They delight in lies. They bless with their mouth (they compliment David to his face), but they curse inwardly; in their hearts they wish him all mischief, and privately they are carrying on some evil design or other, by which they hope to ruin him. It is dangerous putting our trust in men who are thus false; but God is faithful. You shall be slain all of you, by the righteous judgments of God. Saul and his servants were slain by the Philistines on Mount Gilboa, according to this prediction. God's church is built upon a rock which will stand, but those that fight against it shall be as a bowing wall and a tottering fence, which, having a rotten foundation, falls of a sudden, and buries those in the ruins of it that put themselves under the shadow and shelter of it. David is himself encouraged to continue waiting upon God (v. 5–7). "If God will save my soul, as to everything else let him do what he pleases with me, and I will acquiesce in his disposals, knowing they shall all turn to my salvation," Phil. i. 19. He repeats (v. 6) what he had said concerning God (v. 2), as one that dwelt much upon it in his thoughts: He only is my rock and my salvation; he is my defence, I know he is; but there he adds, I shall not be greatly moved, here, I shall not be moved at all. And, as David's faith in God advances to an unshaken stayedness, so his joy in God improves itself into a holy triumph (v. 7): In God is my salvation and my glory.

Verses 8–12

Here we have David's exhortation to others to trust in God and wait upon him.

I. He counsels all to wait upon God, as he did, v. 8. You people (that is, all people); all shall be welcome to trust in God, for he is the confidence of all the ends of the earth, lxv. 5. "Trust in him; depend upon him to perform all things for you, upon his wisdom and goodness, his power and promise, his providence and grace. Do this at all times." Pour out your heart before him. The expression seems to allude to the pouring out of the drink-offerings before the Lord. When we make a penitent confession of sin our hearts are therein poured out before God, 1 Sam. vii. 6. But here it is meant of prayer, which, if it be as it should be, is the pouring out of the heart before God. We must lay our grievances before him, offer up our desires to him with all humble freedom, patiently submitting our wills to his: this is pouring out our hearts. God is a refuge for us, not only my refuge (v. 7), but a refuge for us all, even as many as will flee to him and take shelter in him.

II. He cautions us to take heed of misplacing our confidence. Let us not trust in the men of this world, for they are broken reeds (v. 9): Surely men of low degree are vanity, utterly unable to help us, and men of high degree are a lie, that will deceive us if we trust to them. But lay them in the balance, the balance of the scripture, or rather make trial of them, see how they will prove, whether they will answer your expectations from them or no, and you will write Tekel upon them; they are alike lighter than vanity. Let us not trust in the wealth of this world, let not that be made our strong city (v. 10): Trust not in oppression; that is, in riches got by fraud and violence. Nay, because it is hard to have riches and not to trust in them, if they increase, though by lawful and honest means, we must take heed lest we let out our affections inordinately towards them: "Set not your heart upon them; be not eager for them." This we are most in danger of doing when riches increase.

III. He gives a very good reason why we should make God our confidence, because he is a God of infinite power, mercy, and righteousness, v. 11, 12. "God has spoken it, and I have heard it, once, yea, twice. He has spoken it, and I have heard once, yea, twice (that is, many a time), by the events that have concerned me in particular. He has spoken it and I have heard it by the light of revelation, by dreams and visions (Job iv. 15), by the glorious manifestation of himself upon Mount Sinai" (to which, some think, it does especially refer), "and by the written word." To some God speaks twice and they will not hear once; but to others he speaks but once, and they hear twice. Compare Job xxxiii. 14. Now what is it which is thus spoken and thus heard? Power belongs to God; he is almighty, and can do everything; with him nothing is impossible. He is a God of infinite goodness. Here the psalmist turns his speech to God himself, as being desirous to give him the glory of his goodness, which is his glory: Also unto thee, O Lord! belongeth mercy. He is merciful in a way peculiar to himself; he is the Father of mercies, 2 Cor. i. 3. He never did, nor ever will do, any wrong to any of his creatures: For thou renderest to every man according to his work.

PSALM LXIII

This psalm has in it as much of warmth and lively devotion as any of David's psalms in so little a compass. As the sweetest of Paul's epistles were those that bore date out of a prison, so some of the sweetest of David's psalms were those that were penned, as this was, in a wilderness. I. His desire towards God, ver. 1, 2. II. His esteem of God, ver. 3, 4. III. His satisfaction in God, ver. 5. IV. His secret communion with God, ver. 6. V. His joyful dependence upon God, ver. 7, 8. VI. His holy triumph in God over his enemies and in the assurance of his own safety, ver. 9–11.

A psalm of David, when he was in the wilderness of Judah.

The title tells us when the psalm was penned, when David was in the wilderness of Judah; that is, in the forest of Hareth (1 Sam. xxii. 5) or in the wilderness of Ziph, 1 Sam. xxiii. 15. Even in Canaan, though a fruitful land and the people numerous, yet there were wildernesses, places less fruitful and less inhabited than other places. It will be so in the world, in the church, but not in heaven; there the wilderness shall blossom as the rose. The best and dearest of God's saints and servants may sometimes have their lot cast in a wilderness. There are psalms proper for a wilderness, and we have reason to thank God that it is the wilderness of Judah we are in, not the wilderness of Sin.

David, in these verses, stirs up himself to take hold on God,

I. By a lively active faith: O God! thou art my God. We must acknowledge that God is, that we speak to one that really exists and is present with us, when we say, O God! which is a serious word; pity it should ever be used as a by-word.

II. By pious and devout affections,

1. He resolves to seek God, and his favour and grace: Thou art my God, and therefore I will seek thee; for should not a people seek unto their God? Isa. viii. 19. Early will I seek thee. "My soul thirsteth for thee and my flesh longeth for thee (that is, my whole man is affected with this pursuit) here in a dry and thirsty land."

2. He longs to enjoy God. What is it that he does so passionately wish for? What is his petition and what is his request? It is this (v. 2), To see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary. That is, "To see it here in this wilderness as I have seen it in the tabernacle, to see it in secret as I have seen it in the solemn assembly." He longs to be brought out of the wilderness, not that he might see his friends again and be restored to the pleasures and gaieties of the court, but that he might have access to the sanctuary, not to see the priests there, and the ceremony of the worship, but to see thy power and glory. He does not say, as I have seen them, but "as I have seen thee." We cannot see the essence of God, but we see him in seeing by faith his attributes and perfections. Those were precious minutes which he spent in communion with God; he loved to think them over again.

How soon are David's complaints and prayers turned into praises and thanksgivings! David was now in a wilderness, and yet had his heart much enlarged in blessing God.

I. What David will praise God for (v. 3): Because thy loving kindness is better than life. It is our spiritual life, and that is better than temporal life, xxx. 5. We have better provisions and better possessions than the wealth of this world can afford us, and in the service of God, and in communion with him, we have better employments and better enjoyments than we can have in the business and converse of this world.

II. How he will praise God, and how long, v. 4. "Thus will I bless thee, thus as I have now begun; the present devout affections shall not pass away, like the morning cloud, but shine more and more, like the morning sun." I will bless thee while I live. Praising God must be the work of our whole lives. I will lift up my hands in thy name. In all our prayers and praises we are taught to begin with,—Hallowed be thy name, and to conclude with,—Thine is the glory.

III. With what pleasure and delight he would praise God, v. 5. My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness, not only as with bread, which is nourishing, but as with marrow, which is pleasant and delicious, Isa. xxv. 6. There is that in a gracious God, and in communion with him, which gives abundant satisfaction to a gracious soul, xxxvi. 8; lxv. 4. And there is that in a gracious soul which takes abundant satisfaction in God and communion with him. He will praise God with joyful lips. When with the heart man believes and is thankful with the mouth confession must be made of both, to the glory of God; not that the performances of the mouth are accepted without the heart (Matt. xv. 8), but out of the abundance of the heart the mouth must speak (xlv. 1). Praising lips must be joyful lips.

IV. How he would entertain himself with thoughts of God when he was most retired (v. 6): I will praise thee when I remember thee upon my bed. God was in all his thoughts, which is the reverse of the wicked man's character, x. 4. The thoughts of God were ready to him: "I remember thee; that is, when I go to think, I find thee at my right hand, present to my mind." And they were fixed in him: "I meditate on thee." Thoughts of God must not be transient thoughts, passing through the mind, but abiding thoughts, dwelling in the mind. David was now wandering and unsettled, but, wherever he came, he brought his religion along with him. When sleep departs from our eyes (through pain, or sickness of body, or any disturbance in the mind) our souls, by remembering God, may be at ease, and repose themselves. Perhaps an hour's pious meditation will do us more good than an hour's sleep would have done. See xvi. 7; xvii. 3; iv. 4; cxix. 62.

Verses 7–11

David here expresses his confidence in God and his joyful expectations from him (v. 7): In the shadow of thy wings I will rejoice, alluding either to the wings of the cherubim stretched out over the ark of the covenant, between which God is said to dwell, or to the wings of a fowl, under which the helpless young ones have shelter, as the eagle's young ones (Exod. xix. 4; Deut. xxxii. 11), which speaks the divine power, and the young ones of the common hen (Matt. xxiii. 37), which speaks more of divine tenderness. It is a phrase often used in the psalms (xvii. 8; xxxvi. 7; lvii. 1; lxi. 4; xci. 4), and nowhere else in this sense, except Ruth ii. 12, where Ruth, when she became a proselyte, is said to trust under the wings of the God of Israel. It is our duty to rejoice in the shadow of God's wings, which denotes our recourse to him by faith and prayer, as naturally as the chickens, when they are cold or frightened, run by instinct under the wings of the hen.

I. What were the supports and encouragements of David's confidence in God.

1. His former experiences of God's power in relieving him: "Because thou hast been my help when other helps and helpers failed me, therefore I will still rejoice in thy salvation, will trust in thee for the future, and will do it with delight and holy joy."

2. The present sense he had of God's grace carrying him on in these pursuits (v. 8): My soul follows hard after thee, which speaks a very earnest desire and a serious vigorous endeavour to keep up communion with God. David owns, to the glory of God, Thy right hand upholds me.

II. David triumphed in the hope,

1. That his enemies should be ruined, v. 9, 10. There were those that sought his soul to destroy it, not only his life (which they struck at, both to prevent his coming to the crown and because they envied and hated him for his wisdom, piety, and usefulness), but his soul, which they sought to destroy by banishing him from God's ordinances. But they shall go into the lower parts of the earth, to the grave, to hell; their enmity to David would be their death. They shall be a portion for foxes; either their dead bodies shall be a prey to ravenous beasts or their houses and estates shall be a habitation for wild beasts, Isa. xxxiv. 14.

2. That he himself should gain his point at last (v. 11), that he should be advanced to the throne to which he had been anointed: The king shall rejoice in God. David's advancement would be the consolation of his friends. Every one that swears to him (that is, to David), that comes into his interest and takes an oath of allegiance to him, shall glory in his success. Those that fear thee will be glad when they see me. Those that heartily espouse the cause of Christ shall glory in its victory at last. If we suffer with him, we shall reign with him. It would be the confutation of his enemies: The mouth of those that speak lies, of Saul, and Doeg, and others that misrepresented David, shall be quite stopped.

PSALM LXIV

This whole psalm has reference to David's enemies, persecutors, and slanders. I. He prays to God to preserve him from their malicious designs against him, ver. 1, 2. II. He gives a very bad character of them, ver. 3–6. III. By the spirit of prophecy he foretells their destruction.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

David, in these verses, puts in before God a representation of his own danger and of his enemies' character.

I. He earnestly begs of God to preserve him (v. 1, 2): Hear my voice, O God! in my prayer; that is, grant me the thing I pray for, and this is it, Lord, preserve my life from fear of the enemy. He prays, "Hide me from the secret counsel of the wicked, from the mischief which they secretly consult among themselves to do against me, and from the insurrection of the workers of iniquity, who join forces, as they join counsels, to do me a mischief."

II. He complains of the great malice and wickedness of his enemies.

1. They are very spiteful in their calumnies and reproaches, v. 3, 4. They are described as military men, with their sword and bow, archers that take aim exactly, secretly, and suddenly, and shoot at the harmless bird that apprehends not herself in any danger. Their tongues are their swords. The tongue is a little member, but, like the sword, it is a dangerous weapon. Bitter words are their arrows—scurrilous reflections, opprobrious nicknames, false representations, slanders, and calumnies. The upright man is their mark. The better any man is the more he is envied by those that are themselves bad, and the more ill is said of him. They shoot in secret, that those they shoot at may not discover them and avoid the danger, for in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird. And suddenly do they shoot, without giving a man lawful warning or any opportunity to defend himself. Herein they fear not, that is, they are confident of their success.

2. They are very close and very resolute in their malicious projects, v. 5. They consult with themselves and one another how to do the most mischief and most effectually: They commune of laying snares privily. All their communion is in sin and all their communication is how to sin securely. They say, Who shall see them? A practical disbelief of God's omniscience is at the bottom of all the wickedness of the wicked.

3. They are very industrious in putting their projects in execution (v. 6): "They search out iniquity; they take a great deal of pains to find out some iniquity or other to lay to my charge; they dig deep, and look far back, and put things to the utmost stretch, that they may have something to accuse me of." Half the pains that many take to damn their souls would serve to save them.

Verses 7–10

I. The judgments of God upon these malicious persecutors of David. The punishments answer the sin. 1. They shot at David secretly and suddenly, to wound him; but God shall shoot at them, for he ordains his arrows against the persecutors (vii. 13), against the face of them, xxi. 12. And God's arrows will hit surer, and fly swifter, and pierce deeper, than theirs do or can. 2. Their tongues fell upon him, but God shall make their tongues to fall upon themselves. Those that love cursing, it shall come unto them. Sometimes men's secret wickedness is brought to light by their own confession, and then their own tongue falls upon them.

II. The influence which these judgments should have upon others.

1. Their neighbours shall shun them and shift for their own safety. They shall flee away, for fear of being involved in their ruin.

2. Spectators shall reverence the providence of God therein, v. 9. They shall wisely consider his doing. They shall be affected with a holy awe of God upon the consideration of it. They shall speak to one another and to all about them of the justice of God in punishing persecutors. This is the finger of God.

3. Good people shall in a special manner take notice of it, v. 10. The righteous shall be glad in the Lord, not glad of the misery and ruin of their fellow-creatures, but glad that God is glorified, and his word fulfilled, and the cause of injured innocency pleaded effectually. It shall encourage their faith.

PSALM LXV

In this psalm we are directed to give to God the glory of his power and goodness, which appear, I. In the kingdom of grace (ver. 1), hearing prayer (ver. 2), pardoning sin (ver. 3), satisfying the souls of the people (ver. 4), protecting and supporting them, ver. 5. II. In the kingdom of Providence, fixing the mountains (ver. 6), calming the sea (ver. 7), preserving the regular succession of day and night (ver. 8), and making the earth fruitful, ver. 9–13.

To the chief musician. A psalm and song of David.

Verses 1–5

The psalmist here has no particular concern of his own at the throne of grace, but begins with an address to God, as the mouth of a congregation.

I. How he gives glory to God, v. 1. 1. By humble thankfulness: Praise waiteth for thee, O God! in Zion, waits in expectation of the mercy desired, waits till it arrives, that it may be received with thankfulness at its first approach. "Praise waits, with an entire satisfaction in thy holy will and dependence on thy mercy." Praise is silent unto thee (so the word is), as wanting words to express the great goodness of God. As there are holy groanings which cannot be uttered, so there are holy adorings which cannot be uttered. 2. By sincere faithfulness: Unto thee shall the vow be performed, that is, the sacrifice shall be offered up which was vowed. Better it is not to vow than to vow and not to pay.

II. What he gives him glory for.

1. For hearing prayer (v. 2): Praise waits for thee; and why is it so ready? (1) "Because thou art ready to grant our petitions. O thou that hearest prayer! thou canst answer every prayer, for thou art able to do for us more than we are able to ask or think (Eph. iii. 20), and thou wilt answer every prayer of faith, either in kind or kindness." (2) Because, for that reason, we are ready to run to him when we are in our straits. "Therefore, because thou art a God hearing prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come."

2. For pardoning sin. In this who is a God like unto him? Micah vii. 18. "Our sins reach to the heavens, iniquities prevail against us, our own consciences accuse us and we have no reply to make; and yet, as for our transgressions, thou shalt purge them away, so that we shall not come into condemnation for them."

3. For the kind entertainment he gives to those that attend upon him and the comfort they have in communion with him. Iniquity must first be purged away (v. 3) and then we are welcome to compass God's altars, v. 4.

(1) They are blessed. Not only blessed is the nation (xxxiii. 12), but blessed is the man, the particular person, how mean soever, whom thou choosest, and causest to approach unto thee, that he may dwell in thy courts. To come into communion with God is to converse with him as one we love and value. It is to dwell in his courts, as the priests and Levites did, that were at home in God's house; it is to be constant in the exercises of religion. We come into communion with God, not recommended by any merit of our own, but by God's free choice: "Blessed is the man whom thou choosest, and so distinguishest from others who are left to themselves."

(2) They shall be satisfied. Here the psalmist changes the person, not, He shall be satisfied (the man whom thou choosest), but, We shall, which teaches us to apply the promises to ourselves: We shall be satisfied with the goodness of thy house, even of thy holy temple. God keeps a good house. There is abundance of goodness in his house, righteousness, grace, and all the comforts of the everlasting covenant; there is enough for all, enough for each; it is ready, always ready; and all on free cost, without money and without price.

4. For the operations of his power on their behalf (v. 5): By terrible things in righteousness wilt thou answer us, O God of our salvation! This may be understood of the rebukes which God in his providence sometimes gives to his own people; he often answers them by terrible things, for the awakening and quickening of them, but always in righteousness; he neither does them any wrong nor means them any hurt, for even then he is the God of their salvation. See Isa. xlv. 15.

5. For the care he takes of all his people. He is the confidence of all the ends of the earth that is, of all the saints all the world over, and not theirs only that were of the seed of Israel; for he is the God of the Gentiles as well as of the Jews.

His power and sovereignty as the God of nature.

I. He establishes the earth and it abides, cxix. 90. By his own strength he setteth fast the mountains (v. 6). Hence they are called everlasting mountains, Hab. iii. 6. Yet God's covenant with his people is said to stand more firmly than they, Isa. liv. 10.

II. He stills the sea, and it is quiet, v. 7. The sea in a storm makes a great noise, but, when God pleases, he commands silence among the waves and billows, and lays them to sleep, turns the storm into a calm quickly, cvii. 29. And by the sea, as well as by the unchangeableness of the earth, it appears that he whose the sea and the dry land are is girded with power. And by this our Lord Jesus gave a proof of his divine power, that he commanded the winds and waves, and they obeyed him. To this quieting of the sea he adds, as a thing much of the same nature, that he stills the tumult of the people.

III. He renews the morning and evening, v. 8. This regular succession of day and night may be considered, 1. As an instance of God's great power, and so it strikes an awe upon all: Those that dwell in the uttermost parts of the earth are afraid at thy signs or tokens; they are by them convinced that there is a supreme deity, a sovereign monarch, before whom they ought to fear and tremble. 2. As an instance of God's great goodness, and so it brings comfort to all: Thou makest the outgoings of the morning, before the sun rises, and of the evening, before the sun sets, to rejoice. As it is God that scatters the light of the morning and draws the curtains of the evening, so he gives occasion to us to rejoice in both. We are to look upon our daily worship, alone and with our families to be both the most needful of our daily occupations and the most delightful of our daily comforts.

IV. He waters the earth and makes it fruitful. How much the fruitfulness of this lower part of the creation depends upon the influence of the upper is easy to observe; if the heavens be as brass, the earth is as iron, which is a sensible intimation to a stupid world that every good and perfect gift is from above. All God's blessings, even spiritual ones, are expressed by his raining righteousness upon us. The common blessing of rain from heaven and fruitful seasons is here described.

1. How much there is in it of the power and goodness of God. God that made the earth hereby visits it, sends to it, gives proof of his care of it, v. 9. God that made it dry land, hereby waters it, in order to its fruitfulness. Though the productions of the earth flourished before God had caused it to rain, yet even then there was a mist which answered the intention, and watered the whole face of the ground, Gen. ii. 5, 6. Our hearts are dry and barren unless God himself be as the dew to us and water us; and the plants of his own planting he will water and make them to increase. Rain is the river of God, which is full of water. This river of God enriches the earth, which without it would quickly be a poor thing. The riches of the earth are abundantly more useful to man than those which are hidden in its bowels; we might live well enough without silver and gold, but not without corn and grass.

2. How much benefit is derived from it to the earth and to man upon it. (1) To the earth itself. The rain in season gives it a new face. Even the ridges of the earth, off which the rain seems to slide, are watered abundantly, for they drink in the rain which comes often upon them; the furrows of it, which are turned up by the plough, are settled by the rain and made fit to receive the seed (v. 10); they are settled by being made soft. That which makes the soil of the heart tender settles it; for the heart is established with that grace. Thus the spring is an earnest of a blessing upon the whole year, which God is therefore said to crown with his goodness (v. 11). And his paths are said to drop fatness. These communications of God's goodness to this lower world are very extensive (v. 12): They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness, and not merely upon the pastures of the inhabited land. The deserts, which man takes no care of and receives no profit from, are under the care of the divine Providence, and we ought to be thankful not only for that which serves us, but for that which serves any part of the creation. So extensive are the gifts of God's bounty that in them the hills, the little hills, rejoice on every side, even the north side, that lies most from the sun. Hills are not above the need of God's providence; little hills are not below the cognizance of it. (2) To man upon the earth. As for the earth, out of it comes bread (Job xxviii. 5), for out of it comes corn; but every grain of corn that comes out of it God himself prepared; and therefore he provides rain for the earth, that thereby he may prepare corn for man, under whose feet he has put the rest of the creatures and for whose use he has fitted them. The yearly produce of the corn is not only an operation of the same power that raises the dead, but an instance of that power not much unlike it (as appears by that of our Saviour, John xii. 24), and the constant benefit we have from it is an instance of that goodness which endures for ever. Corn and cattle are the two staple commodities, and both are owing to the divine goodness in watering the earth, v. 13. The valleys are so fruitful that they seem to be covered over with corn, in the time of harvest. The lowest parts of the earth are commonly the most fruitful, and one acre of the humble valleys is worth five of the lofty mountains. But both corn-ground and pasture-ground, answering the end of their creation, are said to shout for joy and sing, because they are serviceable to the honour of God and the comfort of man.

PSALM LXVI

This is a thanksgiving psalm. All people are here called upon to praise God, I. For the general instances of his sovereign power in the whole creation, ver. 1–7. II. For the special tokens of his favour to the church, his peculiar people, ver. 8–12. And then, III. The psalmist praises God for his own experiences of his goodness to him in particular, especially in answering his prayers, ver. 13–20.

To the chief musician. A song or psalm.

Verses 1–7

I. In these verses the psalmist calls upon all people to praise God, all lands, all the earth, v. 1. This speaks the glory of God for he is good to all. 2. The duty of man, that all are obliged to praise God; it is part of the law of creation, and therefore is required of every creature. 3. A prediction of the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ; the time should come when all lands should praise God. 4. The psalmist will abound in it himself, and wishes that God might have his tribute paid him by all the nations of the earth and not by the land of Israel only. We must be hearty and zealous, open and public, as those that are not ashamed of our Master. And both these are implied in making a noise, a joyful noise. In praising God we must do it so as to glorify him. Reckon it your greatest glory to praise God, so some.

II. He had called upon all lands to praise God (v. 1), and he foretells (v. 4) that they shall do so: All the earth shall worship thee. They shall sing to God, that is, sing to his name, for it is only to his declarative glory, that by which he has made himself known, not to his essential glory, that we can contribute anything by our praises.

III. We are here called upon to come and see the works of God; for his own works praise him, whether we do or no; and the reason why we do not praise him more and better is because we do not duly and attentively observe them. Let us therefore see God's works (v. 5), and then speak of them, and speak of them to him (v. 3): Say unto God, How terrible art thou in thy works, terrible in thy doings! 1. God's works are wonderful in themselves. God is terrible (that is, admirable) in his works. In all his doings towards the children of men he is terrible, and to be eyed with a holy awe. Much of religion lies in a reverence for the divine Providence. 2. They are formidable to his enemies, and have many a time forced and frightened them into a feigned submission (v. 3): Through the greatness of thy power, before which none can stand, shall thy enemies submit themselves unto thee; they shall lie unto thee (so the word is), that is, they shall be compelled, sorely against their wills, to make their peace with thee upon any terms. 3. They are comfortable and beneficial to his people, v. 6. When Israel came out of Egypt, he turned the sea into dry land before them, which encouraged them to follow God's guidance through the wilderness; and, when they were to enter Canaan, for their encouragement in their wars Jordan was divided before them, and they went through that flood on foot. The joys of our fathers were our joys, and we ought to look upon ourselves as sharers in them. 4. They are commanding to all. God by his works keeps up his dominion in the world (v. 7): He rules by his power for ever; his eyes behold the nations. He has a commanding arm. Strong is his hand, and high is his right hand. Hence he infers, Let not the rebellious exalt themselves; let not those that have revolting and rebellious hearts dare to rise up in any acts of rebellion against God.

Two things we have reason to bless God for:—

I. Common protection (v. 9): He holdeth our soul in life. He puts our soul in life, so the word is. He that gave us our being, by a constant renewed act upholds us in our being, and his providence is a continued creation. It is not existence, but happiness, that deserves the name of life. He suffers not our feet to be moved, preventing many unforeseen evils.

II. Special deliverance from great distress.

1. How grievous the distress and danger were, v. 11, 12. What particular trouble of the church this refers to does not appear; it might be the trouble of some private persons or families only. But, whatever it was, they were pressed down with it, and kept under as with a load upon their loins, v. 11. Is anything more dangerous than fire and water? We went through both, that is, afflictions of different kinds. When men rose up against us, that was fire and water. That was the case here: "Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads, to trample upon us and insult over us, to hector and abuse us, nay, and to make perfect slaves of us; they have said to our souls, Bow down, that we may go over," Isa. li. 23.

2. How gracious God's design was in bringing them into this distress and danger. See what the meaning of it is (v. 10): Thou, O God! hast proved us, and tried us. By afflictions we are proved as silver in the fire. Our graces, by being exercised, may be made more strong and active, and so we may be improved, as silver when it is refined by the fire and made more clear from its dross; and this will be to our unspeakable advantage, for thus we are made partakers of God's holiness, Heb. xii. 10.

3. How glorious the issue was at last. The troubles of the church will certainly end well. They are in fire and water, but they get through them: "We went through fire and water, and did not perish in the flames or floods." Whatever the troubles of the saints are, blessed be God, there is a way through them. Thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place into a well-watered place (so the word is), like the gardens of the Lord, and therefore fruitful.

The psalmist, having before stirred up all people to bless the Lord, here stirs up himself.

I. In his devotions to his God, v. 13-15. 1. By costly sacrifices (v. 13): I will go into thy house with burnt-offerings. His sacrifices should be public, in the place which God had chosen: "I will go into thy house with them." Christ is our temple, to whom we must bring our spiritual gifts, and by whom they are sanctified. They should be the best of the kind—burnt-sacrifices, which were wholly consumed upon the altar. He will offer bullocks with goats with the incense of rams. Or rams with incense. The incense typifies Christ's intercession, without which the fattest of our sacrifices will not be accepted. 2. By a conscientious performance of his vows. This was the psalmist's resolution (v. 13, 14), I will pay thee my vows, which my lips have uttered when I was in trouble.

II. In his declarations to his friends, v. 16. He calls together a congregation of good people to hear his thankful narrative of God's favours to him: "Come and hear, all you that fear God." God's people should communicate their experiences to each other. We should take all occasions to tell one another of the great things which God has done for our souls, the spiritual blessings with which he has blessed us. Now what was it that God had done for his soul? (1) He had wrought in him a love to the duty of prayer, and had by his grace enlarged his heart in that duty (v. 17): I cried unto him with my mouth. God has given us leave to pray, a command to pray, encouragements to pray, and (to crown all) a heart to pray. By crying to him we do indeed extol him. He is pleased to reckon himself honoured by the humble believing prayers of the upright. In seeking our own welfare, we seek his glory. His exaltation was under my tongue (so it may be read); that is, I was considering in my mind how I might exalt and magnify his name. When prayers are in our mouths praises must be in our hearts. (2) He had wrought in him a dread of sin as an enemy to prayer (v. 18): If I regard iniquity in my heart, I know very well the Lord will not hear me. The sense of this place is plain: If I regard iniquity in my heart, that is, "If I have favourable thoughts of it, if I love it, indulge it, and allow myself in it, God will not hear my prayer, nor can I expect an answer of peace to it." (3) He had graciously granted him an answer of peace to his prayers (v. 19). This God did for his soul, by answering his prayer, he gave him a token of his favour. And therefore he concludes (v. 20), Blessed he God. What we win by prayer we must wear with praise. Lest it should be thought that the deliverance was granted for the sake of some worthiness in his prayer, he ascribes it to God's mercy. "It was not my prayer that fetched the deliverance, but his mercy that sent it."

PSALM LXVII

Here is, I. A prayer for the prosperity of the church of Israel, ver. 1. II. A prayer for the conversion of the Gentiles and the bringing of them into the church, ver. 2–5. III. A prospect of happy and glorious times when God shall do this, ver. 6, 7.

To the chief musician on Negonoth. A psalm or song.

Verses 1–7

The psalmist was elevated to receive the spirit of prophecy concerning the enlargement of God's kingdom.

I. He begins with a prayer for the welfare and prosperity of the church then in being, v. 1. Our Saviour, in teaching us to say, Our Father, has intimated that we ought to pray with and for others; so the psalmist here prays not, God be merciful to me, and bless me, but to us, and bless us. We are here taught, 1. That all our happiness comes from God's mercy and takes rise in that; and therefore the first thing prayed for is, God be merciful to us, to us sinners. 2. God bless us; that is, give us an interest in his promises, and confer upon us all the good contained in them. God bless us is a comprehensive prayer. 3. God cause his face to shine upon us; that is, God by his grace qualify us for his favour and then give us the tokens of his favour. To shine with us (so the margin reads it); with us doing our endeavour, and let it crown that endeavour with success.

II. He passes from this to a prayer for the conversion of the Gentiles (v. 2): That thy way may be known upon earth. Thus public-spirited must we be in our prayers. Father in heaven, hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come.

1. These verses, which point at the conversion of the Gentiles, may be taken, (1) As a prayer; and so it speaks the desire of the Old Testament saints. They desired nothing more than the throwing down of the enclosure and the laying open of the advantages. See then how the spirit of the Jews, in the days of Christ and his apostles, differed from the spirit of their fathers. The Israelites indeed that were of old desired that God's name might be known among the Gentiles; those counterfeit Jews were enraged at the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles. (2) As a prophecy that it shall be as he here prays.

2. Three things are here prayed for, with reference to the Gentiles:—

(1) That divine revelation might be sent among them, v. 2. "Let them all know, as well as we do, what is good and what the Lord our God requires of them; let them be blessed and honoured with the same righteous statutes and judgments which are so much the praise of our nation and the envy of all its neighbours," Deut. iv. 8. If God make known his way to us, and we walk in it, he will show us his saving health, l. 23. Those that have themselves experimentally known the pleasantness of God's ways, and the comforts of his salvation, cannot but desire and pray that they may be known to others, even among all nations.

(2) That divine worship may be set up among them, as it will be where divine revelation is received and embraced (v. 3): "Let the people praise thee, O God! let them have matter for praise, let them have hearts for praise; yea, let not only some, but all the people, praise thee." It is a prayer, [1] That the gospel might be preached to them, and then they would have cause enough to praise God, as for the day-spring after a long and dark night. [2] That they might be converted and brought into the church, and then they would have a disposition to praise God. [3] That they might be incorporated into solemn assemblies, that they might all together praise him with one mind and one mouth.

(3) That the divine government may be acknowledged (v. 4): O let the nations be glad, and sing for joy! The joy he wishes to the nations is holy joy; for it is joy that God has taken to himself his great power and has reigned. Let them be glad that thou shalt judge the people righteously. Let us all be glad that we are not to be one another's judges, but that he that judges us is the Lord, whose judgment we are sure is according to truth.

III. He concludes with a joyful prospect of all good when God shall do this, when the nations shall be converted and brought to praise God.

1. The lower world shall smile upon them, and they shall have the fruits of that (v. 6): Then shall the earth yield her increase. Not but that God gave rain from heaven and fruitful seasons to the nations when they sat in darkness (Acts xiv. 17); but when they were converted the earth yielded its increase to God; and then it was fruitful to some good purpose. Then it yielded its increase more than before to the comfort of men, who through Christ acquired a covenant-title to the fruits of it and had a sanctified use of it.

2. The upper world shall smile upon them, and they shall have the favours of that, which is much better: God, even our own God, shall bless us, v. 6. And again (v. 7), God shall bless us. We receive the increase of the earth as a mercy indeed when with it God, even our own God, gives us his blessing.

3. All the world shall hereby be brought to do like them: The ends of the earth shall fear him, that is, worship him, which is to be done with a godly fear.

PSALM LXVIII

It does not appear upon what occasion, David penned this psalm; but probably it was when he brought the ark from the house of Obed-edom to the tent he had pitched for it in Zion; for the first words are the prayer which Moses used at the removing of the ark, Num. x. 35. I. He begins with prayer, both against God's enemies (ver. 1, 2) and for his people, ver. 3. II. He proceeds to praise, which takes up the rest of the psalm. 1. The greatness and goodness of God, ver. 4–6. 2. The wonderful works God had wrought for his people formerly, bringing them through the wilderness (ver. 7, 8), settling them in Canaan (ver. 9, 10), giving them victory over their enemies (ver. 11, 12), and delivering them out of the hands of their oppressors, ver. 13, 14. 3. The special presence of God in his church, ver. 15–17. 4. The ascension of Christ (ver. 18) and the salvation of his people by him, ver. 19, 20. 5. The victories which Christ would obtain over his enemies, and the favours he would bestow upon his church, ver. 21–28. 6. The enlargement of the church by the accession of the Gentiles to it ver. 29–31. And so he concludes the psalm with an awful acknowledgment of the glory and grace of God, ver. 32–35.

To the chief musician. A psalm or song of David.

I. David prays that God would appear in his glory,

1. For the confusion of his enemies (v. 1, 2): "Let God arise, as a judge to pass sentence upon them, as a general to take the field and do execution upon them; and let them be scattered. Let God arise, as the sun when he goes forth in his strength; and the children of darkness shall be scattered, as the shadows of the evening flee before the rising sun." Thus does David comment upon Moses's prayer, and not only repeats it with application to himself and his own times, but enlarges upon it, to direct us how to make use of scripture-prayers. Though we are to pray for our enemies as such, yet we are to pray against God's enemies as such, against their enmity to him and all their attempts upon his kingdom.

2. For the comfort and joy of his own people (v. 3): "Let the righteous be glad, that are now in sorrow; let them rejoice before God, let them rejoice with gladness."

II. He praises God for his glorious appearances,

1. As a great God, infinitely great (v. 4): He rides upon the heavens, by his name JAH. He is the spring of all the motions of the heavenly bodies, as he that rides in the chariot sets it a-going, has a supreme command of the influences of heaven. He rules these by his name, Jah, or Jehovah, a self-existent self-sufficient being, the fountain of all being, power, motion, and perfection; this is his name for ever.

2. As a gracious God, a God of mercy and tender compassion. He is great, but being a God of great power, he uses his power for the relief of those that are distressed, v. 5, 6. The fatherless, the widows, the solitary, find him a God all-sufficient to them. He that rides on the heavens glories that he is a Father of the fatherless. Though God be high, yet has he respect unto the lowly. He is a Father of the fatherless, to pity them, to bless them, to teach them, to provide for them, to portion them. They have liberty to call him Father, and to plead their relation to him as their guardian, cxlvi. 9; x. 14, 18. He is a patron of the widows, to give them counsel and to redress their grievances, to own them and plead their cause, Prov. xxii. 23. He has an ear open to all their complaints and a hand open to all their wants. He is so in his holy habitation; let them go to his holy habitation, to his word and ordinances; there they may find him and find comfort in him. When families are to be built up he is the founder of them: God sets the solitary in families, brings those into comfortable relations that were lonely, he makes those dwell at home that were forced to seek for relief abroad (so Dr. Hammond), putting those that were destitute into a way of getting their livelihood.

3. As a righteous God, (1) In relieving the oppressed. He brings out those that are bound with chains, and sets those at liberty who were unjustly imprisoned and brought into servitude. No chains can detain those whom God will make free. (2) In reckoning with the oppressors: The rebellious dwell in a dry land and have no comfort in that which they have got by fraud and injury.

Fresh mercies should put us in mind of former mercies and revive our grateful sense of them. Let it never be forgotten.

I. That God himself was the guide of Israel through the wilderness, v. 7. It was not a journey, but a march, for they went as soldiers, as an army with banners.

II. That he manifested his glorious presence with them at Mount Sinai, v. 8. Never did any people see the glory of God, nor hear his voice, as Israel did, Deut. iv. 32, 33. Never had any people such an excellent law given them, so expounded, so enforced. Sinai itself, that vast mountain, that long ridge of mountains, was moved at the presence of God; see Judges v. 4, 5; Deut. xxxiii. 2; Hab. iii. 3. It would encourage their faith in him and dependence upon him. Whatever mountains of difficulty lay in the way of their happy settlement, he that could move Sinai itself could remove them.

III. That he provided very comfortably for them both in the wilderness and in Canaan (v. 9, 10): Thou didst send a plentiful rain and hast prepared of thy goodness for the poor. This may refer, 1. To the victualling of their camp with manna in the wilderness, which was rained upon them, as were also the quails (lxxviii. 24, 27). Or, 2. To the seasonable supplies granted them in Canaan, that land flowing with milk and honey, which is said to drink water of the rain of heaven, Deut. xi. 11. This looks further to the spiritual provision made for God's Israel; the Spirit of grace and the gospel of grace are the plentiful rain with which God confirms his inheritance, and from which their fruit is found, Isa. xlv. 8.

IV. That he often gave them victory over their enemies. The Lord gave the word, as general of their armies. He raised up judges for them, gave them their commissions and instructions, and assured them of success. God gave them his word (the word of the Lord came unto them) and then great was the company of the preachers—prophets and prophetesses, for the word is feminine. Kings of armies did flee, retired without striking a stroke; they fled apace, fled and never rallied again. She that tarried at home divided the spoil. Not only the men, the soldiers that abode by the stuff, who were to share the prey (1 Sam. xxx. 24), but even the women that tarried at home had a share, which intimates the abundance of spoil that should be taken. When the Almighty scattered kings for her (for the church) she was white as snow in Salmon, purified and refined by the mercies of God; when the host went forth against the enemy they kept themselves from every wicked thing, and so the host returned victorious, and Israel by the victory were confirmed in their purity and piety. By the resurrection of Christ our spiritual enemies were made to flee, they were for ever disabled to hurt any of God's people.

V. That from a low and despised condition they had been advanced to splendour and prosperity. When they were bond-slaves in Egypt, and afterwards when they were oppressed sometimes by one potent neighbour and sometimes by another, they did, as it were, lie among the pots or rubbish, as despised broken vessels. But God, at length, delivered them from the pots (lxxxi. 6), and in David's time they were in a fair way to be one of the most prosperous kingdoms in the world, like the wings of a dove covered with silver, v. 13. "And so," says Dr. Hammond, "under Christ's kingdom, the heathen idolaters worshipping wood and stone, and given up to the vilest lusts, should from that detestable condition be advanced to the service of Christ, and the practice of all Christian virtues, the greatest inward beauties in the world."

David here comes to give him praise as Zion's God in a special manner; compare ix. 11. Sing praises to the Lord who dwelleth in Zion, for which reason Zion is called the hill of God.

I. He compares it with the hill of Bashan and other high and fruitful hills, and prefers it before them, v. 15, 16. It is true, Zion was but little and low in comparison with them, yet it has the pre-eminence above them all, that it is the hill of God. "Why do you insult over poor Zion, and boast of your own height? This is the hill which God has chosen." Zion was especially honourable because it was a type of the gospel church, which is therefore called Mount Zion (Heb. xii. 22), and this is intimated here, when he said, The Lord will dwell in it for ever.

II. He compares it with Mount Sinai, of which he had spoken (v. 8), and shows that it has the Shechinah or divine presence in it as really, though not as sensibly, as Sinai itself had, v. 17. Angels are the chariots of God. They are vastly numerous: Twenty thousands, even thousands multiplied. There is an innumerable company of angels in the heavenly Jerusalem, Heb. xii. 22. Some read the last words of the verse, Sinai is in the sanctuary; that is, the sanctuary was to Israel instead of Mount Sinai, whence they received divine oracles.

III. The glory of Mount Zion was the King whom God set on that holy hill (ii. 6). Of his ascension the psalmist here speaks, and to it his language is expressly applied (Eph. iv. 8): Thou hast ascended on high (v. 18); compare xlvii. 5, 6. Christ's ascending on high is spoken of to his honour. He then triumphed over the gates of hell. He led captivity captive; that is, he led his captives in triumph, as great conquerors used to do, Col. ii. 15. He led those captive who had led us captive, and who, if he had not interposed, would have held us captive for ever. Nay, he led captivity itself captive, having quite broken the power of sin and Satan. This intimates the complete victory which Jesus Christ obtained over our spiritual enemies; it was such that through him we also are more than conquerors, that is, triumphers, Rom. viii. 37. He then opened the gates of heaven to all believers: Thou hast received gifts for men. He gave gifts to men, so the apostle reads it, Eph. iv. 8. And he gave what he had received; having received power to give eternal life, he bestows it upon as many as were given him, John xvii. 2. Thou hast received gifts in man (so the margin), that is, in the human nature which Christ was pleased to clothe himself with, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God. To magnify the kindness and love of Christ to us in receiving these gifts for us, he received them for the rebellious also, for those that had been rebellious. Perhaps it is especially meant of the Gentiles, that had been enemies in their minds by wicked works, Col. i. 21. This magnifies the grace of Christ exceedingly that through him rebels are, upon their submission, not only pardoned, but preferred. Christ came to a rebellious world, not to condemn it, but that through him it might be saved. He received gifts for the rebellious, that the Lord God might dwell among them, that he might set up a church in a rebellious world.

IV. The glory of Zion's King is that he is a Saviour and benefactor to all his willing people and a consuming fire to all those that persist in rebellion against him, v. 19–21. We have here good and evil, life and death, the blessing and the curse, set before us (Mark xvi. 16). So many, so weighty, are the gifts of God's bounty to us that he may be truly said to load us with them; he pours out blessings till there is no room to receive them, Mal. iii. 10. He is our God, and therefore he will be the God of eternal salvation to us; for that only will answer the vast extent of his covenant-relation to us as our God. Those that persist in their enmity to him will certainly be ruined (v. 21): God shall wound the head of his enemies,—of Satan the old serpent (of whom it was by the first promise foretold that the seed of the woman should break his head, Gen. iii. 15). He will wound the hairy scalp of such a one as goeth on still in his trespasses. In calling the head the hairy scalp perhaps there is an allusion to Absalom, whose bushy hair was his halter. Or it denotes the most fierce and barbarous of his enemies, who let their hair grow, to make themselves look the more frightful.

In these verses we have three things:—

I. The gracious promise which God makes of the redemption of his people, and their victory over his and their enemies (v. 22, 23): The Lord said, "I will do great things for my people, as the God of their salvation," v. 20. "I will again bring them from the depths of the sea," as he did Israel when he brought them out of the slavery of Egypt into the ease and liberty of the wilderness; "and I will again bring them from Bashan," as he did Israel when he brought them from their wants and wanderings in the wilderness into the fulness and settlement of the land of Canaan; for the land of Bashan was on the other side Jordan, where they had wars with Sihon and Og, and whence their next removal was into Canaan. But this is not all. He will make them victorious over their enemies (v. 23): That thy feet may be dipped, as thou passest along, in the blood of thy enemies, and the tongue of thy dogs may lap in the same. Dogs licked the blood of Ahab; and, in the destruction of the anti-christian generation, we read of blood up to the horses' bridles, Rev. xiv. 20.

II. The welcome which God's own people shall give to these glorious discoveries of his grace. "They have seen, thy people have seen, thy goings, O God! While others regard not the work of the Lord, they have seen the goings of my God, my King, in the sanctuary." An active faith appropriates God; he is God and King; but that is not all, he is my God and my King. God's most remarkable outgoings are, even in the sanctuary, in and by his word and ordinances, and among his people in the gospel church especially. When we see his goings in his sanctuary, those that are immediately employed in the service of the temple praise him, v. 25. It was expected that the Levites should lead in his praises. And, it being a day of extraordinary triumph, among them were damsels playing with timbrels. "Thus (says Dr. Hammond) when Christ has gone up to heaven the apostles shall celebrate and publish it to all the world, and even the women that were witnesses of it shall affectionately join with them in divulging it." Let all the people of Israel in their solemn religious assembly give glory to God: Bless God, not only in temples, but in the synagogues, or schools of the prophets, or wherever there is a congregation of those that come forth from the fountain of Israel. Public mercies, which we jointly share in, call for public thanksgivings, which all should join in. Let those among them who are the most eminent go before the rest in praising God, v. 27. There was little Benjamin (that was the royal tribe in Saul's time) with their rulers, the princes of Judah (that was the royal tribe in David's time), and their council, their captains or leaders. We depend upon him, for the perfecting of what he has begun, v. 28. In the former part of the verse the psalmist speaks to Israel: "Thy God has commanded thy strength; that is, whatever is done for thee, or whatever strength thou hast to help thyself, it comes from God, his power and grace, and the word which he has commanded." In the latter part he speaks to God, encouraged by his experiences: "Strengthen, O God! that which thou hast wrought for us. Lord, confirm what thou hast commanded, perform what thou hast promised, and bring to a happy end that good work which thou hast so gloriously begun."

III. The powerful invitation and inducement which would hereby be given to those that are without to come in and join themselves to the church, v. 29–31. This was in part fulfilled by the accession of many proselytes to the Jewish religion in the days of David and Solomon; but it was to have its full accomplishment in the conversion of the Gentile nations to the faith of Christ, Eph. iii. 6. Some shall submit for fear (v. 30): "The company of spearmen, that stand it out against Christ and his gospel, that are furious and outrageous as a multitude of bulls, fat and wanton as the calves of the people" (which is a description of those Jews and Gentiles that opposed the gospel of Christ and did what they could to prevent the setting up of his kingdom in the world), "Lord, rebuke them, abate their pride and confound their devices, till, conquered by the convictions of their consciences, they be every one of them brought, to submit themselves with pieces of silver, as being glad to make their peace with the church upon any terms." Many, by being rebuked, have been happily saved from being ruined. But as for those that will not submit, he prays for their dispersion, which amounts to a prophecy of it: Scatter thou the people that delight in war. This may refer to the unbelieving Jews, who delighted in making war upon the holy seed, and would not submit themselves, and were therefore scattered over the face of the earth. David had himself been a man of war, but could appeal to God that he never delighted in war and bloodshed for its own sake. Others shall submit willingly (v. 29, 31): Because of thy temple at Jerusalem (this David speaks of in faith, for the temple of Jerusalem was not built in his time, only the materials and model were prepared) kings shall bring presents unto thee. He mentions Egypt and Ethiopia, two countries out of which subjects and suppliants were least to be expected (v. 31): Princes shall come out of Egypt as ambassadors to seek God's favour and submit to him; and they shall be accepted, for the Lord of hosts shall thereupon bless them, saving, Blessed be Egypt my people, Isa. xix. 25. Even Ethiopia, that had stretched out her hands against God's Israel (2 Chron. xiv. 9), should now stretch out her hands unto God, in prayer, in presents, and to take hold on him, and that soon.

Verses 32–35

The psalmist, having prayed for the Gentiles, here invites them to come in and join with the devout Israelites in praising God, intimating that their accession to the church would be the matter of their joy and praise (v. 32): Let the kingdoms of the earth sing praises to the Lord.

I. Because of his supreme and sovereign dominion: He rides upon the heavens of heavens which were of old (v. 33); compare v. 4. He has from the beginning, nay, from before all time, prepared his throne; he sits on the circuit of heaven, and dispenses the influences of his power and goodness to this lower world.

II. Because of his awful and terrible majesty: He sends out his voice, and that a mighty voice. This may refer either generally to the thunder, which is called the voice of the Lord and is said to be powerful and full of majesty (xxix. 3, 4), or in particular to that thunder in which God spoke to Israel at Mount Sinai.

III. Because of his mighty power: Ascribe you strength unto God (v. 34). Thine is the kingdom and power, and therefore thine is the glory. We must acknowledge his power. In the kingdom of grace: His excellency is over Israel; he shows his sovereign care in protecting and governing his church. In the kingdom of providence: His strength is in the clouds, whence comes the thunder of his power, the small rain, and the great rain of his strength.

IV. Because of the glory of his sanctuary and the wonders wrought there (v. 35): O God! thou art terrible out of thy holy places. God is to be admired and adored with reverence and godly fear by all those that attend him in his holy places, that receive his oracles. Nor is any attribute of God more dreadful to sinners than his holiness.

V. Because of the grace bestowed upon his people: The God of Israel is he that gives strength and power unto his people, which the gods of the nations, that were vanity and a lie, could not give to their worshippers; how should they help them, when they could not help themselves? If it be the God of Israel that gives strength and power unto his people, they ought to say, Blessed be God. If all be from him, let all be to him.

PSALM LXIX

David penned this psalm when he was in affliction. I. He complains of the great distress and trouble he was in and earnestly begs of God to relieve and succour him, ver. 1–21. II. He imprecates the judgments of God upon his persecutors, ver. 22–29. III. He concludes with the voice of joy and praise, in an assurance that God would help and succour him, and would do well for the church, ver. 30–36. Now divers passages in this psalm are applied to Christ in the New Testament and are said to have their accomplishment in him (ver. 4, 9, 21), and ver. 22 refers to the enemies of Christ. So that (like the twenty-second psalm) it begins with the humiliation and ends with the exaltation of Christ.

To the chief musician upon Shoshannim. A psalm of David.

Verses 1–12

In these verses David complains of his troubles.

I. His complaints are very sad, and he pours them out before the Lord, as one that hoped thus to ease himself of a burden that lay very heavy upon him.

1. He complains of the deep impressions that his troubles made upon his spirit (v. 1, 2): "The waters of affliction, those bitter waters, have come unto my soul, not only threaten my life, but disquiet my mind, so that I cannot enjoy God and myself as I used to do." The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity; but what shall we do when the spirit is wounded? That was David's case here. This points at Christ's sufferings in his soul, and the inward agony he was in when he said, Now is my soul troubled; and, My soul is exceedingly sorrowful; for it was his soul that he made an offering for sin.

2. He complains of the long continuance of his troubles (v. 3): I am weary of my crying. He cried to his God, and the more death was in his view the more life was in his prayers; yet he had not immediately an answer of peace given. My eyes fail while I wait for my God. Yet his pleading this with God is an indication that he is resolved not to give up believing and praying. His throat is dried, but his heart is not; his eyes fail, but his faith does not. Thus our Lord Jesus, on the cross, cried out, Why hast thou forsaken me? yet, at the same time, he kept hold of his relation to him: My God, my God.

3. He complains of the malice and multitude of his enemies, their injustice and cruelty, and the hardships they put upon him, v. 4. "They hate me without a cause; I never did them the least injury, that they should bear me such ill-will." Our Saviour applies this to himself (John xv. 25): They hated me without a cause. These enemies were not to be despised, but were very formidable both for their number —They are more than the hairs of my head—and for their strength—They are mighty in authority and power. Then I restored that which I took not away. Applying this to David, it was what his enemies compelled him to, and it was what he consented to, that, if possible, he might pacify them and make them to be at peace with him. But, applying it to Christ, it is an observable description of the satisfaction which he made to God for our sin by his blood: Then he restored that which he took not away; he underwent the punishment that was due to us, paid our debt, suffered for our offence. God's glory, in some instances of it, was taken away by the sin of man; man's honour, and peace, and happiness, were taken away; it was not he that took them away, and yet by the merit of his death he restored them.

4. He complains of the unkindness of his friends and relations (v. 8): "I have become a stranger to my brethren; they make themselves strange to me and are shy of conversing with me and ashamed to own me." This was fulfilled in Christ, whose brethren did not believe on him (John vii. 5), who came to his own and his own received him not (John i. 11), and who was forsaken by his disciples.

5. He complains of the contempt that was put upon him and the reproach with which he was continually loaded. And in this especially his complaint points at Christ, who for our sakes submitted to the greatest disgrace and made himself of no reputation. David here takes notice of aggravations of the indignities done him. They ridiculed him for that by which he both humbled himself and honoured

God. When David, purely in devotion to God and to testify his respect to him, wept, and chastened his soul with fasting, and made sackcloth his garment, as humble penitents used to do, instead of commending his devotion, they did all they could to prevent others from following his good example; for that was to his reproach. They laughed at him as a fool for mortifying himself thus; and even for this he became a proverb to them. Even the gravest and the most honourable, from whom better was expected: Those that sit in the gate speak against me. He was the song of the drunkards; they made themselves and their companions merry with him. See what is commonly the lot of the best of men: those that are the praise of the wise are the song of fools. But it is easy to those that rightly judge of things to despise being thus despised.

II. His confessions of sin are very serious (v. 5): "O God! thou knowest my foolishness, both what is and what is not; and therefore thou knowest how innocent I am of those crimes which they charge upon me." This is the genuine confession of a penitent, who knows that he cannot prosper in covering his sin, and that therefore it is his wisdom to acknowledge it, because it is naked and open before God. He knows the corruption of our nature: Thou knowest the foolishness that is bound up in my heart. He knows the transgressions of our lives, even those that are committed most secretly. They are all done in his sight, and are never cast behind his back till they are repented of and pardoned.

III. His supplications are very earnest. "Save me, O God! save me from sinking, from despairing." Let not those that wait on thee, O Lord God of hosts! and that seek thee, O God of Israel! be ashamed and confounded for my sake. This intimates his fear that if God did not appear for him it would be a discouragement to all other good people and would give their enemies occasion to triumph over them. If Jesus Christ had not been owned and accepted of his Father in his sufferings, all that seek God, and wait for him, would have been ashamed and confounded; but they have confidence towards God, and in his name come boldly to the throne of grace.

IV. His plea is very powerful, v. 7, 9. "Lord, roll away the reproach, and plead my cause. For thy sake I have borne reproach." Those that are evil spoken of for well-doing may with a humble confidence leave it to God to bring forth their righteousness as the light. The zeal of thy house has eaten me up. Those that hate thee and thy house for that reason hate me, because they know how zealously affected I am to it. It is this that has eaten up all the love and respect I had among them. Or it may be construed as an instance of David's zeal for God's house, that he resented all the indignities done to God's name as if they had been done to his own name. He laid to heart all the contempt cast upon religion. Both the parts of this verse are applied to Christ. 1. It was an instance of his love to his Father that the zeal of his house did even eat him up when he whipped the buyers and sellers out of the temple, which reminded his disciples of this text, John ii. 17. 2. It was an instance of his self-denial, and that he pleased not himself, that the reproaches of those that reproached God fell upon him (Rom. xv. 3), and therein he set us an example.

They spoke ill of him for his fasting and praying, and for that he was made the song of the drunkards; but, notwithstanding that, he resolves to continue praying. Though we may be jeered for well-doing, we must never be jeered out of it. As for me, my prayer is unto thee, O Lord!

I. What his requests are. Hear me (v. 13), and again, Hear me, O Lord! (v. 16), Hear me speedily (v. 17), not only hear what I say, but grant what I ask. Deliver me out of the mire; let me not stick in it, so some, but help me out, and set my feet on a rock, xl. 2. "Let me be delivered from those that hate me, as a lamb from the paw of a lion, v. 14. Though I have come into deep waters (v. 2), let not the waterflood overflow me, v. 15. Let me not fall into the gulf of despair; let not that deep swallow me up; let not that pit shut her mouth upon me, for then I am undone." He prayed that God would turn to him (v. 16), that he would smile upon him, and not hide his face from him, v. 17.

II. What his pleas are to enforce these petitions. 1. He pleads God's mercy and truth (v. 13): In the multitude of thy mercy hear me. He repeats his argument taken from the mercy of God: "Hear me, for thy lovingkindness is good. It is so in itself; it is rich and plentiful and abundant. Turn to me, according to the multitude of thy tender mercies," v. 16. 2. He pleads his own distress and affliction: "Hide not thy face from me, for I am in trouble (v. 17), and therefore need thy favour; therefore it will come seasonably, and therefore I shall know how to value it." Thou hast known my reproach, my shame, and my dishonour. The psalmist speaks the language of an ingenuous nature when he says (v. 20): Reproach has broken my heart; I am full of heaviness; for it bears hard upon one that knows the worth of a good name to be put under a bad character; but when we consider what an honour it is to be dishonoured for God, and to be counted worthy to suffer shame for his name (as they deemed it, Acts v. 41), we shall see there is no reason at all why it should be any heart-breaking to us. 3. He pleads the insolence and cruelty of his enemies (v. 18): "My adversaries are all before thee (v. 19); thou knowest what danger I am in from them, what enemies they are to thee, in what they do and design against me." One instance of their barbarity is given (v. 21): They gave me gall for my meat (the word signifies a bitter herb, and is often joined with wormwood) and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink. 4. He pleads the unkindness of his friends and his disappointment in them (v. 20): I looked for some to take pity, but there was none; they all failed him like the brooks in summer. This was fulfilled in Christ, for in his sufferings all his disciples forsook him and fled.

These imprecations are not David's prayers against his enemies, but prophecies of the destruction of Christ's persecutors, especially the Jewish nation, which our Lord himself foretold with tears, and which was accomplished about forty years after the death of Christ. The first two verses of this paragraph are expressly applied to the judgments of God upon the unbelieving Jews by the apostle (Rom. xi. 9, 10), and therefore the whole must look that way.

I. The judgments which should come upon the crucifiers of Christ; not upon all of them, for there were those who had a hand in his death and yet repented and found mercy (Acts ii. 23; iii. 14, 15), but upon those of them and their successors who justified it by an obstinate infidelity and rejection of his gospel, and by an inveterate enmity to his disciples and followers. See 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16. It is here foretold,

1. That their sacrifices and offerings should be a mischief and prejudice to them (v. 22): Let their table become a snare. This may be understood of the altar of the Lord, which is called his table and theirs because in feasting upon the sacrifices they were partakers of the altar. Or it may be understood of their common creature-comforts, even their necessary food; they had given Christ gall and vinegar, and therefore justly shall their meat and drink be made gall and vinegar to them.

2. That they should never have the comfort either of that knowledge or of that peace which believers are blessed with in the gospel of Christ (v. 23). Let their eyes be darkened, that they see not the glory of God in the face of Christ. Their sin was that they would not see, but shut their eyes against the light. "Let them be driven to despair, and filled with constant confusion." This was fulfilled in the desperate counsels of the Jews when the Romans came upon them.

3. That they should fall and lie under God's anger and fiery indignation (v. 24): Pour out thy indignation upon them.

4. That their place and nation should be utterly taken away, the very thing they were afraid of, and to prevent which, as they pretended, they persecuted Christ (John xi. 48): Let their habitation be desolate (v. 25), which was fulfilled when their country was laid waste by the Romans, and Zion, for their sakes, was ploughed as a field, Mic. iii. 12. The temple was the house which they were in a particular manner proud of, but this was left unto them desolate, Matt. xxiii. 38. Let none dwell in their tents, which was remarkably fulfilled in Judah and Jerusalem, for after the destruction of the Jews it was long ere the country was inhabited to any purpose.

5. That their way to ruin should be downhill, and nothing should stop them (v. 27): "Lord, leave them to themselves, to add iniquity to iniquity." Let them not come into thy righteousness. Not that God shuts out any from that righteousness, for the gospel excludes none that do not by their unbelief exclude themselves.

6. That they should be cut off from all hopes of happiness (v. 28): Let them be blotted out of the book of the living; let them not be suffered to live any longer, since, the longer they live, the more mischief they do. Multitudes of the unbelieving Jews fell by sword and famine. The nation, as a nation, was blotted out, and became not a people.

II. What the sin is for which these dreadful judgments should be brought upon them (v. 26): They persecute him whom thou hast smitten, and talk to the grief of thy wounded. Christ was he whom God had smitten, for it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and he was esteemed stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted, and therefore men hid their faces from him, Isa. liii. 3, 4, 10. They persecuted him with a rage reaching up to heaven; they cried, Crucify him, crucify him.

III. What the psalmist thinks of himself in the midst of all (v. 29): "But I am poor and sorrowful; that is the worst of my case, under outward afflictions, yet written among the righteous, and not under God's indignation as they are."

The psalmist here, both as a type of Christ and as an example to Christians, concludes a psalm with holy joy and praise which he began with complaints and remonstrances of his griefs.

I. He resolves to praise God himself (v. 30, 31): "I will praise the name of God, not only with my heart, but with my song, and magnify him with thanksgiving." And this shall please the Lord, through Christ the Mediator of our praises as well as of our prayers, better than the most valuable of the legal sacrifices (v. 31), an ox or bullock. This is a plain intimation that in the days of the Messiah an end should be put, not only to the sacrifices of atonement, but to those of praise and acknowledgment which were instituted by the ceremonial law; and, instead of them, spiritual sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving are accepted. It is a great comfort to us that humble and thankful praises are more pleasing to God than the most costly pompous sacrifices are or ever were.

II. He encourages other good people to rejoice in God and continue seeking him (v. 32, 33): The humble shall see this and be glad. They shall see 1. How ready God is to hear the poor when they cry to him, and to give them that which they call upon him for. 2. The exaltation of the Saviour, for of him the psalmist had been speaking, and of himself as a type of him.

III. He calls upon all the creatures to praise God, the heaven, and earth, and sea, and the inhabitants of each, v. 34. The praises of the world must be offered for God's favours to his church, v. 35, 36. for God will save Zion, the holy mountain, where his service was kept up. The cities of Judah shall be built, particular churches shall be formed and incorporated according to the gospel model, that there may be a remnant to dwell there and to have it in possession. Those that love his name, that have a kindness for religion in general, shall embrace the Christian religion, and take their place in the Christian church; they shall dwell therein, as citizens, and of the household of God. David shall never want a man to stand before him. The Redeemer shall see his seed, and prolong his days in them, till the mystery of God shall be finished and the mystical body completed.

PSALM LXX

This psalm is adapted to a state of affliction; it is copied almost word for word from the fortieth, and, some think for that reason, is entitled, "a psalm to bring to remembrance". David here prays that God would send, I. Help to himself, ver. 1, 5. II. Shame to his enemies, ver. 2, 3. III. Joy to his friends, ver. 4. These five verses were the last five verses of Ps. xl.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David, to bring to remembrance.

Verses 1–5

The title tells us that this psalm was designed to bring to remembrance; that is, to put God in remembrance of his mercy and promises. We may in prayer use the words we have often used before: our Saviour in his agony prayed thrice, saying the same words; so David here uses the words he had used before.

I. David here prays that God would make haste to relieve and succour him (v. 1, 5): I am poor and needy, in want and distress, and much at a loss within myself. "Make haste unto me, for the longing desire of my soul is towards thee; I shall perish if I be not speedily helped. I have no other to expect relief from: Thou art my help and my deliverer. Thou hast engaged to be so to all that seek thee; I depend upon thee to be so to me; I have often found thee so; and thou art sufficient, all-sufficient, to be so; therefore make haste to me."

II. He prays that God would fill the faces of his enemies with shame, v. 2, 3. "Let them be ashamed; let them be brought to repentance, so filled with shame as that they may seek thy name (lxxxiii. 16); let them see their folly in fighting against those whom thou dost protect. However, let their designs against me be frustrated and then they will be ashamed and confounded, and much cast down in their own eyes," Neh. vi. 16.

III. He prays that God would fill the hearts of his friends with joy (v. 4). Let us make the service of God our great business and the favour of God our great delight and pleasure, for that is seeking him and loving his salvation. Let us then be assured that, if it be not our own fault, the joy of the Lord shall fill our minds and the high praises of the Lord shall fill our mouths. All who wish well to the comfort of the saints, and to the glory of God, cannot but say a hearty amen to this prayer, that those who love God's salvation may say continually, Let God be magnified.

PSALM LXXI

David penned this psalm in his old age. But he is not over-particular in representing his case, because he intended it for the general use of God's people in their afflictions, especially those they meet with in their declining years; for this psalm, above any other, is fitted for the use of the old disciples of Jesus Christ. I. He begins the psalm with believing prayers, with prayers that God would deliver him and save him (ver. 2, 4) and not cast him off (ver. 9) or be far from him (ver. 12), and that his enemies might be put to shame, ver. 13. He pleads his confidence in God (ver. 1, 3, 5, 7), the experience he had had of help from God (ver. 6), and the malice of his enemies against him, ver. 10, 11. II. He concludes the psalm with believing praises, ver. 14, &c. Never was his hope more established, ver. 16, 18, 20, 21. Never were his joys and thanksgivings more enlarged, ver. 15, 19. 22–24. He is in an ecstasy of joyful praise.

I. He prays that he might never be made ashamed of his dependence upon God nor disappointed in his believing expectations from him. With this petition every true believer may come boldly to the throne of grace.

1. David professes his confidence in God, and repeats his profession of that confidence, still presenting the profession of it to God and pleading it with him. We praise God by telling him (if it be indeed true) what an entire confidence we have in him (v. 1): "In thee, O Lord! and in thee only, do I put my trust. Whatever others do, I choose the God of Jacob for my help." Thou art my rock and my fortress (v. 3); and again, "Thou art my refuge, my strong refuge" (v. 7); that is, "I fly to thee, and am sure to be safe in thee, and under thy protection. If thou secure me, none can hurt me. Thou art my hope and my trust" (v. 5); that is, "thou hast proposed thyself to me in thy word as the proper object of my hope and trust; I have hoped in thee, and never found it in vain to do so."

2. His confidence in God is supported and encouraged by his experiences (v. 5, 6): "Thou hast been my trust from my youth; ever since I was capable of discerning between my right hand and my left, I stayed myself upon thee, for by thee have I been holden up from the womb." He that was our help from our birth ought to be our hope from our youth. If we received so much mercy from God before we were capable of doing him any service, we should lose no time when we are capable. "Thou art he that took me into the arms of thy grace, under the shadow of thy wings, into the bond of thy covenant. I have reason to hope that thou wilt protect me; thou that hast held me up hitherto wilt not let me fall now; thou that helpedst me when I could not help myself wilt not abandon me now that I am as helpless as I was then. My praise shall therefore be continually of thee."

3. His requests to God are,

(1) That he might never be put to confusion (v. 1), that he might not be disappointed of the mercy he expected and so made ashamed of his expectation.

(2) That he might be delivered out of the hand of his enemies (v. 2): "Deliver me in thy righteousness. As thou art the righteous Judge of the world, pleading the cause of the injured, cause me in some way or other to escape. Incline thy ear unto my prayers, and, answer to them, save me out of my troubles," v. 4. Thou hast given commandment to save me (v. 3); that is, thou hast promised to do it, and such efficacy is there in God's promises that they are often spoken of as commands, like that. The many eyes that were upon him (v. 7): "I am as a wonder unto many; everyone waits to see what will be the issue of such extraordinary troubles as I have fallen into and such extraordinary confidence as I profess to have in God." Or, "I am looked upon as a monster, whom everybody shuns, and therefore am undone if the Lord be not my refuge. Men abandon me, but God will not."

(3) That he might always find rest and safety in God (v. 3): Be thou my strong habitation; be thou to me a rock of repose, whereto I may continually resort. Those that are at home in God, that live a life of communion with him and confidence in him, that continually resort unto him by faith and prayer, may promise themselves a strong habitation, such as will never fall of itself nor can ever be broken through by any invading power. "Let my mouth be filled with thy praise, as now it is with my complaints, and then I shall not be ashamed of my hope, but my enemies will be ashamed of their insolence."

(4) That he might not be neglected now in his declining years (v. 9): Cast me not off now in the time of my old age; forsake me not when my strength fails. Observe here. The infirmities of age: My strength fails. Where there was strength of body and vigour of mind, strong sight, a strong voice, strong limbs, alas! in old age they fail. 2. God's presence with him under these infirmities: Lord, cast me not off; do not then forsake me. To be cast off and forsaken of God is a thing to be dreaded at any time, especially in the time of old age and when our strength fails us; for it is God that is the strength of our heart. But that the faithful servants of God may be comfortably assured that he will not cast them off in old age, nor forsake them when their strength fails them. He is a Master that is not wont to cast off old servants. In this confidence David here prays again (v. 12): "O God! be not far from me; O my God! make haste for my help, lest I perish before help come."

II. He prays that his enemies might be made ashamed of their designs against him. They lay wait for my soul (v. 10), and are adversaries to that, v. 13. They take counsel together. They say, God has forsaken him; persecute and take him. Here their premises are utterly false. All are not forsaken of God who think themselves so or whom others think to be so. And, as their premises were false, so their inference was barbarous. But rejoice not against me, O my enemy! though I fall, I shall rise. He that seems to forsake for a small moment will gather with everlasting kindness. "Let them be confounded and consumed that are adversaries to my soul. If they will not be confounded by repentance, and so saved, let them be confounded with everlasting dishonour, and so ruined."

David is here in a holy transport of joy and praise, arising from his faith and hope in God; we have both together, v. 14, where there is a sudden and remarkable change of his voice; his fears are all silenced, his hopes raised, and his prayers turned into thanksgivings. "Let my enemies say what they will, to drive me to despair, I will hope continually, hope in all conditions, in the most cloudy and dark day; I will live upon hope and will hope to the end."

I. His heart is established in faith and hope. "I will go in the strength of the Lord God, not sit down in despair, but stir up myself, will go forth and go on, not in any strength of my own, but in God's strength, and in the strength of his grace. I will make mention of thy righteousness, that is, thy faithfulness to every word which thou hast spoken, the equity of thy disposals, and thy kindness to thy people that trust in thee. This I will make mention of as my plea in prayer for thy mercy." He hopes that God will not leave him in his old age, but will be the same to him to the end that he had been all along, v. 17, 18. Thou hast taught me from my youth. The good education and good instructions which his parents gave him when he was young he owns himself obliged to give God thanks for as a great favour. When he was middle-aged he had declared all God's wondrous works. Those that have got good when they are young must be doing good when they are grown up, and must continue to communicate what they have received. Now that I am old and grey-headed, dying to this world and hastening to another, O God! forsake me not. Those that have been taught of God from their youth, and have made it the business of their lives to honour him, may be sure that he will not leave them when they are old and grey-headed, but will make the evil days of old age their best days. "I will not only show thy strength, by my own experience of it, to this generation, but I will leave my observations upon record for the benefit of posterity, and so show it to everyone that is to come." It is a debt which the old disciples of Christ owe to the succeeding generations to leave behind them a solemn testimony to the power, pleasure, and advantage of religion, and the truth of God's promises. He hopes that God would revive him and raise him up out of his present low and disconsolate condition (v. 20): Thou who hast made me to see and feel great and sore troubles, above most men, shalt quicken me again. He does not say, "Thou hast burdened me with those troubles," but "shown them to me," as the tender father shows the child. If we have a due regard to the hand of God in our troubles, we may promise ourselves, in due time, a deliverance out of them. "Thou shalt not only restore me to my greatness again, but shalt increase it, and give me a better interest, after this shock, than before; thou shalt not only comfort me, but comfort me on every side, so that I shall see nothing black or threatening on any side." Sometimes God makes his people's troubles contribute to the increase of their greatness, and their sun shines the brighter for having been under a cloud. He hopes that all his enemies would be put to confusion, v. 24. They are confounded, they are brought to shame, that seek my hurt.

II. Let us now see how his heart is enlarged in joy and praises, how he rejoices in hope, and sings in hope; for we are saved by hope. My mouth shall show forth thy righteousness and thy salvation; and again (v. 24), My tongue shall talk of thy righteousness, and this all the day. God's righteousness, which David seems here to be in a particular manner affected with, includes a great deal: the rectitude of his nature, the equity of his providential disposals, the righteous laws he has given us to be ruled by, the righteous promises he has given us to depend upon, and the everlasting righteousness which his Son has brought in for our justification. God's righteousness and his salvation are here joined together. "I know not the numbers thereof (v. 15). Though I cannot give a particular account of thy favours to me, they are so many, yet, knowing them to be numberless, I will be still speaking of them, for in them I shall find new matter," v. 19. This is praising God, acknowledging his perfections and performances to be so high that we cannot apprehend them, so great that we cannot comprehend them. O God! who is like unto thee? None in heaven, none on earth, no angel, no king. God is a non-such; we do not rightly praise him if we do not own him to be so. I will praise thee, even thy truth. God is made known by his word; if we praise that, and the truth of that, we praise him. It is God's honour that he is a Holy One; it is his people's honour that he is the Holy One of Israel. He will express his joy and exultation in sacred music—with the psaltery, with the harp; at these David excelled, and the best of his skill shall be employed in setting forth God's praises to such advantage as might affect others. "Unto thee will I sing, to thy honour, and with a desire to be accepted of thee. My lips shall greatly rejoice when I sing unto thee, knowing they cannot be better employed. My soul shall rejoice which thou hast redeemed." We do not make melody to the Lord, in singing his praises, if we do not do it with our hearts. My lips shall rejoice, but that is nothing; lip-labour, though ever so well laboured, if that be all, is but lost labour in serving God; the soul must be at work, and with all that is within us we must bless his holy name.

PSALM LXXII

The foregoing psalm was penned by David when he was old, and, it should seem, so was this too; for Solomon was now standing fair for the crown; that was his prayer for himself, this for his son and successor, and with these two the prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended, as we find in the close of this psalm. This is entitled "a psalm for Solomon". it is probable that David dictated it, or, rather, that it was by the blessed Spirit dictated to him, when, a little before he died, by divine direction he settled the succession, and gave orders to proclaim Solomon king, 1 Kings i. 30, &c. But, though Solomon's name is here made use of, Christ's kingdom is here prophesied of under the type and figure of Solomon's. David, in spirit, I. Begins with a short prayer for his successor, ver. 1. II. He passes immediately into a long prediction of the glories of his reign, ver. 2–17. And, III. He concludes with praise to the God of Israel, ver. 18–20.

A psalm for Solomon.

This verse is a prayer for the king, even the king's son.

I. We may apply it to Solomon: Give him thy judgments, O God! and thy righteousness; make him a man, a king; make him a good man, a good king. 1. It is the prayer of a father for his child, a dying blessing, such as the patriarchs bequeathed to their children. Solomon learned to pray for himself as his father had prayed for him, not that God would give him riches and honour, but a wise and understanding heart. Parents cannot give grace to their children, but may by prayer bring them to the God of grace. 2. It is the prayer of a king for his successor. David had executed judgment and justice during his reign, and now he prays that his son might do so too. Such a concern as this we should have for posterity. 3. It is the prayer of subjects for their king. It should seem, David penned this psalm for the use of the people, that they, in singing, might pray for Solomon. Those who would live quiet and peaceable lives must pray for kings and all in authority, that God would give them his judgments and righteousness.

II. We may apply it to Christ; not that he who intercedes for us needs us to intercede for him; but, 1. It is a prayer of the Old Testament church for sending the Messiah. 2. It is an expression of the satisfaction which all true believers take in the authority which the Lord Jesus has received from the Father: "Let him have all power both in heaven and earth, and be the Lord our righteousness; let him be the great trustee of divine grace for all that are his."

This is a prophecy of the prosperity and perpetuity of the kingdom of Christ under the shadow of the reign of Solomon. 1. As a plea to enforce the prayer: "Lord, give him thy judgments and thy righteousness" (v. 1). 2. As an answer of peace to the prayer. That this prophecy must refer to the kingdom of the Messiah is plain, because there are many passages in it which cannot be applied to the reign of Solomon. The kingdom here spoken of is to last as long as the sun, but Solomon's was soon extinct. Therefore even the Jewish expositors understand it of the kingdom of the Messiah.

I. That it should be a righteous government (v. 2): He shall judge thy people with righteousness. Compare Isa. xi. 4. All the laws of Christ's kingdom are consonant to the eternal rules of equity. The peace of his kingdom shall be supported by righteousness (v. 3).

II. That it should be a peaceable government: The mountains shall bring peace, and the little hills (v. 3); that is (says Dr. Hammond), both the superior and the inferior courts of judicature in Solomon's kingdom. There shall be abundance of peace, v. 7. Solomon's name signifies peaceable, and such was his reign. But peace is, in a special manner, the glory of Christ's kingdom; for, as far as it prevails, it reconciles men to God, to themselves, and to one another, and slays all enmities; for he is our peace.

III. That the poor and needy should be, in a particular manner, taken under the protection of this government: He shall judge thy poor, v. 2. The poor of the people, and the children of the needy, he will be sure so to judge as to save, v. 4. This is insisted upon again (v. 12, 13), intimating that Christ will be sure to carry his cause on behalf of his injured poor. He will deliver the needy that lie at the mercy of their oppressors. He will spare the needy that throw themselves on his mercy, he will save their souls, and that is all they desire. Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Christ is the poor man's King.

IV. That proud oppressors shall be reckoned with: He shall break them in pieces (v. 4). The devil is the great oppressor, whom Christ will break in pieces and of whose kingdom he will be the destruction. So precious shall their blood be unto him that not a drop of it shall be shed, by the deceit or violence of Satan or his instruments, without being reckoned for. Christ is a King, who, though he calls his subjects sometimes to resist unto blood for him, yet is not prodigal of their blood.

V. That religion shall flourish under Christ's government (v. 5): They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure. Solomon indeed built the temple, but it did not last long; this therefore must point at Christ's kingdom. Faith in Christ will set up, and keep up, the fear of God; and therefore this is the everlasting gospel that is preached. And, as Christ's government promotes devotion towards God, so it promotes both justice and charity among men (v. 7): In his days shall the righteous flourish. The law of Christ, written in the heart, disposes men to be honest and just, and to render to all their due; it likewise disposes men to live in love, and so it produces abundance of peace and beats swords into ploughshares. Both holiness and love shall be perpetual in Christ's kingdom, and shall never go to decay, for the subjects of it shall fear God as long as the sun and moon endure; Christianity, having got footing in the world, shall keep its ground till the end of time, and having got footing in the heart, it will continue there till, by death, the sun, and the moon, and the stars (that is, the bodily senses) are darkened.

VI. That Christ's government shall be very comfortable to all his faithful loving subjects (v. 6): He shall, by the graces and comforts of his Spirit, come down like rain upon the mown grass; not on that which is cut down, but that which is left growing, that it may spring again, though it was beheaded.

VII. That Christ's kingdom shall be greatly enlarged.

1. The extent of his territories (v. 8): He shall have dominion from sea to sea (from the South Sea to the North, or from the Red Sea to the Mediterranean) and from the river Euphrates, or Nile, to the ends of the earth. Solomon's dominion was very large (1 Kings iv. 21), according to the promise, Gen. xv. 18. But no sea, no river, is named, that it might, by these proverbial expressions, intimate the universal monarchy of the Lord Jesus. His gospel has been, or shall be, preached to all nations (Matt. xxiv. 14). His territories shall be extended to those countries, (1) That were strangers to him: Those that dwell in the wilderness, that seldom hear news, shall hear the glad tidings of the Redeemer, shall bow before him, shall believe in him, worship him, and take his yoke upon them. (2) That were enemies to him, and had fought against him: They shall lick the dust.

2. The dignity of his tributaries. He shall not only reign over those that dwell in the wilderness, the peasants and cottagers, but over those that dwell in the palaces (v. 10): The kings of Tarshish, and of the isles, that lie most remote from Israel and are the isles of the Gentiles (Gen. x. 5), shall bring presents to him as their sovereign Lord. This was literally fulfilled in Solomon (for all the kings of the earth sought the wisdom of Solomon, and brought every man his present, 2 Chron. ix. 23, 24), and in Christ too, when the wise men of the east came to worship him and brought him presents, Matt. ii. 11.

VIII. That he shall be honoured and beloved by all his subjects (v. 15): He shall live; his subjects shall desire his life (O king! live for ever) and with good reason; for he has said, Because I live, you shall live also. Presents shall be made to him. Though he shall be able to live without them, for he needs neither the gifts nor the services of any, yet to him shall be given of the gold of Sheba. He that is best must be served with the best. Prayers shall be made for him, and that continually. The people prayed for Solomon, and that helped to make him and his reign so great a blessing to them. But how is this applied to Christ? He needs not our prayers, nor can have any benefit by them. But the Old Testament saints prayed for his coming, prayed continually for it; for they called him, He that should come. And now that he has come we must pray for the success of his gospel and the advancement of his kingdom, which he calls praying for him. Praises shall be made of him. Daily shall he be praised.

IX. That under his government there shall be a wonderful increase both of meat and mouths. The country shall grow rich. Sow but a handful of corn on the top of the mountains, whence one would expect but little, and yet the fruit of it shall shake like Lebanon; it shall come up like a wood, so thick, and tall, and strong, like the cedars of Lebanon. This is applicable to the wonderful productions of the seed of the gospel in the days of the Messiah. A handful of that seed, sown in the mountainous and barren soil of the Gentile world, produced a wonderful harvest gathered in to Christ. The fields were white unto harvest, John iv. 35; Matt. ix. 37. The towns shall grow populous: Those of the city shall flourish like grass, for number, for verdure.

X. That his government shall be perpetual, both to his honour and to the happiness of his subjects. The Lord Jesus shall reign for ever, and of him only this must be understood, and not at all of Solomon. It is Christ only that shall be feared throughout all generations (v. 5) and as long as the sun and moon endure, v. 7. 1. The honour of the prince is immortal and shall never be sullied (v. 17): His name shall endure for ever. As the names of earthly princes are continued in their posterity, so Christ's in himself. 2. The happiness of the people is universal, too; Men shall be blessed, truly and for ever blessed, in him.

1. The psalmist is here enlarged in thanksgivings for the prophecy and promise, v. 18, 19. So sure is every word of God that we have reason enough to give thanks for what he has said, though it be not yet done. We must own that for all the great things he has done for the world God is worthy to be praised; Blessed be the Lord, that is, blessed be his glorious name. We are here taught to bless the name of Christ, and to bless God in Christ. 1. As the Lord God, as a self-existent self-sufficient Being, and our sovereign Lord. 2. As the God of Israel, in covenant with that people and worshipped by them. 3. As the God who only does wondrous things, in creation and providence, and especially this work of redemption, which excels them all.

II. He is earnest in prayer for the accomplishment of this prophecy and promise: Let the whole earth be filled with his glory. David shuts up the prayer with a double seal: "Amen and amen." He even shuts up his life with this prayer, v. 20. This was the last psalm that ever he penned, though not placed last in this collection. With this he breathes his last: "Let God be glorified, let the kingdom of the Messiah be set up, and I desire no more. With this let the prayers of David the son of Jesse be ended. Even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

PSALM LXXIII

This psalm, and the ten that next follow it, carry the name of Asaph in the titles of them. If he was the penman of them (as many think), we rightly call them psalms of Asaph. If he was only the chief musician, to whom they were delivered, our marginal reading is right, which calls them psalms for Asaph. Though the Spirit of prophecy by sacred songs descended chiefly on David, who is therefore styled "the sweet psalmist of Israel", yet God put some of that Spirit upon those about him. This psalm gives us an account of the conflict which the psalmist had with a strong temptation to envy the prosperity of wicked people. He begins his account with sacred principle, by the help of which he kept his ground, ver. 1. He then tells us, I. How he got into the temptation, ver. 2–14. II. How he got out of the temptation, ver. 15–20. III. How he gained by the temptation and was the better for it, ver. 21–28.

A psalm of Asaph.

This psalm begins somewhat abruptly: Yet God is good to Israel (so the margin reads it). Though wicked people receive many of the gifts of his providential bounty, yet we must own that he is, in a peculiar manner, good to Israel.

The psalmist designs an account of a temptation to envy the prosperity of the wicked.

I. He lays down, in the first place, that great principle which he is resolved to abide by while he was parleying with this temptation, v. 1. Job, when he was entering into such a temptation, fixed for his principle the omniscience of God: Times are not hidden from the Almighty, Job xxiv. 1. Jeremiah's principle is the justice of God: Righteous art thou, O God! when I plead with thee, Jer. xii. 1. Habakkuk's principle is the holiness of God: Thou art of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, Hab. i. 13. The psalmist's, here, is the goodness of God. He had had many thoughts in his mind concerning the providences of God, but this word, at last, settled him: "For all this, God is good, good to Israel, even to those that are of a clean heart." Those are the Israel of God that are of a clean heart. God, who is good to all, is in a special manner good to his church and people, as he was to Israel of old.

II. He comes now to relate the shock that was given to his faith in God's distinguishing goodness to Israel, by a strong temptation to think that the Israel of God are no happier than other people and that God is no kinder to them than to others.

1. He speaks of it as a very narrow escape that he had not been overthrown by this temptation (v. 2): "But as for me, though I was so well satisfied in the goodness of God to Israel, yet my feet were almost gone (the tempter had almost tripped up my heels), my steps had well-nigh slipped, for I was envious at the foolish." There are storms that will try the firmest anchors. Many a precious soul, that shall live for ever, had once a very narrow turn for its life.

2. The psalmist's temptation. He saw, with grief, the prosperity of the wicked, v. 3. They seem to have the least share of the troubles and calamities of this life (v. 5): They are not in the troubles of other men, even of wise and good men, neither are they plagued like other men, but seem as if by some special privilege they were exempted from the common lot of sorrows. They seem to have the greatest share of the comforts of this life. They live at ease so that their eyes stand out with fatness, v. 7. There are many who have a great deal of this life in their hands, but nothing of the other life in their hearts. They are ungodly, and yet they prosper and increase in riches, v. 12. They are the prosperous of the age, so some read it. Their end seems to be peace. This is mentioned first, as the most strange of all (v. 4): There are no bands in their death. They are not taken off by a violent death. Nay, they are not bound by the terrors of conscience in their dying moments. We cannot judge of men's state on the other side death. Men may die like lambs, and yet have their place with the goats. They made a very bad use of their outward prosperity and were hardened by it in their wickedness. It made them very proud and haughty. Because they live at ease, pride compasses them as a chain, v. 6. Pride ties on their chain, or necklace; so Dr. Hammond reads it. It is no harm to wear a chain or necklace; but when it is worn to gratify a vain mind, it ceases to be an ornament. And, as the pride of sinners appears in their dress, so it does in their talk: They speak loftily (v. 8); they affect great swelling words of vanity (2 Pet. ii. 18). It made them oppressive to their poor neighbours (v. 6): Violence covers them as a garment. They speak wickedly concerning oppression; they oppress, and justify themselves in it. They are corrupt, that is, dissolved in pleasures and everything that is luxurious (so some). It made them very insolent in their demeanour towards both God and man (v. 9): They set their mouth against the heavens, putting contempt upon God himself. They cannot reach the heavens with their hands, to shake God's throne, but they show their ill-will by setting their mouth against the heavens. Their tongue also walks through the earth, and they take liberty to abuse all that come in their way. They could not have been thus wicked if they had not learned to say (v. 11), How doth God know? And is there knowledge in the Most High? What an affront is it to the God of infinite knowledge, from whom all knowledge is, to ask, Is there knowledge in him? Well may he say (v. 12), Behold, these are the ungodly. He observed that while wicked men thus prospered in their impiety, good people were in great affliction, and he himself in particular. He looked abroad and saw many of God's people greatly at a loss (v. 10): "Because the wicked are so very daring therefore his people return hither; they know not what to say to it any more than I do, and the rather because waters of a full cup are wrung out to them; they are not only made to drink of the bitter cup of affliction, but to drink all. Care is taken that they lose not a drop of that unpleasant potion; the waters are wrung out unto them, that they may have the dregs of the cup." These are the waters wrung out to them: "For my part," says he, "all the day long have I been plagued with one affliction or another, and chastened every morning, as duly as the morning comes." From all this arose a very strong temptation to cast off his religion. There are those, even among God's professing people, that say, "How does God know? Surely all things are left to blind fortune, and not disposed of by an all-seeing God." Though the psalmist's feet were not so far gone as to question God's omniscience, yet he was tempted to question the benefit of religion, and to say (v. 13), Verily, I have cleansed my heart in vain, and have, to no purpose, washed my hands in innocency. But when the pure in heart, those blessed ones, shall see God (Matt. v. 8), they will not say that they cleansed their hearts in vain.

How he kept his footing and got the victory.

I. He kept up a respect for God's people, and restrained himself from speaking what he had thought amiss, v. 15. He got the victory by degrees, and this was the first point he gained; he was ready to say, Verily, I have cleansed my heart in vain, but he kept his mouth with this consideration, "If I say, I will speak thus, behold, I should give the greatest offence imaginable to the generation of thy children." Though he thought amiss, he took care not to utter that evil thought which he had conceived. If therefore thou hast been so foolish as to think evil, lay thy hand upon thy mouth, and let it go no further, Prov. xxx. 32. We must think twice before we speak once, both because some things may be thought which may not be spoken and because the second thoughts may correct the mistakes of the first. There is nothing that can give more general offence to the generation of God's children than to say that we have cleansed our heart in vain or that it is vain to serve God.

II. He foresaw the ruin of wicked people. "I endeavoured to understand the meaning of this unaccountable dispensation of Providence; but it was too painful for me. I could not conquer it by the strength of my own reasoning." If there were not another life after this, we could not fully reconcile the prosperity of the wicked with the justice of God. But (v. 17) he went into the sanctuary of God; he consulted the scriptures, and he prayed to God to make this matter plain to him, and, at length, he understood wicked people were rather to be pitied than envied, for they were but ripening for ruin. The sanctuary must be the resort of a tempted soul. All is well that ends well, everlastingly well; but nothing well that ends ill, everlastingly ill. The prosperity of the wicked is short and uncertain. The high places in which Providence sets them are slippery places (v. 18). Their destruction is sure, and sudden, and very great. They flourish for a time, but are undone for ever. He speaks of it as God's doing, and therefore it cannot be resisted: Thou castest them down. It is swift; for how are they brought into desolation as in a moment! v. 19. It is a total and final ruin: They are utterly consumed with terrors. Their prosperity is therefore not to be envied at all, but despised. As a dream when one awaketh, so, O Lord! when thou awakest, or when they awake (as some read it), thou shalt despise their image, their shadow, and make it to vanish. In the day of the great judgment (so the Chaldee paraphrase reads it), they shall rise to shame and everlasting contempt. They shall be made to awake out of the sleep of their carnal security, and then God shall despise their image. How did God despise that rich man's image when he said, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee! Luke xii. 19, 20.

An account of the good improvement which the psalmist made of that sore temptation with which he had been assaulted and by which he was almost overcome.

I. He learned to think very humbly of himself and to abase and accuse himself before God (v. 21, 22); My heart was grieved, and I was pricked in my reins; temptation was to Paul as a thorn in the flesh, 2 Cor. xii. 7. The working of envy and discontent is as painful as any. The psalmist owns it was his ignorance to vex himself at this: "So ignorant was I of that which I might have known. I was as a beast (Behemoth—a great beast) before thee. Beasts mind present things only, and never look before at what is to come; and so did I. To be ready to wish myself one of them, and to think of changing conditions with them! So foolish was I."

II. He took occasion hence to own his dependence on the grace of God (v. 23): "Nevertheless, foolish as I am, I am continually with thee and in thy favour; thou hast holden me by my right hand." He had said, in the hour of temptation (v. 14), All the day long have I been plagued; but here he corrects himself for that passionate complaint: "Though God has chastened me, he has not cast me off; notwithstanding all the crosses of my life, I have been continually with thee. Though God has sometimes written bitter things against me, yet he has still holden me by my right hand to prevent my losing my way in the wildernesses through which I have walked." If he has thus maintained the spiritual life, the earnest of eternal life, we ought not to complain. "My feet were almost gone, and they would have quite gone, past recovery, but that thou hast holden me by my right hand and so kept me from falling."

III. He encouraged himself to hope that the same God who had delivered him from this evil work would preserve him to his heavenly kingdom, as St. Paul does (2 Tim. iv. 18): "I am now upheld by thee, therefore thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, leading me, as thou hast done hitherto, and thou shalt afterwards receive me to glory," v. 24. The psalmist had like to have paid dearly for following his own counsels in this temptation and therefore resolves for the future to take God's advice. If God direct us in the way of our duty, he will afterwards reconcile us to all the dark providences that now puzzle and perplex us, and ease us of the pain we have been put into by some threatening temptations.

IV. He was hereby quickened to cleave the more closely to God, and very much confirmed and comforted in the choice he had made of him, v. 25, 26. He had complained of his afflictions (v. 14); but this makes them very light and easy, All is well if God be mine. We have here the breathings of a sanctified soul towards God, and its repose in him. Whom have I in heaven but thee? There is scarcely a verse in all the psalms more expressive than this of the pious and devout affections of a soul to God. God alone, that made the soul, can make it happy. If God be our felicity we must have him (Whom have I but thee?), we must choose him. Our desires must not only be offered up to God, but they must all terminate in him, desiring nothing more than God, but still more and more of him. "There is none in heaven but thee. I desire none on earth besides thee; not only none in heaven, which we have but little acquaintance with, but none on earth, where we have many friends and where much of our present interest and concern lie." My flesh and my heart fail. Others have experienced and we must expect, the failing both of flesh and heart. The body will fail by sickness, age, and death. But God is the strength of my heart and my portion for ever. He speaks as one careless of the body (let that fail, there is no remedy), but as one concerned about the soul, to be strengthened in the inner man.

V. He was fully convinced of the miserable condition of all wicked people. This he learned in the sanctuary upon this occasion, and he would never forget it (v. 27): Lo, those that are far from thee, in a state of distance and estrangement, that desire the Almighty to depart from them, shall certainly perish.

VI. He was greatly encouraged to cleave to God and to confide in him, v. 28. Our drawing near to God takes rise from his drawing near to us, and it is the happy meeting that makes the bliss. Here is a great truth laid down, That it is good to draw near to God; but the life of it lies in the application, "It is good for me." If wicked men, notwithstanding all their prosperity, shall perish and be destroyed, then let us trust in the Lord God, in him, not in them (see cxlvi. 3–5), in him, and not in our worldly prosperity; let us trust in God, and neither fret at them nor be afraid of them.

PSALM LXXIV

This psalm does so particularly describe the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple by Nebuchadnezzar that interpreters incline to think that either it was penned by David, or Asaph in David's time, or that it was penned by another Asaph, who lived at the time of the captivity, or by Jeremiah, and, after the return out of captivity, was delivered to the sons of Asaph, who were called by his name, for the public service of the church. That was the most eminent family of the singers in Ezra's time. See Ezra ii. 41; iii. 10; Neh. xi. 17, 22; xii. 35, 46. The deplorable case of the people of God at that time is here spread before the Lord, and left with him. The prophet, in the name of the church, I. Puts in complaining pleas of the miseries they suffered, for the quickening of their desires in prayer, ver. 1–11. II. He puts in comfortable pleas for the encouraging of their faith in prayer, ver. 12–17. III. He concludes with divers petitions to God for deliverance, ver. 18–23.

Maschil of Asaph.

This psalm is entitled Maschil—a psalm to give instruction, for it was penned in a day of affliction, which is intended for instruction.

I. The displeasure of God against the people of God was the cause and bitterness of all their calamities. They expostulate with God (v. 1). Christ himself, upon the cross, cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? So the church here, O God! why hast thou forsaken us for ever? Here they speak according to their present dark and melancholy apprehensions. The people of God must not think that because they are cast down they are therefore cast off, that because men cast them off therefore God does. This expostulation intimates that they dreaded God's casting them off more than anything. Why does thy anger smoke? that is, why does it rise up to such a degree that all about us take notice of it. They plead their relation to him: "We are the sheep of thy pasture. That the wolves worry the sheep is not strange; but was ever any shepherd thus displeased at his own sheep? Remember, we are thy congregation (v. 2), and devoted to thy praise; we are the rod, or tribe, of thy inheritance, from whom thou hast received praise and worship more than from the neighbouring nations. We are pleading for Mount Zion, wherein thou hast dwelt, which has been the place of thy peculiar delight and residence, thy demesne and mansion. It is thy congregation, which thou hast purchased of old by many miracles of mercy when they were first formed into a people; it is thy inheritance, which thou hast redeemed when they were sold into servitude. Now, Lord, wilt thou now abandon a people that cost thee so dear, and has been so dear to thee?" Much more reason have we to hope that God will not cast off any whom Christ has redeemed with his own blood. "Lift up thy feet; that is, come with speed to repair the desolations that are made in thy sanctuary, which otherwise will be perpetual and irreparable."

II. They complain of the outrage and cruelty of their enemies, but only what they had done against the sanctuary and the synagogue. The temple at Jerusalem was the dwelling-place of God's name, and therefore the sanctuary, or holy place, v. 7. In this the enemies did wickedly (v. 3), for they destroyed it in downright contempt of God and affront to him. They roared in the midst of God's congregations, v. 4, where God's faithful people attended on him with a humble reverent silence. They set up their ensigns for signs. The banners of their army they set up in the temple. This daring defiance of God and his power touched his people in a tender part. Men took a pride in destroying the carved work of the temple, v. 5, 6. Some read it thus: They show themselves, as one that lifts up axes on high in a thicket of trees, for so do they break down the carved work of the temple; they make no more scruple of breaking down the rich wainscot of the temple than woodcutters do of hewing trees in the forest. They set fire to it, and so violated or destroyed it to the ground, v. 7. The Chaldeans burnt the house of God, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 19. And the Romans left not there one stone upon another (Matt. xxiv. 2), till Zion, the holy mountain, was by Titus Vespasian ploughed as a field. He complains of the desolations of the synagogues, or schools of the prophets. Let us destroy them together; not only the temple, but all the places of religious worship and the worshippers with them. They burnt up all the synagogues of God in the land and laid them all waste.

III. The great aggravation of all these calamities was that they had no prospect at all of relief, nor could they foresee an end of them (v. 9): "We see our enemy's sign set up in the sanctuary, but we see not our signs. There is no more any prophet to tell us how long the trouble will last and when things concerning us shall have an end, that hope may support us under our troubles." How long shall the adversary reproach and blaspheme thy name? Not "How long shall we be troubled?" but "How long shall God be blasphemed? Why withdrawest thou thy hand, and dost not stretch it out, to deliver thy people and destroy thy enemies?"

Two things quiet the minds of those that are here sorrowing for the solemn assembly:—

I. That God is the God of Israel, a God in covenant with his people (v. 12): God is my King of old. This comes in both as a plea in prayer to God and as a prop to their own faith and hope, to encourage themselves to expect deliverance, considering the days of old, lxxvii. 5. Several things are here mentioned which God had done for his people as their King of old, which encouraged them to commit themselves to him and depend upon him.

1. He had divided the sea before them when they came out of Egypt, not by the strength of Moses or his rod, but by his own strength; and he that could do that could do anything.

2. He had destroyed Pharaoh and the Egyptians. Pharaoh was the leviathan; the Egyptians were the dragons, fierce, and cruel. God crushed their powers, though complicated, and at last drowned them all in the Red Sea. This was typical of Christ's victory over Satan and his kingdom, pursuant to the first promise, that the seed of the woman should break the serpent's head. This providence was meat to their faith and hope, to encourage them in the other difficulties they were likely to meet in the wilderness.

3. God had both ways altered the course of nature, both in fetching streams out of the rock and turning streams into rock, v. 15. He had dissolved the rock into waters: Thou didst bring out the fountain and the flood out of the rock, out of the flinty rock. Let this never be forgotten, but let it especially be remembered that the rock was Christ, and the waters out of it were spiritual drink. He had congealed the waters into rock: Thou driedst up mighty rapid rivers, Jordan particularly at the time when it overflowed all its banks. He that did these things could now deliver his oppressed people.

II. That the God of Israel is the God of nature, v. 16, 17. It is he that orders the regular successions and revolutions, day and night. He is the Lord of all time. It is he that opens the eyelids of the morning light, and draws the curtains of the evening shadow. He has prepared the moon and the sun. "Thou hast appointed all the bounds of the earth, and the different climates of its several regions, for thou hast made summer and winter, the frigid and the torrid zones; or, rather, the constant revolutions of the year and its several seasons." He that had power at first to settle, and still to preserve, this course of nature by the diurnal and annual motions of the heavenly bodies, has certainly all power both to save and to destroy. He that is faithful to his covenant with the day and with the night, will certainly make good his promise to his people. His covenant with Abraham and his seed is as firm as that with Noah and his sons, Gen. viii. 21.

The psalmist here, in the name of the church, most earnestly begs that God would appear for them against their enemies, and put an end to their present troubles. Arise, O God! plead thy own cause.

I. The persecutors are God's sworn enemies: "Lord, they have not only abused us, they have directly and immediately reproached thee, and blasphemed thy name," v. 18. The psalmist insists much upon this: "We dare not answer their reproaches; Lord, do thou answer them. Remember that the foolish people have blasphemed thy name (v. 18) and that still the foolish man reproaches thee daily." Those that reproach God are foolish. As atheism is folly (xiv. 1), profaneness and blasphemy are no less so. Perhaps those are cried up as the wits of the age that ridicule religion and sacred things; but really they are the greatest fools. They do not hide their blasphemous thoughts in their own bosoms, but proclaim them with a loud voice (forget not the voice of thy enemies, v. 23). God needs not to be put in remembrance by us of what he has to do, but thus we must show our concern for his honour and believe that he will vindicate us.

II. The persecuted are his covenant-people. They have fallen into the hands of the multitude of the wicked, v. 19. The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty. The land of the Chaldeans where there was none of the light of the knowledge of the true God (though otherwise it was famed for learning and arts), was indeed a dark place; the inhabitants of it were alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that was in them, and therefore they were cruel: where there was no true divinity there was scarcely to be found common humanity. The psalmist pleads with God: "It is thy turtle-dove that is ready to be swallowed up by the multitude of the wicked," v. 19. The church is a dove for harmlessness and mildness, a dove for mournfulness in a day of distress, a turtle-dove for fidelity and the constancy of love. "Shall thy turtle-dove, that is true to thee and devoted to thy honour, be delivered into the hand of the multitude of the wicked? Lord, it will be thy honour to help the weak, especially thy own. Wilt thou not perform the promises thou hast, in thy covenant, made to them? Appear, Lord, for those that will praise thy name, against those that blaspheme it."

PSALM LXXV

Though this psalm is attributed to Asaph in the title, yet it does so exactly agree with David's circumstances, at his coming to the crown after the death of Saul, that most interpreters apply it to that juncture, and suppose that either Asaph penned it, in the person of David, as his poet-laureat, or that David penned it, and delivered it to Asaph as precentor of the temple. In this psalm, I. David returns God thanks for bringing him to the throne, ver. 1, 9. II. He promises to lay out himself for the public good, in the use of the power God had given him, ver. 2, 3, 10. III. He checks the insolence of those that opposed his coming to the throne, ver. 4, 5. IV. He fetches a reason for all this from God's sovereign dominion in the affairs of the children of men, ver. 6–8.

To the chief musician, Al-taschith. A psalm or song of Asaph.

I. The psalmist gives to God the praise of the great things he had done for him and for his people Israel (v. 1): Unto thee, O God! do we give thanks. Not only I do give thanks, but we do, I and all my friends. There are many works which God does for his people that may truly be called wondrous works, out of the common course of providence. These wondrous works declare the nearness of his name.

II. He lays himself under an obligation to use his power well (v. 2): When I shall receive the congregation I will judge uprightly. Here he takes it for granted that God would, in due time, perfect that which concerned him. "When I am a judge I will judge, and judge uprightly; not as those that went before me, who either neglected judgment or perverted it." Public trusts are to be managed with great integrity; those that judge must judge uprightly, according to the rules of justice, without respect of persons.

III. He promises himself that his government would be a public blessing to Israel, v. 3. The present state of the kingdom was very bad: The earth and all the inhabitants thereof are dissolved; and no marvel, when the former reign was so dissolute that all went to rack and ruin. They were all to pieces, two against three and three against two, crumbled into factions and parties, which was likely to issue in their ruin; but I bear up the pillars of it. The fabric would have sunk if David had not held up the pillars of it. This may well be applied to Christ and his government.

IV. He checks those that opposed his government, that were against his accession to it and obstructed the administration of it. I said unto the fools, Deal not foolishly. As soon as he came to the crown he issued a proclamation against vice and profaneness, and here we have the contents of it. 1. To the simple sneaking sinners, the fools in Israel, that corrupted themselves, he said, "Deal not foolishly; do not act so directly contrary both to your reason and to your interest." 2. To the proud daring sinners, the wicked, that set God himself at defiance, he says, "Lift not up the horn; boast not of your power and prerogatives; lift not up your horn on high, as though you could have what you will and do what you will; speak not with a stiff neck, in which is an iron sinew, that will never bend to the will of God in the government; for those that will not bend shall break."

I. Here are two great truths laid down concerning God's government of the world.

1. That from God alone kings receive their power (v. 6, 7), and therefore to God alone David would give the praise of his advancement. We see strange revolutions in states and kingdoms, and are surprised at the sudden disgrace of some and elevation of others. Promotion comes not from the east, nor from the west, nor from the desert. Men cannot gain promotion either by the wisdom or wealth of the children of the east, nor by the numerous forces of the isles of the Gentiles, that lay westward, nor those of Egypt or Arabia, that lay south; no concurring smiles of second causes will raise men to preferment without the first cause. The learned Bishop Lloyd (Serm. in loc.) gives this gloss upon it: "All men took the original of power to be from heaven, but from whom there many knew not; the eastern nations, who were generally given to astrology, took it to come from their stars, especially the sun, their god. No, says David, it comes neither from the east nor from the west, neither from the rising nor from the setting of such a planet, or such a constellation, nor from the south, nor from the exaltation of the sun or any star in the mid-heaven." He mentions not the north because the same word that signifies the north signifies the secret place, and from the secret of God's counsel it does come, or from the oracle in Zion, which lay on the north side of Jerusalem. God is the judge, the governor or umpire. When parties contend for the prize, he puts down one and sets up another as he sees fit, so as to serve his own purposes and bring to pass his own counsels. He, who is infinitely wise, holy, and good, has power to set up and put down whom, and when, and how he pleases.

2. That from God alone all must receive their doom (v. 8): In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, which he puts into the hands of the children of men, a cup of providence, mixed up of many ingredients. The sufferings of Christ are called a cup, Matt. xx. 22; John xviii. 11. The wine is red, denoting the wrath of God, which is infused into the judgments executed on sinners. It is red as fire for it burns. It is full of mixture. There are mixtures of mercy and grace in the cup of affliction when it is put into the hands of God's own people, mixtures of the curse when it is put into the hands of the wicked; it is wine mingled with gall. Some drops of this wrath may light on good people; they have their share in common calamities; but the dregs of the cup are reserved for the wicked. The calamity itself is but the vehicle into which the curse is infused, the top of which has little of the infusion; but the sediment is pure wrath, and that shall fall to the share of sinners. They shall wring them out, that not a drop of the wrath may be left behind.

II. Here are two practical inferences. 1. He will praise God, and give him glory, for the power to which he has advanced him (v. 9): I will declare for ever that which thy wondrous works declare, v. 1. He will give glory to God, as the God of Jacob, knowing it was for Jacob his servant's sake, and because he loved his people Israel, that he made him king over them. 2. He will use the power with which he is entrusted for the great ends for which it was put into his hands, v. 10, as before, v. 2, 4. "Though not all the heads, yet all the horns, of the wicked will I cut off, with which they push their poor neighbours; I will disable them to do mischief."

PSALM LXXVI

This psalm seems to have been penned upon occasion of some great victory. The LXX call it, "A song upon the Assyrians", whence many good interpreters conjecture that it was penned when Sennacherib's army, then besieging Jerusalem, was entirely cut off by a destroying angel in Hezekiah's time. Or it might be penned by Asaph who lived in David's time, upon occasion of the many triumphs with which God delighted to honour that reign. I. The psalmist congratulates the happiness of the church in having God so nigh, ver. 1–3. II. He celebrates the glory of God's power, ver. 4–6. III. He infers hence what reason all have to fear before him, ver. 7–9. And, IV. What reason his people have to trust in him and to pay their vows to him, ver. 10–12. It is a psalm proper for a thanksgiving day.

To the chief musician on Neginoth. A psalm or song of Asaph.

Verses 1-6

The psalmist triumphs here in God, the centre of all our triumphs.

I. In the revelation God had made of himself to them, v. 1. It is the honour and privilege of Judah and Israel that among them God is known, and where he is known his name will be great.

II. In the tokens of God's special presence with them in his ordinances, v. 2. In the whole land of Judah and Israel God was known, but in Salem, in Zion, were his tabernacle and his dwelling-place. There he kept court; there he received the homage of his people by their sacrifices; thither they came to address themselves to him, and of that place he said, Here will I dwell, for I have desired it.

III. In the victories they had obtained over their enemies (v. 3): There broke he the arrows of the bow.

1. Here are bow and arrows, shield and sword, and all for battle; but all are broken and rendered useless. In the tabernacle and dwelling-place in Zion, there he broke the arrows of the bow; it was done in the field of battle, and yet it is said to be done in the sanctuary, because done in answer to the prayers which God's people there made to him. Public successes are owing as much to what is done in the church as to what is done in the camp. Now,

2. This victory redounded very much to the immortal honour of Israel's God (v. 4): "Thou art, and hast manifested thyself to be, more glorious and excellent than the mountains of prey. Than the great and mighty ones who think themselves firmly fixed like mountains, but are really mountains of prey, oppressive to all about them. It is their glory to destroy; it is thine to deliver." The stouthearted have despoiled and disarmed themselves (so some read it); when God pleases he can make his enemies to weaken and destroy themselves. They have slept, not the sleep of the righteous, but their sleep, the sleep of sinners, that shall awake to everlasting shame. The men of might can no more find their hands than the stout-hearted can their spirit. As the bold men are cowed, so the strong men are lamed, and cannot so much as find their hands, to save their own heads, much less to hurt their enemies.

This victory is here made to speak three things:—

I. Terror to God's enemies (v. 7–9): Thou, even thou, art to be feared. Let all the world learn by this event to stand in awe of the great God. Who may stand in thy sight from the minute that thou art angry? God's people are the meek of the earth (Zeph. ii, 3) that can bear any wrong, but do none. Though the meek of the earth are by their meekness exposed to injury, yet God will, sooner or later, appear for their salvation. When God comes to save all the meek of the earth, he will cause judgment to be heard from heaven. The righteous God long seems to keep silence, yet, sooner or later he will make judgment to be heard. When God is speaking judgment from heaven it is time for the earth to compose itself into an awful and reverent silence: The earth feared and was still.

II. Comfort to God's people, v. 10. Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee, not only by the checks given to it, when it shall be forced to confess its own impotency, but even by the liberty given to it for a time. The more the heathen rage and plot against the Lord and his anointed the more will God be praised for setting his King upon his holy hill of Zion in spite of them, ii. 1, 6. What will not turn to his praise shall not be suffered to break out: The remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain.

III. Duty to all, v. 11, 12. Let all submit themselves to this great God and become his loyal subjects. We are commanded to do homage to the King of kings: Vow and pay; that is, take an oath of allegiance to him and make conscience of keeping it. And, having taken him for our King, let us bring presents to him. Not that God needs any present we can bring, but prayers and praises, and especially our hearts, are the presents we should bring to the Lord our God. He ought to be feared: He is the fear (so the word is); his name is glorious and with him is terrible majesty. He shall cut off the spirit of princes; he shall slip it off as easily as we slip off a flower from the stalk or a bunch of grapes from the vine; so the word signifies.

PSALM LXXVII

This psalm begins with sorrowful complaints but ends with comfortable encouragements. The complaints seem to be of personal grievances, but the encouragements relate to the public concerns of the church. One of the rabbin says, This psalm is spoken in the dialect of the captives; and therefore some think it was penned in the captivity in Babylon. I. The psalmist complains here of the deep impressions which his troubles made upon his spirits, ver. 1–10. II. He encourages himself to hope that it would be well at last, by the remembrance of God's former appearances for the help of his people, ver. 11–20.

To the chief musician, to Jeduthun. A psalm of Asaph.

We have here the lively protraiture of a good man under prevailing melancholy. Drooping saints, that are of a sorrowful spirit, may here as in a glass see their own faces. The griefs and fears seem to have been over when he penned this record, for he says (v. 1), I cried unto God, and he gave ear unto me. He inserts it in the beginning of his narrative as an intimation that his trouble did not end in despair.

I. His melancholy prayers. My voice was unto God, and I cried, even with my voice unto God. Thus he gave vent to his grief and gained some ease; and thus he took the right way in order to relief (v. 2): In the day of my trouble I sought the Lord. Those that are under trouble of mind must not think to drink it away, or laugh it away, but must pray it away.

II. His melancholy grief. My sore, or wound, ran in the night, and bled inwardly, and it ceased not, no, not in the time appointed for rest and sleep. My soul refused to be comforted; he had no mind to hearken to those that would be his comforters. Those that are in sorrow affront God, if they refuse to be comforted.

III. His melancholy musings. When he remembered God his thoughts fastened only upon his justice, and wrath, and dreadful majesty, and thus God himself became a terror to him. He could not enjoy sleep, which, if it be quiet and refreshing, is a parenthesis to our griefs and cares: "Thou holdest my eyes waking with thy terrors, which make me full of tossings to and fro until the dawning of the day." He was so troubled that he could not speak and refresh himself. Grief never preys so much upon the spirits as when it is thus smothered and pent up.

IV. His melancholy reflections (v. 5, 6): "I have considered the days of old, and compared them with the present days; and our former prosperity does but aggravate our present calamities: for we see not the wonders that our fathers told us of." But say not thou that the former days were better than these. Neither let the remembrance of the comforts we have lost make us unthankful for those that are left. Particularly he called to remembrance his song in the night, but he was out of tune, and the remembrance did but pour out his soul in him, xlii. 4. See Job xxxv. 10.

V. His melancholy fears and apprehensions: "I communed with my own heart, v. 6. Come, my soul, what will be the issue of these things? And thus I began to reason, Will the Lord cast off for ever, as he does for the present? His tender mercies have been withheld, but are they shut up, shut up in anger?" (v. 7–9). This is the language of a disconsolate deserted soul, not uncommon even with those that fear the Lord, Isa. l. 10. Spiritual trouble is of all trouble most grievous to a gracious soul; nothing wounds and pierces it like the apprehensions of God's being angry. God's own people, in a cloudy and dark day, may be tempted to make desperate conclusions about their own spiritual state and the condition of God's church and kingdom in the world, and, as to both, to give up all for gone. But we must not give way to such suggestions as these. Let faith answer them from the Scripture: Will the Lord cast off for ever? God forbid, Rom. xi. 1. Is his mercy clean gone for ever? No; his mercy endures for ever, ciii. 17. Doth his promise fail for evermore? No; it is impossible for God to lie, Heb. vi. 18. Has he in anger shut up his tender mercies? No; they are new every morning (Lam. iii. 23); and therefore, How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? Hos. xi. 8, 9. On a sudden, he checked himself with that word, Selah, "Stop there; go no further," and he then chid himself (v. 10): I said, This is my infirmity. He is soon aware that it is not well said, and therefore, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? I said, This is my affliction; everyone has his affliction, his trouble in the flesh; and this is mine, the cross I must take up." Despondency of spirit, and distrust of God, under affliction, are too often the infirmities of good people. When at any time it is working in us we must thus suppress the rising of it. We must argue down the insurrections of unbelief, But I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High. He had been considering the years of ancient times (v. 5), the blessings formerly enjoyed, but now he considered them as the years of the right hand of the Most High, that those blessings of ancient times came from the sovereign disposal of his right hand who is over all, God blessed for ever, and this satisfied him.

The psalmist here recovers himself. He tried again, and, upon this second trial, found it not in vain. "I will remember, surely I will, what God has done for his people of old, till I can thence infer a happy issue of the present dark dispensations," v. 11, 12. The due remembrance of the works of God will be a powerful antidote against distrust of his promise, for he is God and changes not.

Two things, in general, satisfied him:

I. That God's way is in the sanctuary, v. 13. It is in holiness, so some. He has holy ends in all he does. His way is according to his promise, which he has made known in the sanctuary. All he does is intended for the good of his church.

II. That God's way is in the sea. Though God is holy, just, and good, yet we cannot give an account of the reasons of his proceedings. His path is in the great waters and his footsteps are not known, v. 19. God's ways are like the deep waters which cannot be fathomed (xxxvi. 6), like the way of a ship in the sea, which cannot be tracked, Prov. xxx. 18, 19. Who is so great a God as our God? Let us first give to God the glory of the great things he has done for his people, and acknowledge him, herein, great above all comparison. "Thou art the God that alone doest wonders, above the power of any creature; thou hast visibly, and beyond any contradiction, declared thy strength among the people." God brought Israel out of Egypt, v. 15. This was the beginning of mercy to them. Though they were delivered by power, yet they are said to be redeemed, as if it had been done by price, because it was typical of the great redemption, which was to be wrought out, in the fulness of time, both by price and power. He divided the Red Sea before them (v. 16): The waters gave way, and a lane was made through. Not only the surface of the waters, but the depths, were troubled, and opened to the right and to the left. He destroyed the Egyptians (v. 17): The skies sent out a sound; thy arrows also went abroad, which is explained (v. 18): The voice of thy thunder was heard in the heaven (that was the sound which the skies sent forth); the lightnings lightened the world—those were the arrows which went abroad, by which the host of the Egyptians was discomfited, and yet when the waters returned to their place his footsteps were not known (v. 19); there was no mark set upon the place. He took his people Israel under his own guidance and protection (v. 20): Thou leddest thy people like a flock. God went before them with all the care and tenderness of a shepherd. Moses and Aaron led them; they could not do it without God, but God did it with and by them. Moses was their governor, Aaron their high priest. The two great ordinances of magistracy and ministry is, though not so great a miracle, yet as great a mercy to any people as the pillar of cloud and fire was to Israel in the wilderness.

PSALM LXXVIII

This psalm is historical. Here is, I. The preface to this church history, recommending it to the study of the generations to come, ver. 1–8. II. The history itself from Moses to David; it is put into a psalm or song that the singing of it might affect them with the things here related, more than they would be with a bare narrative of them. The general scope of this psalm we have ver. 9–11. As to the particulars, we are here told, 1. What wonderful works God had wrought for them. 2. How ungrateful they were to God for his favours. How they murmured against God and distrusted him, and did but counterfeit repentance and submission when he punished them. How they affronted God with their idolatries after they came to Canaan. 3. How God had justly punished them for their sins in the wilderness, and now, of late, when the ark was taken by the Philistines, ver. 59–64. 4. How graciously God had spared them and returned in mercy to them, notwithstanding their provocations, and brought them under a happy establishment both in church and state, ver. 65–72. "These things happened unto them for ensamples," 1 Cor. x. 11; Heb. iv. 11.

Maschil of Asaph.

These verses contain the preface to this history. It is indeed Maschil—a psalm to give instruction.

I. The psalmist demands attention (v. 1): Give ear, O my people! to my law. Some make these the psalmist's words. He calls his instructions his law or edict; such was their commanding force in themselves. David was a king, and he would interpose his royal power for the edification of his people. Or the psalmist, being a prophet, speaks as God's mouth, and so calls them his people, and demands subjection to what was said as to a law.

II. Several reasons are given why we should diligently attend. 1. The things here discoursed of are weighty (v. 2): I will open my mouth in a parable, I will utter dark sayings, which challenge your most serious regard. These are called dark sayings, not because they are hard to be understood, but because they are carefully to be looked into. 2. They are the monuments of antiquity—dark sayings of old which our fathers have told us, v. 3. They are things of undoubted certainty. The honour we owe to our parents and ancestors obliges us to attend to that which our fathers have told us. 3. They are to be transmitted to posterity, and it lies as a charge upon us carefully to hand them down (v. 4); because our fathers told them to us we will not hide them from their children. Our care must be for posterity in general. That which we are to transmit to our children is not only the knowledge of languages, arts and sciences, liberty and property, but especially the praises of the Lord, and the wonderful works he has done. Our great care must be to lodge our religion, that great deposit, pure and entire in the hands of those that succeed us. (1) The law of God was given with a particular charge to teach it diligently to their children (v. 5): He established a testimony or covenant, and enacted a law, in Jacob and Israel, which he commanded them to make known to their children, Deut. vi. 7, 20. The church of God, as the historian says of the Roman commonwealth, was not to be a thing of one age, but was to be kept up from one generation to another. (2) The providences of God concerning them. God gave order that his laws should be made known to posterity. It is requisite that with them his works also should be made known. Let these be told to our children and our children's children, that, not forgetting the works of God wrought in former days, they might set their hope in God and keep his commandments. Those only may with confidence hope for God's salvation that make conscience of doing his commandments. They may take warning (v. 8): That they might not be as their fathers, a stubborn and rebellious generation. Though they were the seed of Abraham, taken into covenant with God, their spirit was not steadfast with him, but upon every occasion they flew off from him.

In these verses,

I. The psalmist observes the rebukes that the people of Israel had brought upon themselves by their dealing treacherously with God, v. 9–11. The children of Ephraim, in which tribe Shiloh was, though they were well armed and shot with bows, yet turned back in the day of battle. This seems to refer to that shameful defeat which the Philistines gave them in Eli's time, when they took the ark prisoner, 1 Sam. iv. 10, 11. Well might that event be thus fresh in mind in David's time, above forty years after, for the ark, which in that memorable battle was seized by the Philistines, though it was quickly brought out of captivity, was never brought out of obscurity till David fetched it from Kirjath-jearim to his own city. Note: the shameful cowardice of the children of Ephraim. Sin dispirits men and takes away the heart. They were basely treacherous and perfidious, for they kept not the covenant of God. They forgot his works and his wonders. Our forgetfulness of God's works is at the bottom of our disobedience to his laws.

II. He takes occasion hence to consult precedents. The narrative in these verses is very remarkable, for it relates a kind of struggle between God's goodness and man's badness, and mercy, at length, rejoices against judgment.

1. God did great things for his people Israel when he first incorporated them and formed them into a people: Marvellous things did he in the sight of their fathers. He made a lane for them through the Red Sea, and caused them, gave them courage, to pass through, though the waters stood over their heads as a heap, v. 13. He provided a guide for them through the untrodden paths of the wilderness (v. 14); he led them step by step, in the day time by a cloud, which also sheltered them from the heat, and all the night with a light of fire, which made the darkness of night less frightful, and perhaps kept off wild beasts, Zech. ii. 5. He furnished their camp with fresh water in a dry and thirsty land by broaching a rock (v. 15, 16): He clave the rocks in the wilderness. Out of the dry and hard rock he gave them drink, not distilled as out of an alembic, drop by drop, but in streams running down like rivers, and as out of the great depths. God gives abundantly, and is rich in mercy.

2. When God began thus to bless them they began to affront him (v. 17): They sinned yet more against him. They bore the miseries of their servitude better than the difficulties of their deliverance, and never murmured at their taskmasters so much as they did at Moses and Aaron. They provoked the Most High. In the wilderness they said and did that which they knew would provoke him: They tempted God in their heart, v. 18. (1) By desiring, or rather demanding, that which he had not thought fit to give them: They asked meat for their lust. God had given them the manna, wholesome pleasant food and in abundance. But this would not serve; they must have meat for their lust, dainties and varieties. (2) By distrusting his power to give them what they desired. They challenged him to give them flesh; and, if he did not, they would say it was because he could not (v. 19): They spoke against God. It was as injurious a reflection as could be cast upon God to say, Can God furnish a table in the wilderness? What an unreasonable insatiable thing is luxury! Such a mighty thing did these epicures think a table well furnished to be that they thought it was more than God himself could give them in that wilderness. And which is easier, to furnish a table in the wilderness, which a rich man can do, or to fetch water out of a rock, which the greatest potentate on the earth cannot do? Be it ever so great a thing that we ask, it becomes us to own, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst.

3. God justly resented the provocation and was much displeased with them (v. 21): The Lord heard this, and was wroth. God thus resented the provocation (v. 22): Because by this it appeared that they believed not in God. They trusted not in the salvation he had begun to work for them; for then they would not thus have questioned its progress. He commanded the clouds from above. Usually by their showers they contribute to the earth's producing corn; but now, when God so commanded them, they showered down corn themselves, which is therefore called here the corn of heaven. Everyone, even the least child in Israel, did eat the bread of the mighty (so the margin reads it); and yet it was strong meat for strong men. They were not stinted, for he sent them meat to the full. The daily provision God makes for us has no less of mercy. He expressed his resentment of the provocation, not in denying them what they so inordinately lusted after, but in granting it to them. He caused an east wind to blow and a south wind, either a south-east wind, or an east wind first to bring in the quails from that quarter and then a south wind to bring in more from that quarter; so that he rained flesh upon them; an abundance of it, as dust, as the sand of the sea (v. 27), so that the meanest Israelite might have sufficient; and it cost them nothing, no, not the pains of fetching it from the mountains, for he let it fall in the midst of their camp, round about their habitation, v. 28. We have the account, Num. xi. 31, 32. He made them pay dearly for their quails; for, though he gave them their own desire, they were not estranged from their lust (v. 29, 30); their appetite was insatiable; they were well filled and yet they were not satisfied. Such is the nature of lust; the more it is humoured the more humoursome it grows. There were some contented Israelites, that did eat moderately of the quails and were never the worse; for it was not the meat that poisoned them, but their own lust.

4. The judgments of God upon them did not reform them any more than his mercies (v. 32): For all this, they sinned still; they murmured and quarrelled with God and Moses as much as ever. Those hearts are hard indeed that will neither be melted by the mercies of God nor broken by his judgments.

5. They persisting in their sins, God proceeded in his judgments, but they were judgments of another nature, which wrought not suddenly, but slowly. Therefore their days did he consume in vanity in the wilderness and their years in trouble. They were condemned to wear out thirty-eight tedious years in the wilderness, which indeed were consumed in vanity; for in all those years there was not a step taken nearer Canaan, but they were turned back again, and wandered to and fro as in a labyrinth. Those that sin still must expect to be in trouble still. And the reason why we spend our days in so much vanity and trouble, why we live with so little comfort and to so little purpose, is because we do not live by faith.

6. Under these rebukes they professed repentance, but they were not sincere in this profession. Their profession was plausible enough (v. 34, 35): When he slew them, or condemned them to be slain, then they sought him. In a fright they cried to God for mercy, and promised they would reform and be very good; then they returned to God, and enquired early after him. They were not sincere in this profession (v. 36, 37): They did but flatter him with their mouth, as if they thought by fair speeches to prevail with him to revoke the sentence. They thawed in the sun, but froze in the shade. They did but lie to God with their tongues, for their heart was not with him.

7. God hereupon, in pity to them, put a stop to the judgments which were threatened and in part executed (v. 38, 39): But he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity. He spared their lives till they had reared another generation which should enter into the promised land. Because he was full of compassion, he said, How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? How shall I deliver thee, Israel? Hos. xi. 8. Though they did not rightly remember that he was their rock, he remembered that they were but flesh. He considered what an easy thing it would be to crush them: They are as a wind that passeth away and cometh not again. It were easy to argue they may justly be cut off, but God argues, on the contrary, therefore he will not destroy them; for the true reason is, He is full of compassion.

The matter and scope of this paragraph are the same with the former, showing what great mercies God had bestowed upon Israel, how provoking they had been, what judgments he had brought upon them for their sins, and yet how, in judgment, he remembered mercy at last.

I. The sins of Israel in the wilderness again reflected on (v. 40, 41): How often did they provoke him in the wilderness! God kept an account, Num. xiv. 22, They have tempted me these ten times. By provoking him they did not so much anger him as grieve him, for he looked upon them as his children (Israel is my son, my first-born). They grieved him because they put him under a necessity of afflicting them, which he did not willingly. After they had humbled themselves before him they turned back and tempted God, prescribing to him what proofs he should give of his power and presence with them and what methods he should take in leading them and providing for them. It is presumption for us to limit the Holy One of Israel; for, being the Holy One of Israel, he will do what is most for our good. That which occasioned their limiting God was their forgetting his former favours (v. 42). There are some days made remarkable by signal deliverances, which ought never to be forgotten.

II. The mercies of God to Israel, and this catalogue of the works of wonder which God wrought for them begins higher, and is carried down further, than that before, v. 12, &c.

1. This begins with their deliverance out of Egypt, and the plagues with which God compelled the Egyptians to let them go. Several of the plagues of Egypt are here specified, which speak aloud the power of God and his favour to Israel. The turning of the waters into blood; they had made themselves drunk with the blood of God's people, even the infants, and now God gave them blood to drink, for they were worthy, v. 44. The flies and frogs infested them, v. 45. The plague of locusts, which devoured their increase, and that for which they had laboured, v. 46. The hail, which destroyed their trees, especially their vines, the weakest of trees (v. 47), and their cattle, especially their flocks of sheep, the weakest of their cattle (v. 48), and the frost, or congealed rain (as the word signifies), was so violent that it destroyed even the sycamore-trees. The death of the first-born was the last and sorest of the plagues of Egypt, and that which perfected the deliverance of Israel; it was first in intention (Exod. iv. 23), but last in execution; for, if gentler methods would have done the work, this would have been prevented. Pharaoh's heart having been often hardened after less judgments had softened it, God now stirred up all his wrath. He made a way, or (as the word is) he weighed a path, to his anger. He did not cast it upon them uncertainly, but by weight. His anger was weighed with the greatest exactness in the balances of justice; for, in his greatest displeasure, he never did, nor ever will do, any wrong to any of his creatures: the path of his anger is always weighed. He sent evil angels among them, not evil in their own nature, but in respect to the errand upon which they were sent; they were destroying angels, or angels of punishment. The execution itself was very severe. He smote all the first-born in Egypt (v. 51) the chief of their strength, the hopes of their respective families. God made a way for his own people to go forth like sheep, not knowing whither they went, and guided them in the wilderness, as a shepherd guides his flock, with all possible care and tenderness, v. 52. He led them on safely, though in dangerous paths, so that they feared not, that is, they needed not to fear. But the sea overwhelmed their enemies that ventured to pursue them into it, v. 53. It was a lane to them, but a grave to their persecutors.

2. It is carried down as far as their settlement in Canaan (v. 54): He brought them to the border of his sanctuary, to that land in the midst of which he set up his sanctuary. That is a happy land which is the border of God's sanctuary. The whole land in general, and Zion in particular, was the mountain which his right hand had purchased. He made them to ride on the high places of the earth, Isa. lviii. 14; Deut. xxxii. 13. They found the Canaanites in the full possession of that land, but God made his people Israel tread upon their high places, dividing each tribe an inheritance by line.

III. The sins of Israel after they were settled in Canaan, v. 56–58. The children were like their fathers, and brought their old corruptions into their new habitations. They seemed sometimes devoted to God, but they presently turned aside, and provoked him to anger with their high places and their graven images. Idolatry was the sin that did most easily beset them, and which, though they often professed their repentance for, they as often relapsed into.

IV. The judgments God brought upon them for these sins. Idolatry is winked at among the Gentiles, but not in Israel (v. 59): When God heard this, when he heard the cry of their iniquity, which came up before him, he was wroth. He deserted his tabernacle among them, and removed the defence which was upon that glory, v. 60. God never leaves us till we leave him. The tabernacle at Shiloh was the tent God had placed among men, in which God would in very deed dwell with men upon the earth; but, when his people treacherously forsook it, he justly forsook it, and then all its glory departed. He gave up all into the hands of the enemy. Those whom God forsakes become an easy prey to the destroyer. God permits them to take the ark prisoner, and carry it off as a trophy of their victory, to show that he had not only forsaken the tabernacle, but even the ark itself (v. 61): He delivered his strength into captivity, as if it had been weakened and overcome, and his glory fell under the disgrace of being abandoned into the enemy's hand. We have the story, 1 Sam. iv. 11. He suffers the armies of Israel to be routed by the Philistines (v. 62, 63): He gave his people over unto the sword, for he was wroth with his inheritance; and that wrath of his was the fire which consumed their young men, in the prime of their time, and made such a devastation of them that their maidens were not praised, that is, were not given in marriage because there were no young men for them to be given to. Even their priests, who attended the ark, fell by the sword, Hophni and Phinehas. Justly they fell, for they made themselves vile, and were sinners before the Lord. When the priests fell their widows made no lamentation, v. 64. The widow of Phinehas, instead of lamenting her husband's death, died herself, when she had called her son Ichabod, 1 Sam. iv. 19, &c.

V. God's return, in mercy, to them, and his gracious appearances for them after this. God was grieved for the miseries of Israel (Judges x. 16). And therefore then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep (v. 65), and like a mighty man that shouteth by reason of wine, like one that is refreshed with sleep, and whose heart is made glad by the sober and moderate use of wine, and is therefore the more vigorous.

1. He plagued the Philistines who held the ark in captivity, v. 66. He smote them with emerods, in the hinder parts. Sooner or later God will glorify himself by putting disgrace upon his enemies, even when they are most elevated with their successes.

2. He provided a new settlement for his ark after it had been some months in captivity and some years in obscurity. He did indeed refuse the tabernacle of Joseph; he never sent it back to Shiloh, in the tribe of Ephraim, v. 67. The ruins of that place were standing monuments of divine justice. Go, see what I did to Shiloh, Jer. vii. 12. The moving of the ark is not the removing of it. Shiloh has lost it, but Israel has not. God will have a church in the world, and a kingdom among men, though this or that place may have its candlestick removed. When God chose not the tribe of Ephraim, of which tribe Joshua was, he chose the tribe of Judah (v. 68), because of that tribe Jesus was to be, who is greater than Joshua. Kirjath-jearim, the place to which the ark was brought after its rescue out of the hands of the Philistines, was in the tribe of Judah. Thence it was removed to Zion, that Mount Zion which he loved (v. 68), which was beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth; there it was that he built his sanctuary like high palaces and like the earth, v. 69. David indeed erected only a tent for the ark, but a temple was then designed and prepared for, and finished by his son. Solomon built it, and yet here it is said God built it, for his father had taught him, perhaps with reference to this undertaking, that except the Lord build the house those labour in vain that build it, cxxvii. 1. It was not finally destroyed till the gospel temple was erected, which is to continue as long as the sun and moon endure (lxxxix. 36, 37) and against which the gates of hell shall not prevail.

3. He set a good government over them, a monarchy, and a monarch after his own heart: He chose David his servant out of all the thousands of Israel, and put the sceptre into his hand, from whom Christ was to come, and who was to be a type of him, v. 70. Concerning David, he descended from the prince of the tribe of Judah, but his education was poor. He was bred not a scholar, not a soldier, but a shepherd. He was taken from the sheepfolds, as Moses was; for God delights to put honour upon the humble and diligent, and sometimes he finds those most fit for public action that have spent the beginning of their time in solitude and contemplation. The son of David was upbraided with the obscurity of his original: Is not this the carpenter? David was taken, he does not say from leading the rams, but from following the ewes, especially those great with young, which intimated that of all the good properties of a shepherd he was most remarkable for his tenderness and compassion to those of his flock that most needed his care. It was a great honour that God put upon him, in advancing him to be a king, especially to be king over Jacob and Israel, God's peculiar people, near and dear to him; but withal it was a great trust. David, having so great a trust put into his hands, obtained mercy of the Lord to be found both skilful and faithful in the discharge of it (v. 72): So he fed them; he ruled them and taught them, guided and protected them, according to the integrity of his heart, aiming at nothing but the glory of God and the good of the people committed to his charge. He was not only very sincere in what he designed, but very prudent in what he did. Happy the people that are under such a government! With good reason does the psalmist make this the finishing crowning instance of God's favour to Israel, for David was a type of Christ the great and good Shepherd.

PSALM LXXIX

This psalm is with most probability made to refer to the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple. It is set to the same tune, as the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and that weeping prophet borrows two verses out of it (ver. 6, 7) and makes use of them in his prayer, Jer. x. 25. Some think it was penned long before by the spirit of prophecy, prepared for the use of the church in that cloudy and dark day. Whatever the particular occasion was, we have here, I. A representation of the very deplorable condition that the people of God were in at this time, ver. 1–5. II. A petition to God for succour and relief (ver. 6, 7, 10, 12), that their sins might be pardoned (ver. 8, 9), and that they might be delivered, ver. 11. III. A plea taken from the readiness of his people to praise him, ver. 13.

A psalm of Asaph.

We have here a sad complaint exhibited in the court of heaven.

I. They complain here of the outrageous fury of the oppressor, exerted against places, v. 1. They did all the mischief they could to the holy land; they invaded that, and made inroads into it: "The heathen have come into thy inheritance, to plunder that, and lay it waste." Canaan was dearer to the pious Israelites as God's inheritance than as their own. Injuries done to religion should grieve us more than even those done to common right, nay, to our own right. This psalmist had mentioned it in the foregoing psalm as an instance of God's great favour to Israel that he had cast out the heathen before them, lxxviii. 55. But see what a change sin made; now the heathen are suffered to pour in upon them. They have laid Jerusalem on heaps. The inhabitants were buried in the ruins of their own houses. That sanctuary which God had built and which was thought to be established as the earth, was now laid level with the ground: Thy holy temple have they defiled, by entering into it and laying it waste. God's own people had defiled it by their sins, and therefore God suffered their enemies to defile it by their insolence. They were prodigal of blood, and killed God's people without mercy; nor did they give any quarter (v. 3): Their blood have they shed like water, wherever they met with them, round about Jerusalem, in all the avenues of the city; whoever went out or came in was waited for of the sword. Even the dead bodies of God's servants, the flesh of his saints, whose names and memories they had a particular spite at, they dug up again, and gave them to be meat to the fowls of the heaven and to the beasts of the earth; they hung them in chains, which was grievous to the Jews, because God had given them an express law against this, as a barbarous thing, Deut. xxi. 23. "We that survive have become a reproach to our neighbours; they all study to abuse us and load us with contempt, so that we have become a scorn and derision to those that are round about us." If God's professing people degenerate from what themselves and their fathers were, they must expect to be told of it.

II. They wonder more at God's anger, v. 5. This they discern in the anger of their neighbours. How long, Lord, wilt thou be angry? Shall it be for ever? This intimates that they desired no more than that God would be reconciled to them, and then the remainder of men's wrath would be restrained.

The petitions here put up to God are very suitable to the present distresses of the church.

I. They pray that God would so turn away his anger from them as to turn it upon those that persecuted and abused them (v. 6). This prayer is in effect a prophecy, in which the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. The reason why men do not call upon God is because they do not know him, how able and willing he is to help them. Those that persist in ignorance of God, and neglect of prayer, are the ungodly, who live without God in the world. They have devoured Jacob, v. 7. They have not only disturbed, but devoured, Jacob, not only encroached upon his dwelling-place, the land of Canaan, but laid it waste by plundering and depopulating it. "Pour out thy wrath upon them; not only restrain them from doing further mischief, but reckon with them for the mischief they have done."

II. They pray for the pardon of sin, which they own to be the cause of all their calamities. "Remember not against us our first sins," which some make to look as far back as the golden calf. If the children by repentance cut off the entail of the parents' sin, they may in faith pray that God will not remember them against them. When God pardons sin he blots it out and remembers it no more. Deliver us, and purge away our sins, v. 9. Then deliverances from trouble are granted in love, and are mercies indeed.

III. They pray that God would bring their troubles to a good end and that speedily: Let thy tender mercies speedily prevent us, v. 8. Unless divine mercy did speedily interpose to prevent their ruin, they were undone. This whets their importunity: "Lord, help us; Lord, deliver us; help us under our troubles, that we may bear them well. Deliver us from sin, from sinking. We are brought very low, and, being low, shall be lost if thou help us not." Those who make God the God of their salvation shall find him so. They plead no merit of theirs; they pretend to none; but, "Help us for the glory of thy name; pardon us for thy name's sake. Wherefore should the heathen say, Where is their God? He has forsaken them, and forgotten them; and this they get by worshipping a God whom they cannot see." "Lord," say they, "make it to appear that thou art by making it to appear that thou art with us, and for us, that when we are asked, Where is your God? we may be able to say, He is nigh unto us and you see he is so by what he does for us."

IV. They pray that God would avenge them on their adversaries. "Let the avenging of our blood" (according to the ancient law, Gen. ix. 6) "be known among the heathen; and by this means let God be known among the heathen as the God to whom vengeance belongs (xciv. 1) and the God that espouses his people's cause." The reproach wherewith they have blasphemed God himself we may in faith pray that God would render seven-fold into their bosoms, to humble them, and bring them to repentance.

V. They pray that God would find out a way for the rescue of his poor prisoners, v. 11. Their brethren who had fallen into the hands of the enemy, were kept close prisoners, and, because they durst not be heard to bemoan themselves, they vented their griefs in deep and silent sighs. "Let their sighs come up before thee, and be thou pleased to take cognizance of their moans." They promise the returns of praise for the answers of prayer (v. 13): So we will give thee thanks for ever. They oblige themselves not only to give God thanks at present, but to show forth his praise unto all generations.

PSALM LXXX

This psalm is much to the same purport with the foregoing. Some think it was penned upon occasion of the desolation and captivity of the ten tribes. But many were the distresses of the Israel of God, many perhaps which are not recorded in the sacred history, some whereof might give occasion for the drawing up of this psalm. The psalmist here, I. Begs for the tokens of God's presence with them and favour to them, ver. 1–3. II. He complains of the present rebukes they were under, ver. 4–7. III. He illustrates the present desolations of the church, by the comparison of a vine and a vineyard, which had flourished, but was now destroyed, ver. 8–16. IV. He concludes with prayer to God for the preparing of mercy for them and the preparing of them for mercy, ver. 17–19.

To the chief musician upon Shoshannim, Eduth. A psalm of Asaph.

Verses 1–7

The psalmist here applies to God by prayer, with reference to the present afflicted state of Israel.

I. He entreats God's favour for them (v. 1, 2), as the Shepherd of Israel, under whose guidance and care Israel was. He leads Joseph like a flock, to the best pastures and out of the way of danger. He dwells between the cherubim, where he is ready to receive petitions and to give directions. The mercy-seat was between the cherubim; and it is very comfortable in prayer to look up to God as sitting on a throne of grace. He desires from God, that he would give ear to the cry of their miseries and of their prayers, that he would stir up his strength. It had seemed to slumber: "Lord, awaken it. Lord, be to thy people a powerful help and a present help; Lord, do this before Ephraim, Benjamin and Manasseh." Perhaps these three tribes are named because they were the tribes which formed that squadron of the camp of Israel that in their march through the wilderness followed next after the tabernacle; so that before them the ark of God's strength rose to scatter their enemies.

II. He complains of God's displeasure. God was angry, and he dreads that more than anything, v. 4. He apprehended that God was angry against the prayers of his people. That God should be angry at the sins of his people and at the prayers of his enemies is not strange; but that he should be angry at the prayers of his people is strange indeed. If he be really angry at the prayers of his people, we may be sure it is because they ask amiss, James iv. 3. But perhaps it is only in their own apprehension; he seems angry with their prayers when really he is not; for thus he will try their perseverance in prayer, as Christ tried the woman of Canaan when he said: It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs. Now the tokens of God's displeasure which they had been long under were both their sorrow and shame. Thou feedest them with the bread of tears; they eat their meat from day to day in tears; this is the vinegar in which they dipped their morsel, xlii. 3. Many that spend their time in sorrow shall spend their eternity in joy. It is to their shame, v. 6. Their enemies laughed among themselves to see the frights they were in, and the disappointments they met with.

III. He prays earnestly for converting grace in order to their salvation: Turn us again, O God! v. 3. Turn us again, O God of hosts! (v. 7) and then cause thy face to shine and we shall be saved. It is the burden of the song, for we have it again, v. 19. "Lord, turn us to thee in a way of repentance and reformation, and then, no doubt, thou wilt return to us in a way of mercy and deliverance." Observe, 1. No salvation but from God's favour. 2. No obtaining favour with God unless we be converted to him. 3. No conversion to God but by his own grace. Turn thou me, and I shall be turned. The prayer here is for a national conversion. National holiness would secure national happiness.

Verses 8–19

The psalmist is here presenting his suit for the Israel of God, and pressing it home at the throne of grace. The church is here represented as a vine (v. 8, 14) and a vineyard, v. 15. The root of this vine is Christ, Rom. xi. 18. The branches are believers, John xv. 5. The church is like a vine, weak and needing support, unsightly and having an unpromising outside, but spreading and fruitful, and its fruit most excellent. The church is a choice and noble vine; we have reason to acknowledge the goodness of God that he has planted such a vine in the wilderness of this world, and preserved it to this day.

I. How the vine of the Old Testament church was planted at first. It was brought out of Egypt with a high hand; the heathen were cast out of Canaan to make room for it, seven nations to make room for that one.

II. How it spread and flourished. 1. The land of Canaan itself was fully peopled. At first they were not so numerous as to replenish it, Exod. xxiii. 29. But in Solomon's time Judah and Israel were many as the sand of the sea. Israel not only had abundance of men, but those mighty men of valour. 2. They extended their conquests and dominion to the neighbouring countries (v. 11): She sent out her boughs to the sea, the great sea westward, and her branches to the river, to the river of Egypt southward, the river of Damascus northward, or rather the river Euphrates eastward, Gen. xv. 18. But it is observable here concerning this vine that it is praised for its shadow, its boughs, and its branches, but not a word of its fruit, for Israel was an empty vine, Hos. x. 1. God came looking for grapes, but, behold, wild grapes, Isa. v. 2. And, if a vine do not bring forth fruit, no tree so useless, so worthless, Ezek. xv. 2, 6.

III. How it was wasted and ruined: "Lord, thou hast done great things for this vine, and why shall it be all undone again? Will God desert and abandon that which he himself gave being to?" v. 12. Why hast thou then broken down her hedges? There was a good reason. This noble vine had become the degenerate plant of a strange vine (Jer. ii. 21). As soon as ever God broke down their hedges and left them exposed troops of enemies presently broke in. Those that passed by the way plucked at them; the boar out of the wood and the wild beast of the field were ready to ravage it, v. 13. But till God had broken down their hedges they could not pluck a leaf of this vine. The deplorable state of Israel is described (v. 16): It is burnt with fire; it is cut down; the people are treated like thorns and briers, that are nigh unto cursing and whose end is to be burned, and no longer like vines that are protected and cherished.

IV. Their requests to God hereupon. 1. That God would help the vine (v. 14, 15). "Look down from heaven, that place of prospect, that place of power, whence thou canst send effectual relief—thence make a gracious visit, to this vine. Lord, it is formed by thyself and for thyself, and therefore it may with a humble confidence be committed to thyself and to thy own care." What we read the branch, in the Hebrew is the son (Ben), whom in thy counsel thou hast made strong for thyself. That branch was to come out of the stock of Israel (my servant the branch, Zech. iii. 8), and therefore, till he should come, Israel in general, and the house of David in particular, must be preserved. He is the true vine, John xv. i; Isa. xi. 1. "Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand," that king (whoever it was) of the house of David that was now to go in and out before them; "let thy hand be upon him, not only to protect and cover him, but to own him, and strengthen him, and give him success." So will not we go back from thee. Adding also this prayer, "Quicken us, put life into us, and then we will call upon thy name." We cannot call upon God's name in a right manner unless he quicken us. But many interpreters, both Jewish and Christian, apply this to the Messiah, the Son of David, the protector and Saviour of the church and the keeper of the vineyard. He is the man of God's right hand, to whom he has sworn by his right hand (so the Chaldee), whom he has exalted to his right hand, and who is indeed his right hand, the arm of the Lord, for all power is given to him. The stability and constancy of believers are entirely owing to the grace and strength which are laid up for us in Jesus Christ, lxviii. 28.

PSALM LXXXI

This psalm was penned, as is supposed, for the solemnity of a particular ordinance, either that of the new-moon in general or that of the feast of trumpets on the new moon of the seventh month, Lev. xxiii. 24; Num. xxix. 1. When David, by the Spirit, introduced the singing of psalms into the temple-service, this psalm was intended for that day. The two great intentions of our religious assemblies are answered in this psalm, which are, to give glory to God and to receive instruction from God to "behold the beauty of the Lord and to enquire in his temple": accordingly by this psalm we are assisted on our solemn feastdays, I. In praising God for what he is to his people (ver. 1–3), and has done for them, ver. 4–7. II. In teaching and admonishing one another concerning the obligations we lie under to God (ver. 8–10), the danger of revolting from him (ver. 11, 12), and the happiness we should have if we would but keep close to him, ver. 13–16.

To the chief musician upon Gittith. A psalm of Asaph.

When the people of God were gathered together in the solemn day, the day of the feast of the Lord, they must be told that they had business to do, for we do not go to church to sleep nor to be idle.

I. The worshippers of God are excited to their work, and are taught, by singing this psalm, to stir up both themselves and one another, to it v. 1–3. In doing this we must eye God as our strength, and as the God of Jacob, v. 1. To him, as our strength, we must pray, and we must sing praise to him as the God of all the wrestling seed of Jacob, with whom we have a spiritual communion. We must do this by all the expressions of holy joy and triumph. It was then to be done by musical instruments, the timbrel, harp, and psaltery; and by blowing the trumpet, some think in remembrance of the sound of the trumpet on Mount Sinai, which waxed louder and louder. Singing aloud intimates that we must be warm and affectionate in praising God. No time is amiss for praising God, but some are times appointed, not for God to meet us (he is always ready), but for us to meet one another, that we may join together in praising God.

II. They are here directed in their work. This was a statute for Israel, for the keeping up of a face of religion among them; it was a law of the God of Jacob, which all the seed of Jacob are bound by, and must be subject to. This solemn service was ordained for a testimony (v. 5), a standing traditional evidence, that they might know and remember what God had done for their fathers. When God went out against the land of Egypt, that he might force Pharaoh to let Israel go, then he ordained solemn feast-days to be observed by a statute for ever in their generations, as a memorial of it, particularly the passover, which perhaps is meant by the solemn-feast-day (v. 3). Here he changes the person, v. 6. God speaks by him, saying, I removed the shoulder from the burden. Let him remember this on the feast-day, God had brought them out of the house of bondage, had removed their shoulder from the burden of oppression under which they were ready to sink, had delivered their hands from the pots, or panniers, or baskets, in which they carried clay or bricks. God had delivered them at the Red Sea. He answered them with a real answer, out of the secret place of thunder. It may be meant of the giving of the law at Mount Sinai, which was the secret place, for it was death to gaze (Exod. xix. 21), and it was in thunder that God then spoke. God had borne their manners in the wilderness: "I proved thee at the waters of Meribah; thou didst there show thy temper, what an unbelieving murmuring people thou wast, and yet I continued my favour to thee." Now if they, on their solemn feast-days, were thus to call to mind their redemption out of Egypt, much more ought we, on the Christian sabbath, to call to mind a more glorious redemption wrought out for us by Jesus Christ from worse than Egyptian bondage.

Verses 8–16

God, by the psalmist, here speaks to Israel, and in them to us.

I. He demands their diligent and serious attention to what he was about to say (v. 8): "Hear, O my people! Hear what is said with the greatest solemnity, for it is what I will testify unto thee. Do not only give me the hearing, but hearken unto me, that is, be advised by me, be ruled by me."

II. He puts them in mind of their obligation to him as the Lord their God and Redeemer (v. 10): I am the Lord thy God, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt; this is the preface to the ten commandments, and a powerful reason for the keeping of them.

III. He gives them an abstract both of the precepts and of the promises which he gave them, as the Lord and their God, upon their coming out of Egypt. The great command was that they should have no other gods before him (v. 9): There shall no strange god be in thee, none besides thy own God. The great promise was that God himself, as a God all-sufficient, would be nigh unto them (Deut. iv. 7), that, if they would adhere to him as their powerful protector and ruler, they should always find him their bountiful benefactor: "Open thy mouth wide and I will fill it, as the young ravens that cry open their mouths wide and the old ones fill them." We cannot look for too little from the creature nor too much from the Creator. The pleasures of sense will surfeit and never satisfy (Isa. lv. 2); divine pleasures will satisfy and never surfeit.

IV. He charges them with a high contempt of his authority, v. 11. He had done much for them, and designed to do more; but all in vain: "My people would not hearken to my voice, but turned a deaf ear to all I said." They would none of me. They acquiesced not in my word (so the Chaldee); God was willing to be to them a God, but they were not willing to be to him a people. "Israel, the seed of Jacob my friend, set me at nought, and would have none of me." All the wickedness of the wicked world is owing to the wilfulness of the wicked will.

V. He justifies himself with this in the spiritual judgments he had brought upon them (v. 12): So I gave them up unto their own hearts' lusts, which would be more dangerous enemies and more mischievous oppressors to them than any of the neighbouring nations ever were. God withdrew his Spirit from them, took off the bridle of restraining grace, left them to themselves. Ephraim is joined to idols; let him alone. Let them take their course. And see what follows: They walked in their own counsels. "I left them to do as they would, and then they did all that was ill."

VI. He testifies his goodwill to them. He saw how sad their case was, and how sure their ruin, when they were delivered up to their own lusts. Now here God looks upon them with pity, and shows that it was with reluctance that he thus abandoned them to their folly and fate. O that my people had hearkened! See Isa. xlviii. 18. Thus Christ lamented the obstinacy of Jerusalem, If thou hadst known, Luke xix. 42. The expressions here are very affecting (v. 13–16), designed to show how unwilling God is that any should perish and desirous that all should come to repentance.

1. The great mercy God had in store for his people, and which he would have wrought for them if they had been obedient. I should have subdued their enemies; and it is God only that is to be depended on for the subduing of our enemies. He would soon have done it. If he but turn his hand, the haters of the Lord will submit themselves to him (v. 15). In spite of all the attempts of their enemies against them, their time should have endured for ever, and they should never have been disturbed in the possession of the good land God had given them. He would have given them great plenty of all good things (v. 16): He should have fed them with the finest of the wheat, with the best grain and the best of the kind. Wheat was the staple commodity of Canaan. He would not only have provided for them the best sort of bread, but with honey out of the rock would he have satisfied them. In short, God designed to make them every way easy and happy.

2. The duty God required from them as the condition of all this mercy. He expected no more than that they should hearken to him, as a scholar to his teacher, to receive his instructions—as a servant to his master, to receive his commands; and that they should walk in his ways.

3. Observe how the reason of the withholding of the mercy is laid in their neglect of the duty: If they had hearkened to me, I would soon have subdued their enemies. National sin or disobedience is the great and only thing that retards and obstructs national deliverance. It is sin that makes our troubles long and salvation slow.

PSALM LXXXII

This psalm is calculated for princes' courts and courts of justice, not in Israel only, but in other nations, "to instruct the judges of the earth" (as ii. and x.), to tell them their duty (as 2 Sam. xxiii. 3), and to tell them of their faults, as lvii. 1. We have here, I. The dignity of magistracy and its dependence upon God, ver. 1. II. The duty of magistrates, ver. 3, 4. III. The degeneracy of bad magistrates and the mischief they do, ver. 2, 5. IV. Their doom read, ver. 6, 7. V. The desire and prayer of all good people that the kingdom of God may be set up more and more, ver. 8.

A psalm of Asaph.

I. God's supreme presidency and power in all councils and courts (v. 1): God stands, as chief director, in the congregation of the mighty, the mighty One, in the councils of the prince, the supreme magistrate, and he judges among the gods, the inferior magistrates; both the legislative and the executive power of princes is under his eye and his hand. The magistrates are the mighty. They are so in authority, for the public good. They are, in the Hebrew dialect, called gods; the same word is used for these subordinate governors that is used for the sovereign ruler of the world. They are elohim. Angels are so called because God is pleased to make use of their service in the government of this lower world; and magistrates in an inferior capacity are likewise the ministers for the keeping of order and peace, and particularly of his justice in punishing evil-doers and protecting those that do well. Good magistrates are God's vicegerents, and great blessings to any people. In a mixed monarchy, the sovereign, and his congregation, his privy-council, his parliament, his bench of judges. God stands, he judges among them; they have their power from him and are accountable to him. By him kings reign. God has their hearts in his hands, and his counsels shall stand, whatever devices are in men's hearts. Let magistrates consider this and be awed by it; God is with them in the judgment, 2 Chron. xix. 6; Deut. i. 17. Let subjects consider this and be comforted with it; for good princes and good judges are under a divine direction, and bad ones are under a divine restraint.

II. A charge given to all magistrates to do good with their power, as they will answer it to him by whom they are entrusted with it, v. 3, 4. Defend the poor, who have no money wherewith to fee counsel, and the fatherless, who, while they are young and unable to help themselves, have lost those who would have been the guides of their youth. Magistrates must be fathers to their country in general. They are to administer justice impartially, and do right to the afflicted and needy. They are to rescue those who have already fallen into the hands of oppressors (v. 4): Rid them out of the hand of the wicked. These are clients whom there is nothing to be got by, yet these are those whose cause they must espouse.

III. A charge drawn up against bad magistrates, v. 2, 5. They judge unjustly, contrary to the rules of equity and the dictates of their consciences. To do unjustly is bad, but to judge unjustly is much worse, because it is doing wrong under colour of right. They were told plainly enough that it was their office and duty to protect and deliver the poor; yet they judge unjustly, for they know not, neither will they understand. They have baffled their own consciences, and so they walk on in darkness. What were the consequences of this sin: All the foundations of the earth (or of the land) are out of course. The miscarriages of public persons are public mischiefs.

Verses 6–8

The dignity of their character is acknowledged (v. 6): I have said, You are gods. He called them gods because they had a commission from God, and were delegated and appointed by him to be the conservators of the public peace. God has put some of his honour upon them, and employs them in his providential government of the world. It is a hard thing for men to have so much honour put upon them by the hand of God, and so much honour paid them, as ought to be by the children of men, and not to be proud of it and puffed up with it. But here follows a mortifying consideration: You shall die like men. This may be taken either, 1. As the punishment of bad magistrates, such as judged unjustly, and by their misrule put the foundations of the earth out of course. They shall die like other wicked men, and fall like one of the heathen princes. Or, 2. As the period of the glory of all magistrates in this world. "You are called gods, but you have no patent for immortality; you shall die like men, like common men; and like one of them, you, O princes! shall fall." Death mingles sceptres with spades.

The God of heaven exalted, v. 8. The psalmist finds it to little purpose to reason with these proud oppressors; and therefore he looks up to God and begs of him to take unto himself his great power; Arise, O God! judge the earth; Thou shalt inherit all nations. In this faith we must pray, "Arise, O God! judge the earth, appear against those that judge unjustly, and set shepherds over thy people after thy own heart." It is a prayer that Christ would come, who is to judge the earth, and that God shall give him the heathen for his inheritance.

PSALM LXXXIII

This psalm is the last of those that go under the name of Asaph. Some think it was penned upon occasion of the threatening descent which was made upon the land of Judah in Jehoshaphat's time by the Moabites and Ammonites, those children of Lot here spoken of (ver. 8), who were at the head of the alliance, 2 Chron. xx. 1. Others think it was penned with reference to all the confederacies of the neighbouring nations against Israel, from first to last. The psalmist here makes an appeal, I. To God's knowledge, by a representation of their designs and endeavours to destroy Israel, ver. 1–8. II. To God's justice by an earnest prayer for the defeat of their attempt, ver. 9–18.

A song or psalm of Asaph.

Verses 1–8

The Israel of God were in danger and great distress.

I. The psalmist here begs of God to appear on the behalf of his threatened people (v. 1): "Keep not thou silence, O God! but give judgment for us against those that do us an apparent wrong." Sometimes God holds his peace, as if he would observe an exact neutrality, and let them fight it out. Then he gives us leave to call upon him, as here, "Keep not thou silence, O God! Lord, speak to us by the prophets for our encouragement against our fears. Lord, speak for us by thy providence and speak against our enemies; speak deliverance to us and disappointment to them."

II. An account of the grand alliance of the neighbouring nations against Israel, which he begs of God to break.

This confederacy is formed against the Israel of God, and so, in effect, against the God of Israel. They hated the religious worshippers of God, because they hated God's holy religion and the worship of him. They are confederate against thee, v. 5. "Lord," says the psalmist, "they are thy enemies, for they consult against thy hidden ones." God's people are his hidden ones. Their life is hid with Christ in God. God takes them under his special protection, hides them in the hollow of his hand. They resolve to destroy those whom God resolves to preserve. Thy enemies make a tumult, v. 2. They are noisy in their clamours. This comes in as a reason why God should not keep silence: "The enemies talk big and talk much; Lord, let them not talk all, but do thou speak to them in thy wrath," ii. 5. They have lifted up the head. In confidence of their success, they are so elevated as if they could overpower the Almighty. They have taken crafty counsel, v. 3. Whatever separate clashing interest they have among themselves, against the people of God they consult with one consent (v. 5). It is no less than the utter ruin and extirpation of Israel that they design (v. 4): "Come, let us cut them off from being a nation, that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance, no, not in history." It is the secret wish of many wicked men that the church of God might not have a being in the world, that there might be no such thing as religion among mankind. Having banished the sense of it out of their own hearts, they would gladly see the whole earth rid of it. But he that sits in heaven shall laugh at them. The nations that entered into this alliance are here mentioned (v. 6–8); the Edomites and Ishmaelites, both descendants from Abraham, lead the van. These were allied to Israel in blood and yet in alliance against Israel. There are no bonds of nature so strong but the spirit of persecution has broken through them. The brother shall betray the brother to death. The Philistines were long a thorn in Israel's side, and very vexatious. Assur (that is, the Assyrian) also is joined with them.

Verses 9–18

The psalmist prays for the destruction of those confederate forces, and, in God's name, foretells it. This prophecy reaches to all the enemies of the gospel-church.

I. The defeat and discomfiture of former combinations may be pleaded in prayer to God, because God is the same still to his people and the same against his and their enemies; with him is no variableness. Do to them as to the Midianites; let them be routed by their own fears, for so the Midianites were, more than by Gideon's 300 men. Do to them as to the army under the command of Sisera (who was general under Jabin king of Canaan) which God discomfited (Judges iv. 15). They became as dung on the earth; their dead bodies were thrown like dung laid in heaps by Barak's small but victorious army. So let all thy enemies perish, O Lord! that is, So they shall perish. He prays that their leaders might be destroyed as they had been formerly, v. 11, 12. They said, Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession (v. 12), the pleasant places of God (so the word is), by which we may understand the land of Canaan, which was a pleasant land and was Immanuel's land, or the temple, which was indeed God's pleasant place (Isa. lxiv. 11), or (as Dr. Hammond suggests) the pleasant pastures, which these Arabians, who traded in cattle, did in a particular manner seek after. They shall be made like Oreb and Zeeb (Judges vii. 25), and like Zeba and Zalmunna (Judges viii. 21).

II. He prays that God would make them like a wheel (v. 13), that they might be in continual motion, unsettled and giddy in all their counsels, that they might roll down easily and speedily to their own ruin. Or, as some think, that they might be broken by the judgments of God, as the corn is broken, or beaten out, by the wheel which was then used in threshing. "The wheel, though it continually turn round, is fixed on its own axis; but let them have no more fixation than the light stubble has, which the wind hurried away." When the stubble is driven by the wind it will rest, at last, under some hedge, in some ditch or other; but he prays that they might not only be driven away as stubble, but burnt up as stubble. The application of these comparisons we have (v. 15): So persecute them with thy tempest, persecute them to their utter ruin, and make them afraid with thy storm.

III. He illustrates it by the good consequences of their confusion, v. 16–18. They did what they could to put God's people to shame, but the shame will at length return upon themselves. The beginning of this shame might be a means of their conversion: "Let them be broken and baffled in their attempts, that they may seek thy name, O Lord!" That which we should earnestly desire and beg of God for our enemies and persecutors is that God would bring them to repentance, and we should desire no other confusion to them than what may be a step towards their conversion. If they will not be ashamed and repent, let them be put to shame, that other men may know and own, if they themselves will not, that thou, whose name alone is JEHOVAH (that incommunicable, though not ineffable name) art the Most High over all the earth.

PSALM LXXXIV

It is supposed that David penned this psalm when he was forced by Absalom's rebellion to quit his city, which he lamented his absence from, because it was the holy city. This psalm contains the pious breathings of a gracious soul after God and communion with him. Though it be not entitled, yet it may fitly be looked upon as a psalm or song for the sabbath day. The psalmist here with great devotion expresses his affection, I. To the ordinances of God (ver. 1), his desire towards them (ver. 2, 3), his conviction of the happiness of those that did enjoy them (ver. 4–7), and his enjoyment of them, ver. 10. II. To the God of the ordinances; his desire towards him (ver. 8, 9), his faith in him (ver. 11), and the happiness of those that put their confidence in him, ver. 12.

To the chief musician upon Gittith. A psalm for the sons of Korah.

Verses 1–7

The psalmist here, being by force restrained from waiting upon God in public ordinances, is brought under a more sensible conviction than ever of the worth of them.

I. The wonderful beauty he saw in holy institutions (v. 1): How amiable are thy tabernacles. O Lord of hosts! The tabernacle is spoken of as more than one (thy tabernacles) because there were several courts in which the people attended, and because the tabernacle itself consisted of a holy place and a most holy. How lovely is the sanctuary in the eyes of all that are truly sanctified! Gracious souls see a wonderful, an inexpressible, beauty in holiness, and in holy work. A tabernacle was a mean habitation, but the beauty of holiness is spiritual, and the glory is within.

II. The longing desire he had to return to the enjoyment of public ordinances, or rather of God in them, v. 2. It was an entire desire; body, soul, and spirit. It was an intense desire. He longed, he fainted, he cried out. Yet it was not so much the courts of the Lord that he coveted, but he cried out, in prayer, for the living God himself. Ordinances are empty things if we meet not with God in the ordinances.

III. His grudging the happiness of the little birds that made their nests in the buildings that were adjoining to God's altars, v. 3. The sparrow has found a house and the swallow a nest for herself. These little birds, by the instinct and direction of nature, provide habitations for themselves in houses, as other birds do in the woods: some such David supposes there were in the buildings about the courts of God's house, and wishes himself with them. He would rather live in a bird's nest nigh God's altars than in a palace at a distance from them. He sometimes wished for the wings of a dove, on which to fly into the wilderness (v. 6); here for the wings of a sparrow, that he might fly undiscovered into God's courts. The word for a sparrow signifies any little bird, and (if I may offer a conjecture) perhaps when, in David's time, music was introduced so much into the sacred service, to complete the harmony they had singing-birds in cages hung about the courts of the tabernacle (for we find the singing of birds taken notice of to the glory of God, civ. 12), and David envies the happiness of these, and would gladly change places with them. David envies the happiness not of those birds that flew over the altars, but of those that had nests for themselves there. David will not think it enough to sojourn in God's house as a wayfaring man to tarry for a night; but let this be his rest, his home; here he will dwell. And he takes notice that these birds not only have nests for themselves there, but that there they lay their young; for those who have a place in God's courts themselves cannot but desire that their children also may have in God's house, a place and a name. Observe how he eyes God in this address: Thou art the Lord of hosts, my King and my God. Where should a poor, distressed subject seek for protection but with his king? And should not a people seek unto their God? My King, my God, is Lord of hosts; by him and his altars let me live and die.

IV. His acknowledgment of the happiness both of the ministers and of the people that had liberty of attendance on God's altars. Blessed are the ministers, the priests and Levites, who have their residence about the tabernacle and are in their courses employed in the service of it (v. 4). They will be still praising thee; and, if there be a heaven upon earth, it is in praising God, in continually praising him. Apply this to his house above; blessed are those that dwell there, angels and glorified saints, for they rest not day nor night from praising God. Blessed are the people, the inhabitants of the country, who, though they do not constantly dwell in God's house as the priests do, yet have liberty of access to it, v. 5–7. Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee, who makes thee his strength and strongly stays himself upon thee. They are such as have a love for holy ordinances: In whose heart are the ways of them, that is, who, having placed their happiness in God as their end, rejoice in all the ways that lead to him. They are such as will break through difficulties and discouragements in waiting upon God in holy ordinances, v. 6. When they come up out of the country to worship at the feasts their way lies through many a dry and sandy valley (so some), in which they are ready to perish for thirst; but they dig little pits to receive and keep the rain-water for their refreshments. Their way lay through many a weeping valley, so Baca signifies, that is (as others understand it), many watery valleys, which in wet weather, when the rain filled the pools, were impassable; but, by draining and trenching them, they made a road through them for the benefit of those who went up to Jerusalem. Care should be taken to keep those roads in repair that lead to church, as well as those that lead to market. But all this is intended to show they had a good will to the journey. Our way to heaven lies through a valley of Baca, but even that may be made a well if we make a due improvement of the comforts God has provided for the pilgrims to the heavenly city. They are such as are still pressing forward till they come to their journey's end at length (v. 7): They go from strength to strength. Instead of being fatigued with the tediousness of their journey and the difficulties they met with, the nearer they came to Jerusalem the more lively and cheerful they were. Those that press forward in their Christian course shall find God adding grace to their graces, John i. 16.

Verses 8–12

I. The psalmist prays for audience and acceptance with God. He prays (v. 8, 9), only that God would hear his prayer and give ear. He calls himself (as many think) God's anointed, for David was anointed by him and anointed for him. He has an eye to God under several of his glorious titles—as the Lord God of hosts, who has all the creatures at his command, as the God of Jacob, a God in covenant with his own people, and as God our shield, who takes his people under his special protection.

II. He pleads his love to God's ordinances and his dependence upon God himself.

1. God's courts were his choice, v. 10. A day spent in thy courts, in attending on the services of religion, wholly abstracted from all secular affairs, is better than a thousand, anywhere else in this world. I would rather be a doorkeeper, rather be in the meanest place and office, in the house of my God, than dwell in state, as Master, in the tents of wickedness. I would rather be a porter in God's house than a prince in those tents where wickedness reigns, rather lie at the threshold (so the word is); that was the beggar's place (Acts iii. 2): "no matter" (says David), "let that be my place rather than none."

2. God himself was his hope, and joy, and all. The Lord God is a sun and shield. We are here in darkness, but, if God be our God, he will be to us a sun, to enlighten and enliven us, to guide and direct us. We are here in danger, but he will be to us a shield to secure us. The Lord will give grace and glory. Grace signifies both the goodwill of God towards us and the good work of God in us; glory signifies both the honour which he now puts upon us, in giving us the adoption of sons, and that which he has prepared for us in the inheritance of sons. God will give them grace in this world as a preparation for glory, and glory in the other world as the perfection of grace; both are God's gift, his free gift. No good thing will be withheld from those that walk uprightly. This is a comprehensive promise, and is such an assurance of the present comfort of the saints that, whatever they desire, and think they need, they may be sure that either Infinite Wisdom sees it is not good for them or Infinite Goodness will give it to them in due time. Those are blessed who have the privileges of God's house. If we cannot go to the house of the Lord, we may go by faith to the Lord of the house, and in him we shall be happy and may be easy.

PSALM LXXXV

Interpreters are generally of opinion that this psalm was penned after the return of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon, when they still remained under some tokens of God's displeasure. The church was here in a deluge; above were clouds, below were waves; everything was dark and dismal. The church is like Noah in the ark, between life and death, between hope and fear; being so, I. Here is the dove sent forth in prayer. The petitions are against sin and wrath (ver. 4) and for mercy and grace, ver. 7. II. Here is the dove returning with an olive branch of peace and good tidings; the psalmist expects her return (ver. 8) and then recounts the favours to God's Israel which by the spirit of prophecy he gave assurance of to others, and by the spirit of faith he took the assurance of to himself, ver. 9–13.

To the chief musician. A psalm for the sons of Korah.

Verses 1–7

The people of God, in a very low and weak condition, are here taught how to address themselves to God.

I. They are to acknowledge with thankfulness the great things God had done for them (v. 1–3). God had shown himself propitious to their land, and had smiled upon it as his own: "Thou hast been favourable to thy land, as thine, with distinguishing favours." He had not dealt with them according to the desert of their provocations (v. 2): "Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people, and not punished them as in justice thou mightest. Thou hast covered all their sin." The bringing back of their captivity was then an instance of God's favour to them, when it was accompanied with the pardon of their iniquity. "Having covered all their sin, thou hast taken away all thy wrath"; for when sin is set aside God's anger ceases; God is pacified if we are purified.

II. They are taught to pray to God for grace and mercy, in reference to their present distress; this is inferred from the former: "Thou hast done well for our fathers; do well for us, for we are the children of the same covenant." 1. They pray for converting grace: "Turn us, O God of our salvation!" 2. They pray for the removal of the tokens of God's displeasure: "Cause thine anger towards us to cease." Observe the method, "First turn us to thee, and then cause thy anger to turn from us." 3. They pray for the manifestation of God's goodwill to them (v. 7): "Show us thy mercy, O Lord! let us know that thou hast mercy on us and mercy in store for us." 4. They pray that God would appear on their behalf: "Grant us thy salvation; grant it by thy promise, and then, no doubt, thou wilt work by it thy providence."

III. They are taught humbly to expostulate with God concerning their present troubles, v. 5, 6. "Wilt thou be angry with us for ever? Wilt thou draw out thy anger unto all generations? Thou wast not angry with our fathers for ever, but didst soon turn thyself from the fierceness of thy wrath; why then wilt thou be angry with us for ever? Wilt thou not revive us again (v. 6), revive us with deliverances wrought for us?" God had granted to the children of the captivity some reviving in their bondage, Ezra ix. 8. Their return out of Babylon was as life from the dead, Ezek. xxxvii. 11, 12. Now, Lord (say they), wilt thou not revive us again, and put thy hand again the second time to gather us in? Isa. xi. 11; Ps. cxxvi. 1, 4. Revive thy work in the midst of the years, Hab. iii. 2. "Revive us again." If God be the fountain of all our mercies, he must be the centre of all our joys.

We have here an answer to the prayers and expostulations.

I. In general, it is an answer of peace. The psalmist (v. 8), stands upon his watch-tower to hear what God will say unto him. "Compose thyself, O my soul! in a humble silence to attend upon God and wait his motions. I have spoken enough; now I will hear what God will speak, and welcome his holy will. What saith my Lord unto his servant?" He will speak peace to his people, and to his saints. Sooner or later, God will speak peace to them; if he do not command outward peace, yet he will suggest inward peace, speaking that to their hearts by his Spirit which he has spoken to their ears by his word and ministers and making them to hear joy and gladness. He takes the comfort of it; and so must we: "I will hear what God the Lord will speak, hear the assurances he gives of peace, in answer to prayer." But let them not turn again to folly; for it is on these terms, and no other, that peace is to be expected.

II. Here are the particulars of this answer of peace. He gives us the pleasing prospect of the flourishing estate of the church in the last five verses of the psalm, which describe the peace and prosperity God blessed the children of the captivity with, when at length they gained a settlement in their own land. But it may be taken both as a promise also to all who fear God and work righteousness, that they shall be easy and happy, and as a prophecy of the kingdom, of the Messiah and the blessings with which that kingdom should be enriched.

1. Help at hand (v. 9): "Surely his salvation is nigh." When the tale of bricks is doubled, then Moses comes. When trouble is nigh salvation is nigh, for God is a very present help in time of trouble to all who are his.

2. Honour secured: "That glory may dwell in our land, that we may have the worship of God settled and established among us; for that is the glory of a land. When that goes, Ichabod—the glory has departed; when that stays glory dwells."

3. Graces meeting, and happily embracing (v. 10, 11): Mercy and truth, righteousness and peace, kiss each other. This may be understood, (1) Of the reformation of the people and of the government. When in every congress mercy and truth meet, in every embrace righteousness and peace kiss, and common honesty is indeed common, then glory dwells in a land. (2) Of the return of God's favour. When a people return to God he will return to them and abide with them in a way of mercy. So some understand this, man's truth and God's mercy, man's righteousness and God's peace, meet together. If truth spring out of the earth, that is (as Dr. Hammond expounds it), out of the hearts of men, the proper soil for it to grow in, righteousness (that is, God's mercy) shall look down from heaven, as the sun does upon the world when it sheds its influences on the productions of the earth and cherishes them. (3) Of the harmony of the divine attributes in the Messiah's undertaking. Our salvation is so well contrived, so well concerted, that God may have mercy upon poor sinners, and be at peace with them, without any wrong to his truth and righteousness.

4. Great plenty of everything desirable (v. 12): The Lord shall give that which is good, everything that he sees to be good for us. When the glory of the gospel dwells in our land, then it shall yield its increase.

5. A sure guidance in the good way (v. 13): The righteousness of his promise assuring us of happiness, and the righteousness of sanctification, shall go before him to prepare his way; and these shall be our guide to set us in the way of his steps, that we may go forth to meet him when he is coming towards us in ways of mercy.

PSALM LXXXVI

This psalm is entitled "a prayer of David"; probably it was a prayer he often used himself, and recommended to others for their use, especially in a day of affliction. Dsvid, in this prayer, I. Gives glory to God, ver. 8–10, 12, 13. II. Seeks for grace that God would hear his prayers (ver. 1, 6, 7), preserve and save him, and be merciful to him (ver. 2, 3, 16), that he would give him joy, and grace, and strength, and put honour upon him, ver. 4, 11, 17. He pleads God's goodness (ver. 5, 15) and the malice of his enemies, ver. 14.

A prayer of David.

This psalm was published under the title of a prayer of David.

I. The petitions he puts up to God. Unto thee, O Lord! do I lift up my soul, as he had said xxv. 1. In all the parts of prayer the soul must ascend upon the wings of faith and holy desire. 1. He begs that God would give a gracious audience to his prayers (v. 1): Bow down thy ear, O Lord! hear me. When God hears our prayers it is fitly said that he bows down his ear to them, for it is admirable condescension in God that he is pleased to take notice of such mean creatures as we are and such defective prayers as ours are. 2. He begs that God would take him under his special protection (v. 2): Preserve my soul; save thy servant. "Preserve my soul from that one evil and dangerous thing to souls, even from sin; preserve my soul, and so save me." All those whom God will save he preserves, and will preserve them to his heavenly kingdom. 3. He begs that God would look upon him with an eye of pity and compassion (v. 3): Be merciful to me, O Lord! "Men show no mercy; we ourselves deserve no mercy; but, Lord, for mercy-sake, be merciful unto me." 4. He begs that God would fill him with inward comfort (v. 4): Rejoice the soul of thy servant. It is God only that can put gladness into the heart and make the soul to rejoice, and, as it is the duty of those who are God's servants to serve him with gladness, so it is their privilege to be filled with joy and peace in believing, and in faith to pray. Prayer is the nurse of spiritual joy.

II. The pleas with which he enforces these petitions. 1. He pleads his relation to God: "Thou art my God, to whom I have devoted myself, and on whom I depend, and I am thy servant (v. 2)." 2. He pleads his distress: "Hear me, for I am poor and needy." 3. He pleads God's goodwill towards all that seek him (v. 5): "To thee do I lift up my soul in desire and expectation; for thou, Lord, art good." 4. He pleads God's good work in himself, by which he had qualified him for the tokens of his favour. I am holy, therefore preserve my soul. He does not say this in pride and vain glory, but with humble thankfulness to God. I am one whom thou favourest (so the margin reads it), whom thou hast set apart for thyself. I am holy (v. 2), and yet needy, poor in the world, but rich in faith. I cry unto thee daily, and all the day, v. 3. It is comfortable if an affliction finds the wheels of prayer a-going, and that they are not then to be set a-going. "In the day of my trouble, whatever others do, I will call upon thee, and commit my case to thee, for thou wilt hear and answer me.

David is here going on in his prayer.

I. He gives glory to God. Among the gods, the false gods, whom the heathens worshipped, the angels, the kings of the earth, among them all, there is none like unto thee, O Lord! none so wise, so mighty, so good; neither are there any works like unto thy works, which is an undeniable proof that there is none like him. As the fountain of all being and the centre of all praise (v. 9): "Thou hast made all nations, made them all of one blood; they all derive their being from thee, and have a constant dependence on thee, and therefore they shall come and worship before thee and glorify thy name." This was to have its full accomplishment in the days of the Messiah. "Therefore all nations shall worship before thee, because as King of nations thou art great, thy sovereignty absolute, and, for the proof of this, thou doest wondrous things, thou art God alone, not only none like thee, but none besides thee." Man is bad, very wicked and vile (v. 14); no mercy is to be expected from him; but thou, O Lord! art a God full of compassion, and gracious, v. 15. Men are barbarous, but God is gracious; men are false, but God is faithful. God is not only compassionate, but full of compassion, and in him mercy rejoiceth against judgment. It is some satisfaction to a good man to think that others shall praise and glorify God, but it is his greatest care and pleasure to do it himself. "Whatever others do" (says David), "I will praise thee, O Lord my God! not only as the Lord, but as my God. I will do it as long as I live, and hope to be doing it to eternity." With good reason does he resolve to be thus praising God: For great is thy mercy towards me. Thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell.

II. He prays earnestly for mercy and grace from God. He complains of the restless and implacable malice of his enemies against him (v. 14): "They were proud men, violent men. They rise up against me in open rebellion; and the design is not only to depose me, but to destroy me. Lord, appear against them, for they are thy enemies as well as mine." His petitions are,

1. For the operations of God's grace in him, v. 11. "Teach my thy way, O Lord! the way that thou hast appointed me to walk in; when I am in doubt concerning it, make it plain to me what I should do; let me hear the voice saying, This is the way." Teach me thy way; I will walk in thy truth. One would think it should be, Teach me thy truth, and I will walk in thy way; but it comes all to one; it is the way of truth that God teaches and that we must choose and walk in, Ps. cxix. 30. Christ is the way and the truth, and we must both learn Christ and walk in him. "Unite my heart to fear thy name. Make me sincere in religion. A hypocrite has a double heart; let mine be single and entire for God, not divided between him and the world, not straggling from him."

2. For the tokens of God's favour to him, v. 16, 17. Three things he here prays for:—(1) That God would speak peace and comfort to him: "O turn unto me, as to one thou lovest." (2) That God would work deliverance for him, and set him in safety: "Give me thy strength; put strength into me, that I may help myself, and put forth thy strength for me, that I may be saved out of the hands of those that seek my ruin." (3) That God would put a reputation on him: "Show me a token for good. Let me have some instances of thy favour to me, that those who hate me may see it, and be ashamed of their enmity to me, as they will have reason to be when they perceive that thou, Lord, hast helped me and comforted me."

PSALM LXXXVII

The foregoing psalm was very plain, but in this are things dark and hard to be understood. It is an encomium of Zion, as a type and figure of the gospel-church. Zion, for the temple's sake, is here preferred, I. Before the rest of the land of Canaan, as being crowned with special tokens of God's favour, ver. 1–3. II. Before any other place or country whatsoever, as being replenished with more eminent men and with a greater plenty of divine blessings, ver. 4–7. Some think it was penned to express the joy of God's people when Zion was in a flourishing state; others think it was penned to encourage their faith and hope when Zion was in ruins and was to be rebuilt after the captivity.

A psalm or song for the sons of Korah.

Some make the first words of the psalm to be part of the title; it is a psalm or song whose subject is the holy mountains—the temple built in Zion upon Mount Moriah. Three things are here observed, in praise of the temple:—1. That it was founded on the holy mountains, v. 1. It is built high; the mountain of the Lord's house is established upon the top of the mountains, Isa. ii. 2. It is built firmly upon the everlasting mountains and the perpetual hills; for sooner shall the mountains depart, and the hills be removed, than the covenant of God's peace shall be disannulled, and on that the church is built, Isa. liv. 10. Holiness is the strength and stability of the church: it is this that will support it and keep it from sinking; not so much that it is built upon mountains as that it is built upon holy mountains—upon the promise of God. 2. That God had expressed a particular affection for it (v. 2): The Lord loveth the gates of Zion, of the temple, of the houses of doctrine (so the Chaldee), more than all the dwellings of Jacob, whether in Jerusalem or anywhere else in the country. 3. That there was much said concerning it in the word of God (v. 3): Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God! God said of the temple, My eyes and my heart shall be there perpetually; I have sanctified this house, that my name may be there for ever, 2 Chron. vii. 16. Yet more glorious things are spoken of the gospel-church. It is the spouse of Christ, the purchase of his blood; it is a peculiar people, a holy nation, a royal priesthood, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

Verses 4–7

Zion is here compared with other places, and preferred before them; the church of Christ is more glorious and excellent than the nations of the earth. 1. It is owned that other places have their glories (v. 4): "I will make mention of Rahab" (that is, Egypt) "and Babylon, to those that know me; behold Philistia and Tyre, with Ethiopia, we will observe that this man was born there; here and there one famous man, eminent for knowledge and virtue, may be produced, that was a native of these countries; here and there one that becomes a proselyte and a worshipper of the true God." But some give another sense of it, supposing that it is a prophecy. God says, "I will reckon Egypt and Babylon with those that know me. I will reckon them my people as much as Israel when they shall receive the gospel of Christ, and own them as born in Zion, born again there, and admitted to the privileges of Zion as freely as a true-born Israelite." Those that were strangers and foreigners became fellow-citizens with the saints, Eph. ii. 19. 2. It is proved that the glory of Zion outshines them all, upon many accounts; for, (1) Zion shall produce many great and good men, many prophets and kings, who should be greater favourites of heaven and greater blessings to the earth, than ever were bred in Egypt or Babylon. A man, a man was born in her, by which some understand Christ, born at Bethlehem near Zion. The greatest honour that ever was put upon the Jewish nation was, that of them, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, Rom. xi. 5. (2) Zion's interest shall be strengthened and settled by an almighty power. The Highest himself shall undertake to establish her upon an everlasting foundation, whatever convulsions and revolutions there are of states and kingdoms, and however heaven and earth may be shaken, these are things which cannot be shaken, but must remain. (3) Zion's sons shall be registered with honour (v. 6): The Lord shall count, when he writes up the people, and takes a catalogue of his subjects, that this man was born there, and so is a subject by birth, by the first birth, being born in his house—by the second birth, being born again of his Spirit. (4) Zion's songs shall be sung with joy and triumph: As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be there to praise God, v. 7. It was much to the honour of Zion, and is to the honour of the gospel-church, that there God is served and worshipped with rejoicing: his work is done, and done cheerfully; see lxviii. 25. All my springs are in thee, O Zion!

PSALM LXXXVIII

This psalm is a lamentation and it does not conclude, as usually the melancholy psalms do, with the least intimation of comfort or joy, but, from first to last, it is mourning and woe. It is upon a personal account, especially trouble of mind. It is reckoned among the penitential psalms. I. The great pressure of spirit that the psalmist was under, ver. 3–6. II. The wrath of God, which was the cause of that pressure, ver. 7, 15–17. III. The wickedness of his friends, ver. 8, 18. IV. The application he made to God by prayer, ver. 1, 2, 9, 12. V. His humble expostulations and pleadings with God, ver. 10, 12, 14.

A song or psalm for the sons of Korah, to the chief musician upon Mahalath Leannoth, Maschil of Heman the Ezrahite.

Verses 1–9

The very first words are the only words of comfort in all the psalm. But, before he begins his complaint, the psalmist calls God the God of his salvation, which intimates that, bad as things were, he looked up to God for salvation and depended upon him to be the author of it.

I. A man of prayer. It is his comfort that he had prayed; it is his complaint that, notwithstanding his prayer, he was still in affliction. "I have cried unto thee (v. 1), and have stretched out my hands unto thee (v. 9), as one that would take hold on thee, and even catch at the mercy, with a holy fear of coming short and missing of it." He was very frequent and constant in prayer: I have called upon thee daily (v. 9), nay, day and night, v. 1. He directed his prayer to God, and from him expected and desired an answer (v. 2): "Let my prayer come before thee, to be accepted of thee."

II. He was a man of sorrows, and therefore some make him, in this psalm, a type of Christ. He cries out (v. 3): My soul is full of troubles; so Christ said, Now is my soul troubled; and, in his agony, My soul is exceedingly sorrowful even unto death, like the psalmist's here, for he says, My life draws nigh unto the grave.

III. He looked upon himself as a dying man, whose heart was ready to break with sorrow (v. 5): Free among the dead like the slain that lie in the grave, whom thou rememberest no more, to protect or provide for the dead bodies. "Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit, as low as possible, my condition low, my spirits low, in darkness, in the deep (v. 6)." Thus greatly may good men be afflicted through the power of melancholy and the weakness of faith.

IV. He complained most of God's displeasure against him (v. 7): Thy wrath lies hard upon me. Could he have discerned the favour and love of God in his affliction, it would have lain light upon him; but it lay hard, very hard, upon him, so that he was ready to sink and faint under it.

V. It added to his affliction that his friends deserted him. When we are in trouble it is some comfort to have those about us that love us, and sympathize with us; but this good man had none such (v. 8): Thou hast put away my acquaintance far from me. "Thou hast made me an abomination to them; they are not only shy of me, but sick of me, and I am looked upon by them, not only with contempt, but with abhorrence."

VI. He looked upon his case as helpless and deplorable: "I am shut up, and I cannot come forth, a prisoner, and no way open of escape." Thus he bemoans himself (v. 9): My eye mourneth by reason of affliction. Yet weeping must not hinder praying; we must sow in tears: My eye mourns, but I cry unto thee daily.

Verses 10–18

I. The psalmist expostulates with God concerning the present deplorable condition he was in (v. 10–12): "Wilt thou do a miraculous work to the dead, and raise them to life again? Shall those that are dead and buried rise up to praise thee? Departed souls may indeed know God's wonders and declare his faithfulness, justice, and lovingkindness; but deceased bodies cannot; they can neither receive God's favours in comfort nor return them in praise." But he thus pleads with God for speedy relief: "Lord, thou art good, thou art faithful, thou art righteous; these attributes of thine will be made known in my deliverance, but, if it be not hastened, it will come too late."

II. He resolves to continue instant in prayer, because the deliverance was deferred (v. 13): "Unto thee have I cried many a time, and found comfort in so doing, and therefore I will continue to do so; in the morning shall my prayer prevent thee." How could he say, My prayer shall prevent thee? It intimates that he would be up earlier than ordinary to pray, would prevent (that is, go before) his usual hour of prayer. "My prayer shall not stay for the encouragement of the beginning of mercy, but reach towards it with faith and expectation even before the day dawns."

III. He sets down what he will say to God in prayer. He will humbly reason (v. 14): "Lord, why castest thou off my soul? What is it that provokes thee to treat me as one abandoned? Show me wherefore thou contendest with me." Nothing grieves a child of God so much as God's hiding his face from him, nor is there anything he so much dreads as God's casting off his soul. If the sun be clouded, that darkens the earth; but if the sun should abandon the earth, and quite cast it off, what a dungeon would it be! I suffer thy terrors, v. 15. The psalmist here explains himself, and tells us what he means by God's terrors, even his fierce wrath. "I am so afflicted with them that I am ready to die, and" (as the word is) "to give up the ghost. Thy terrors have cut me off," v. 16. They had almost taken away the use of his reason: When I suffer thy terrors I am distracted. This had continued long: From my youth up I suffer thy terrors. He had been from his childhood afflicted with melancholy. Sometimes those whom God designs for eminent services are prepared for them by exercises of this kind. No friend was a comfort to him (v. 18): Lover and friend hast thou put far from me. Next to the comforts of religion are those of friendship and society; therefore to be friendless is (as to this life) almost to be comfortless.

PSALM LXXXIX

Many psalms that begin with complaint and prayer end with joy and praise, but this begins with joy and praise and ends with sad complaints and petitions. It is uncertain when it was penned; only, in general, that it was at a time when the house of David was woefully eclipsed. I. The psalmist, in the joyful pleasant part of the psalm, gives glory to God, mentioning God's mercy and truth (ver. 1) and his covenant (ver. 2–4), but more largely in the following verses, wherein, 1. He adores the glory and perfection of God, ver. 5–14. 2. He pleases himself in the happiness of those that are admitted into communion with him, ver. 15–18. 3. He builds all his hope upon God's covenant with David, as a type of Christ, ver. 19–37. II. In the melancholy part of the psalm he laments the present calamitous state of the prince and royal family (ver. 38–45), expostulates with God upon it (ver. 46–49), and then concludes with prayer for redress, ver. 50, 51.

Maschil of Ethan the Ezrahite.

The psalmist has a very sad complaint to make of the deplorable condition of the family of David at this time, and yet he begins the psalm with songs of praise. Let our complaints be turned into thanksgivings. 1. However it be, the everlasting God is good and true, v. 1. God's mercies are inexhaustible and his truth is inviolable; and these must be the matter of our joy and praise: "I will sing of the mercies of the Lord for ever, sing a praising song to God's honour, a pleasant song for my own solace, an instructive song, for the edification of others." 2. However it be, the everlasting covenant is firm and sure, v. 2–4. "Things now look black, and threaten the utter extirpation of the house of David; but I have said, and I have warrant from the word of God to say it, that mercy shall be built up for ever." If mercy shall be built for ever, then the tabernacle of David, which has fallen down, shall be raised out of its ruins, and built up as in the days of old, Amos ix. 11. An abstract of the covenant upon which this faith and hope are built: I have said it, says the psalmist, for God hath sworn it. He brings in God speaking (v. 3), owning, to the comfort of his people, "I have made a covenant, and therefore will make it good." The covenant is made with David, representing the covenant of grace made with Christ as head of the church and with all believers as his spiritual seed. It was promised that his family should continue—Thy seed will I establish for ever. I will build up thy throne to all generations. This has its accomplishment only in Christ, of the seed of David, who lives for ever.

These verses are full of the praises of God.

I. Where, and by whom, God is to be praised. The heavens shall praise thy wonders, O Lord! v. 5. The works of God are wonders even to those that are best acquainted and most intimately conversant with them; the more God's works are known the more they are admired and praised. God is praised by the assemblies of his saints on earth. "Thy faithfulness and the truth of thy promise, that rock on which the church is built, shall be praised in the congregation of the saints, who owe their all to that faithfulness, and whose constant comfort it is that there is a promise, and that he is faithful who has promised." In religious assemblies God has promised the presence of his grace, but we must also, in them, have an eye to his glorious presence, that the familiarity we are admitted to may not breed the least contempt. A holy awe of God must fall upon us, and fill us, in all our approaches to God, even in secret.

II. What it is to praise God; it is to acknowledge that there is none like him, v. 6. To whom will you liken me, or shall I be equal? saith the Holy One, Isa. xl. 25. This is insisted on again (v. 8): Who is a strong Lord like unto thee? Among men it is too often found that those who are most able to break their word are least careful to keep it; but God is both strong and faithful; he can do everything, and yet will never do an unjust thing.

III. What we ought, in our praises, to give God the glory of. 1. The command God has of the most ungovernable creatures (v. 9) Thou rulest the raging of the sea. This coming in here as an act of omnipotence, what manner of man then was the Lord Jesus, whom the winds and seas obeyed? 2. The victories God has obtained over the enemies of his church. Thou hast broken Rahab, many a proud enemy (so it signifies), Egypt in particular, which is sometimes called Rahab, broken it in pieces, as one that is slain and utterly unable to make head again. The remembrance of the breaking of Egypt in pieces is a comfort to the church, in reference to the present power of Babylon; for God is still the same. 3. The incontestable property he has (v. 11, 12): "Men are honoured for their large possessions; but the heavens are thine, O Lord! the earth also is thine. The world and the fulness thereof, all the riches contained in it, all the inhabitants of it, both the tenements and the tenants, are all thine; for thou hast founded them," He specifies (1) The remotest parts of the world: "Thou hast created them, and therefore knowest them, takest care of them, and hast tributes of praise from them." The north is said to be hung over the empty place; yet what fulness there is there God is the owner of it. (2) The highest parts of the world. He mentions the two highest hills in Canaan—"Tabor and Hermon, these shall rejoice in thy name, and they produce offerings for thy altar." Tabor is commonly supposed to be that high mountain in Galilee on the top of which Christ was transfigured. 4. The power and justice, the mercy and truth, with which he governs the world and rules in the affairs of the children of men, v. 13, 14. God is able to do everything; for he is the Lord God Almighty. He never did, nor ever will do, anything that is either unjust or unwise; for righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne. He always does that which is kind to his people and consonant to the word which he has spoken: "Mercy and truth shall go before thy face, truth in being as good as thy word, mercy in being better."

Verses 15–18

The psalmist, having largely shown the blessedness of the God of Israel, here shows the blessedness of the Israel of God. As there is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, so, happy art thou, O Israel! there is none like unto thee, O people! especially as a type of the gospel-Israel, consisting of all true believers, whose happiness is here described.

I. Glorious discoveries are made to them, and glad tidings of good brought to them; they hear, they know the joyful sound, v. 15. This may allude 1. To the shout of a victorious army. Israel have the tokens of God's presence with them in their wars. Or, 2. To the sound that was made over the sacrifices and on the solemn feastdays, lxxxi. 1–3. This was the happiness of Israel, that they had among them the free and open profession of God's holy religion. Or, 3. To the sound of the jubilee-trumpet; a joyful sound it was to servants and debtors, to whom it proclaimed release. The gospel is indeed a joyful sound, a sound of victory, of liberty, of communion with God; blessed are the people that hear it, and know it, and bid it welcome.

II. Special tokens of God's favour are granted them: "They shall walk, O Lord! in the light of thy countenance; they shall govern themselves by thy directions, shall be guided by thy eye; and they shall delight themselves in thy consolations."

III. They never want matter for joy. Those that rejoice in Christ Jesus have enough to counterbalance their grievances and silence their griefs; and therefore their joy is full (1 John i. 4).

IV. Their relation to God is their honour and dignity. "In thy righteousness shall they be exalted, and not in any righteousness of their own. In thy favour, which through Christ we hope for, our horn shall be exalted. The horn denotes beauty, plenty, and power."

V. Their relation to God is their protection and safety (v. 18): "For our shield is of the Lord" (so the margin), "and our king is from the Holy One of Israel. If God be our ruler, he will be our defender; and who is he then that can harm us?"

The covenant God made with David and his seed was mentioned before (v. 3, 4); but in these verses it is enlarged upon. Certainly it looks at Christ, and has its accomplishment in him much more than in David. The comforts of our redemption flow from the covenant of redemption; all our springs are in that, Isa. lv. 3. I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David, Acts xiii. 34.

I. What assurance we have of the truth of the promise, which may encourage us to build upon it. Thou didst speak in vision to thy Holy One. God's promise to David, which is especially referred to here, was spoken in vision to Nathan the prophet, 2 Sam. vii. 12–17. Then, when the Holy One of Israel was their king (v. 18), he appointed David to be his viceroy. How it was sworn to and ratified (v. 35): Once have I sworn by my holiness. His swearing once is enough; he needs not swear again, as David did (1 Sam. xx. 17); for his word and oath are two immutable things.

II. The choice made of the person to whom the promise is given, v. 19, 20. David was a king of God's own choosing, so is Christ, and therefore both are called God's kings, Ps. ii. 6. David was mighty, a man chosen out of the people. God exalted him, and ordered Samuel to anoint him. But this is to be applied to Christ. 1. He is mighty, able to save to the uttermost, for he is the Son of God—mighty in love. 2. He is chosen out of the people, one of us, bone of our bone, that takes part with us of flesh and blood. 3. God has found him. He is a Saviour of God's own providing. 4. God has laid help upon him. He has exalted him, by constituting him the prophet, priest, and king of his church, clothing him with power, raising him from the dead, and setting him at his own right hand. He is called Messiah, or Christ, the Anointed.

III. The promises made to this chosen one, to David in the type and the Son of David in the antitype.

1. With reference to himself, as king and God's servant, it is here promised, (1) That God would stand by him and strengthen him in his undertaking (v. 21): "With him my hand not only shall be, but shall be established, by promise. My arm also shall strengthen him to break through and bear up under all his difficulties." (2) That he should be victorious over his enemies, that they should not encroach upon him (v. 22): The son of wickedness shall not exact upon him, nor afflict him. Christ became a surety for our debt, and thereby Satan and death thought to gain advantage against him; but he satisfied the demands of God's justice, and then they could not exact upon him. The prince of this world cometh, but he has nothing in me, John xiv. 30. I will beat down his foes before his face; the prince of this world shall be cast out, principalities and powers spoiled, and he shall be the death of death itself, and the destruction of the grave, Hos. xiii. 14. (3) My faithfulness and my mercy shall be with him. They were with David; God continued merciful to him, and so approved himself faithful. They were with Christ; God made good all his promises to him. But that is not all; God's mercy to us, and his faithfulness to us, are with Christ: and it is in him that all the promises of God are yea and amen. So that if any poor sinners hope for benefit by the faithfulness and mercy of God, let them know it is with Christ, and to him they must apply for it (v. 28): My mercy will I keep for him, for evermore; in the channel of Christ's mediation all the streams of divine goodness will for ever run. And, as the mercy of God flows to us through him, so the promise of God is, through him, firm to us: My covenant shall stand fast with him, both the covenant of redemption made with him and the covenant of grace made with us in him. (4) That his kingdom should be greatly enlarged (v. 25): I will set his hand in the sea (he shall have the dominion of the seas, and the isles of the sea), and his right hand in the rivers, the inland countries that are watered with rivers. David's kingdom extended itself to the Great Sea, and the Red Sea, to the river of Egypt and the river Euphrates. But it is in the kingdom of the Messiah that this has its full accomplishment, and shall have more and more, when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ (Rev. xi. 15). (5) That he should own God as his Father, and God would own him as his Son, his firstborn, v. 26, 27. This is a comment upon these words in Nathan's message concerning Solomon (for he also was a type of Christ as well as David), I will be his Father and he shall be my Son (2 Sam. vii. 14), and the relation shall be owned on both sides. He shall cry unto me, Thou art my Father. Christ did so, in the days of his flesh, when he offered up strong cries to God, and taught us to address ourselves to him as our Father in heaven. I will make him my firstborn. It is Christ's prerogative to be the firstborn of every creature, and, as such, the heir of all things, Col. i. 15; Heb. i, 2, 6.

2. With reference to his seed. God's covenants always took in the seed of the covenanters (v. 29, 36): His seed shall endure for ever, and with it his throne. Now this will be differently understood according as we apply it to Christ or David.

(1) If we apply it to David, by his seed we are to understand his successors, Solomon and the following kings of Judah. It is supposed that they might degenerate; in such a case they must expect to come under divine rebukes. But though they were corrected, they should not be disinherited. This refers to that part of Nathan's message (2 Sam. vii. 14, 15), If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him, but my mercy shall not depart from him. Thus far David's seed and throne did endure. The family of David continued a family of distinction till that Son of David came whose throne should endure for ever; see Luke i. 27, 32; ii. 4, 11.

(2) If we apply it to Christ, by his seed we are to understand his subjects, all believers, his spiritual seed, the children which God has given him, Heb. ii. 13. This is that seed which shall be made to endure for ever, and his throne in the midst of them, in the church in the heart, as the days of heaven. To the end Christ shall have a people in the world to serve and honour him. He shall see his seed; he shall prolong his days. Thus Christ's throne and kingdom shall be perpetuated: the kingdom of his grace shall continue through all the ages of time and the kingdom of his glory to the endless ages of eternity. It is here supposed that there will be much amiss in the subjects of Christ's kingdom. His children may forsake God's law (v. 30) by omissions, and break his statutes (v. 31) by commissions. Many corruptions there are in the church, as well as in the hearts of those who are the members of it. They are here told that they must smart for it (v. 32): I will visit their transgressions with a rod. Their being related to Christ shall not excuse them from being called to an account. But observe what affliction is to God's people. 1. It is but a rod, not an axe, not a sword; it is for correction, not for destruction. 2. It is a rod in the hand of God (I will visit them). If they break my law, then I will visit their transgression with the rod, but not else. The continuance of Christ's kingdom is made certain by the inviolable promise and oath of God, notwithstanding all this (v. 23): Nevertheless, my kindness will I not totally and finally take from him. Afflictions are not only consistent with covenant-love, but to the people of God they flow from it. For Christ's sake, in him the mercy is laid up for us, and God says, I will not take it from him (v. 33), I will not lie unto David, v. 35. My faithfulness shall not fail, my covenant will I not break. That which is said and sworn is that God will have a church in the world as long as sun and moon endure, v. 36, 37. The seed of Christ shall be established for ever, as lights of the world while the world stands, to shine in it, and, when it is at an end, they shall be established lights shining in the firmament of the Father.

I. A very melancholy complaint of the present deplorable state of David's family, which the psalmist thinks hard to be reconciled to the covenant God made with David. "Thou saidst thou wouldst not take away thy lovingkindness, but thou hast cast off." Sometimes, it is no easy thing to reconcile God's providences with his promises, and yet God's works fulfil his word and never contradict it. 1. David's house seemed to have lost its interest in God. God had been pleased with his anointed, but now he was wroth with him (v. 38). 2. The honour of the house of David was lost and laid in the dust: Thou hast profaned his crown (which was always looked upon as sacred) by casting it to the ground, to be trampled on, v. 39. 3. It was exposed and made a prey to all the neighbours (v. 40): Thou hast broken down all his hedges (all those things that were a defence to them, and particularly that hedge of protection which they thought God's covenant and promise had made about them) and thou hast made even his strongholds a ruin. He is a reproach to his neighbours, who triumph in his fall from so great a degree of honour. Everyone helps forward the calamity (v. 42): "Thou hast set up the right hand of his adversaries, not only given them power, but inclined them to turn their power this way." 4. It was disabled to help itself (v. 43): "Thou hast turned the edge of his sword, and made it blunt, that it cannot do execution as it has done; and (which is worse) thou hast turned the edge of his spirit, and taken off his courage, and hast not made him to stand as he used to do in the battle." 5. It was upon the brink of an inglorious exit (v. 45): The days of his youth hast thou shortened. This seems to intimate that the psalm was penned in Rehoboam's time, when the house of David was but in the days of its youth, and yet waxed old and began to decay already. When posterity degenerates, it falls into disgrace, and iniquity stains their glory. How apt we are to place the happiness of the church in something external, and to think the promise fails. Our Master has so expressly told us that his kingdom is not of this world.

II. A very pathetic expostulation with God upon this. How long, O Lord! wilt thou hide thyself? For ever? That which grieved them most was that God himself had kept them long in the dark. It seemed an eternal night, when God had withdrawn: Thou hidest thyself for ever. He pleads the shortness and vanity of life (v. 47): Remember how short my time is, how transitory I am (say some), therefore unable to bear the power of thy wrath, and therefore a proper object of thy pity. Wherefore hast thou made all men in vain? or, Unto what vanity hast thou created all the sons of Adam! If the ancient loving-kindnesses spoken of (v. 49) be forgotten (those relating to another life), man is indeed made in vain. Considering man as mortal, if there were not a future state on the other side of death, we might be ready to think that man was made in vain. If we think that God has made men in vain because so many have short lives, it is true that God has made them so, but it is not true that therefore they are made in vain. For those whose days are few may yet glorify God and do some good, may keep their communion with God and get to heaven. If we think that God has made men in vain because most men neither serve him nor enjoy him, it is true that, as to themselves, they were made in vain, but it was not owing to God that they were made in vain; it was owing to themselves. He pleads the universality of death (v. 48): "What man" (what strong man, so the word is), "is he that liveth and shall not see death? The king himself is not exempted. Lord, since he is under a fatal necessity of dying, let not his whole life be made miserable. Let him not therefore be delivered into the hand of the grave by the miseries of a dying life, till his time shall come." It concerns us therefore to make sure of happiness on the other side of death, that, when we fail, we may be received into everlasting habitations. The next plea is taken from the kindness God had for his servant David (v. 49): Lord, where are thy former lovingkindnesses, which thou showedst, nay, which thou swaredst, to David in thy truth? Wilt thou fail of doing what thou hast promised? God's unchangeableness and faithfulness assure us that God will not cast off those whom he has chosen and covenanted with. The last plea is taken from the indignity done to God's anointed (v. 50, 51). "They are thy enemies who do thus reproach us; and wilt thou not appear against them as such? They have reproached the footsteps of thy anointed." They reflected upon all the steps which the king had taken in the course of his administration, tracked him in all his motions. Or, if we apply it to Christ, the Lord's Messiah, they reproached the Jews with the slowness of his coming. They called him, He that should come; but, because he had not yet come, they told them he would never come, they must give over looking for him.

III. The psalm concludes with praise, even after this sad complaint (v. 52): Blessed be the Lord for evermore, Amen, and amen. Thus he confronts the reproaches of his enemies. The more others blaspheme God the more we should bless him. Thus he corrects his own complaints. He began the psalm with thanksgiving, before he made his complaint (v. 1); and now he concludes it with a doxology.

PSALM XC

This psalm was penned by Moses (as appears by the title), the most ancient penman of sacred writ. We have upon record a praising song of his (Exod. xv, which is alluded to in Rev. xv. 3), and an instructing song of his, Deut. xxxii. But this is called a prayer. It is supposed that this psalm was penned upon occasion of the sentence passed upon Israel, in the wilderness for their unbelief, murmuring, and rebellion, that their carcases should fall in the wilderness, that they should be wasted away by a series of miseries for thirty-eight years together, and that none of them that were then of age should enter Canaan. We have the story to which this psalm seems to refer, Num. xiv. Probably Moses penned this prayer to be daily used by the people in their tents, or by the priests in the tabernacle-service in the wilderness. In it, I. Moses comforts himself and his people with the eternity of God and their interest in him, ver. 1, 2. II. He humbles himself and his people with the consideration of the frailty of man, ver. 3–6. III. He submits himself and his people to the righteous sentence of God passed upon them, ver. 7–11. IV. He commits himself and his people to God, by prayer for divine mercy and grace, and the return of God's favour, ver. 12–17. It is very applicable to the frailty of human life in general, and, in singing it, we may apply it to the years of our passage through the wilderness of this world, and it furnishes us with meditations and prayers very suitable to the solemnity of a funeral.

A prayer of Moses the man of God.

This psalm is entitled a prayer of Moses. Moses taught the people of Israel to pray, and put words into their mouths which they might make use of in turning to the Lord. In these verses we are taught,

I. To give God the praise of his care concerning his people at all times (v. 1): Lord, thou hast been to us a habitation, or dwelling-place, a refuge or help, in all generations. They plead his former kindnesses to their ancestors. Canaan was a land of pilgrimage to their fathers the patriarchs, who dwelt there in tabernacles; but then God was their habitation, and, wherever they went, they were at home, at rest, in him. Egypt had been a land of bondage for many years, but even then God was their refuge.

II. To give God the glory of his eternity (v. 2): Before the mountains were brought forth, before he made the highest part of the dust of the world (as it is expressed, Prov. viii. 26), before the earth fell in travail, or, as we may read it, before thou hadst formed the earth and the world (that is, before the beginning of time) thou hadst a being; even from everlasting to everlasting thou art God. Again at all the grievances that arise from our own mortality, we may take comfort from God's immortality.

III. To own God's absolute sovereign dominion over man, and his power to dispose of him as he pleases (v. 3): Thou turnest man to destruction, to the destruction of the body, of the earthly house; and thou sayest, Return, you children of men. He does thereby call men to repent of their sins and live a new life. Sometimes he wonderfully restores them, and says, as the old translation reads it, Again thou sayest, Return to life and health again. Though God turns all men to destruction, yet he will again say, Return, you children of men, at the general resurrection, when, though a man dies, yet he shall live again.

IV. To acknowledge the infinite disproportion there is between God and men, v. 4. "A thousand years, to us, are a long period, which we cannot expect to survive; but it is, in thy sight, as yesterday, as one day; nay, it is but as a watch of the night," which was but three hours. Betwixt a minute and a million of years there is some proportion, but betwixt time and eternity there is none. But it might be objected against the doctrine of the resurrection that it is a long time since it was expected and it has not yet come. Let that be no difficulty, for a thousand years, in God's sight, are but as one day.

V. To see the frailty of man, and his vanity even at his best estate (v. 5, 6); look upon all the children of men, and we shall see their life is a dying life: Thou carriest them away as with a flood. As soon as we are born we begin to die, and every day of our life carries us so much nearer death. Men are carried away as with a flood and yet they are as a sleep. They consider not their own frailty. Like men asleep, they imagine great things to themselves, till death wakes them. Time passes unobserved by us, as it does with men asleep. It is a short and transient life, like that of the grass which grows up and flourishes, in the morning looks green and pleasant, but in the evening the mower cuts it down, and it withers and loses all its beauty. Death will change us shortly, perhaps suddenly; and it is a great change that death will make with us in a little time. Man, in his prime, does but flourish as the grass.

Moses had, in the foregoing verses, lamented the frailty of human life in general. But here he teaches the people of Israel to confess before God that righteous sentence of death which by their sins they had brought upon themselves.

I. They are here taught to acknowledge the wrath of God to be the cause of all their miseries. We are consumed, we are troubled, and it is by thy anger, by thy wrath (v. 7); our days have passed away in thy wrath, v. 9. We are too apt to look upon death as no more than a debt owing to nature; whereas it is not so; if the nature of man had continued in its primitive purity, there would have been no such debt owing to it. It is a debt to the justice of God, a debt to the law. Sin entered into the world, and death by sin.

II. They are taught to confess their sins (v. 8): Thou hast set our iniquities before thee, even our secret sins. God had herein an eye to their unbelief and murmuring, their distrusting his power and their despising the pleasant land. "Thou hast set our secret sins (those which go no further than the heart, and which are at the bottom of all the overt acts) in the light of thy countenance; that is, thou hast discovered these, and brought these also to the account, and made us to see them, who before overlooked them."

III. They are taught to look upon themselves as dying and passing away, and not to think either of a long life or of a pleasant one (v. 9). Though we are not quite deprived of the residue of our years, yet we are likely to spend them as a tale that is told. The thirty-eight years they wore away in the wilderness, for little or nothing is recorded of that which happened to them from the second years to the fortieth. Their joyful prospect of a prosperous glorious life in Canaan was turned into the melancholy prospect of a tedious death in the wilderness. That is applicable to the state of every one of us in the wilderness of this world: We spend our years, we bring them to an end, each year, and all at last, as a tale that is told. Some of our years are as a pleasant story, others as a tragical one, most mixed, but all short and transient: that which was long in the doing may be told in a short time. Every year passed as a tale that is told; but what was the number of them? As they were vain, so they were few (v. 10), seventy or eighty at most, which may be understood either 1. Of the lives of the Israelites in the wilderness; all those that were numbered when they came out of Egypt, above twenty years old, were to die within thirty-eight years; they numbered those only that were able to go forth to war, most of whom, we may suppose, were between twenty and forty, who therefore must have all died before eighty years old, and many before sixty. See what work sin made. Or, 2. Of the lives of men in general, ever since the days of Moses. It may be taken thus: Our years are seventy, and the years of some, by reason of strength, are eighty; but the breadth of our years (for so the latter word signifies, rather than strength), the whole extent of them, from infancy to old age, is but labour and sorrow. In the sweat of our face we must eat bread.

IV. They are taught by all this to stand in awe of the wrath of God (v. 11): Who knows the power of thy anger? The psalmist speaks as one afraid of God's anger, and amazed at the greatness of the power of it. Who knows it, so as to improve the knowledge of it? Those who make a mock at sin, and make light of Christ, surely do not know the power of God's anger.

These are the petitions of this prayer, grounded upon the foregoing meditations and acknowledgments. Four things they are here directed to pray for:—

I. For a sanctified use of the sad dispensation they were now under. "Lord, teach us to number our days (v. 12); Lord, give us grace duly to consider how few they are, and how little a while we have to live in this world." We must so number our days as to compare our work with them, and mind it accordingly with a double diligence, as those that have no time to trifle. Those that would learn this arithmetic must pray for divine instruction.

II. For the turning away of God's anger from them, "Yet return, O Lord! be thou reconciled to us, and let it repent thee concerning thy servants (v. 13); send us tidings of peace to comfort us again after these heavy tidings. We are thy servants, thy people (Isa. lxiv. 9); when wilt thou change thy way towards us?" In answer to this prayer, and upon their profession of repentance (Num. xiv. 39, 40), God, in the next chapter, proceeded with the laws concerning sacrifices (Num. xv. 1, &c.), which was a token that it repented him concerning his servants; for, if the Lord had been pleased to kill them, he would not have shown them such things as these.

III. For comfort and joy in the returns of God's favour to them, v. 14, 15. They pray for the mercy of God; for they pretend not to plead any merit of their own. Have mercy upon us, O God! Early in the morning of our days, when we are young and flourishing, v. 6. "O satisfy us with thy mercy, not only that we may be easy and at rest within ourselves, which we can never be while we lie under thy wrath, but that we may rejoice and be glad, not only for a time, upon the first indications of thy favour, but all our days, though we are to spend them in the wilderness. Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us; let the days of our joy in thy favour be as many as the days of our pain for thy displeasure have been and as pleasant as those have been gloomy. Now put into our hands the cup of salvation."

IV. For the progress of the work of God among them notwithstanding, v. 16, 17. "Let thy work appear upon thy servants; let it appear that thou hast wrought upon us, to bring us home to thyself and to fit us for thyself. Let thy work appear, and in it thy glory will appear to us and those that shall come after us." Perhaps, in this prayer, they distinguish between themselves and their children, for so God distinguished in his late message to them (Num. xiv. 31, Your carcases shall fall in this wilderness, but your little ones will I bring into Canaan): "Lord," say they, "let thy work appear upon us, to reform us, and bring us to a better temper, and then let thy glory appear to our children, in performing the promise to them which we have forfeited." Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us; let it appear that God favours us. Let the grace of God in us, and the light of our good works, make our faces to shine, and let divine consolations put gladness into our hearts, and a lustre upon our countenances, and that also will be the beauty of the Lord upon us. Establish thou the work of our hands upon us. God's working upon us (v. 16) does not discharge us from using our utmost endeavours in serving him and working out our salvation. But, when we have done all, we must wait upon God for the success.

PSALM XCI

It is probable that this psalm was penned by David; it is a writ of protection for all true believers, not in the name of king David, but in the name of the King of kings, and under the broad seal of Heaven. I. The psalmist's own resolution to take God for his keeper (ver. 1), from which he gives both direction and encouragement to others, ver. 9. II. The promises which are here made, in God's name, to all those that do so in sincerity. 1. They shall be taken under the peculiar care of Heaven, ver 1, 4. 2. They shall be delivered from the malice of the powers of darkness (ver. 3, 5, 6), and that by a distinguishing preservation, ver. 7, 8. 3. They shall be the charge of the holy angels, ver. 10–12. 4. They shall triumph over their enemies, ver. 13. 5. They shall be the special favourites of God himself, ver. 14–15.

Verses 1–8

I. A great truth laid down in general, That all those who live a life of communion with God are constantly safe under his protection, and may therefore preserve a holy serenity of mind at all times (v. 1). It is the character of a true believer that he dwells in the secret place of the Most High; he is at home in God, returns to God, and reposes in him as his rest; he acquaints himself with inward religion, and makes heart-work of the service of God, worships within the veil. It is the privilege and comfort of those that do so that they abide under the shadow of the Almighty; he shelters them. They shall have a residence, under God's protection.

II. The psalmist's comfortable application of this to himself (v. 2): I will say of the Lord, whatever others say of him, He is my refuge. Idolaters called their idols Mahuzzim, their most stronghold (Dan. xi. 39), but therein they deceived themselves; those only secure themselves that make the Lord their God, their fortress. There being no reason to question his sufficiency, fitly does it follow, In him will I trust.

III. The great encouragement he gives to others to do likewise, not only from his own experience but from the truth of God's promise (v. 3, 4, &c.): Surely he shall deliver thee. Now here it is promised,

1. That believers shall be kept from imminent danger which would be fatal to them (v. 3). This promise protects, (1) The natural life, and is often fulfilled in our preservation from these dangers which are very threatening and very near. (2) The spiritual life, which is protected by divine grace from the temptations of Satan.

2. That God himself will be their protector. He shall cover thee with his feathers, under his wings, which alludes to the hen gathering her chickens under her wings, Matt. xxiii. 37. By natural instinct she not only protects them, but calls them under that protection when she sees them in danger, not only keeps them safe, but cherishes them and keeps them warm. To this the great God is pleased to compare his care of his people. Wings and feathers, though spread with the greatest tenderness, are yet weak, and easily broken through, and therefore it is added, His truth shall be thy shield and buckler, a strong defence. God is as willing to guard his people as the hen is to guard the chickens, and as able as a man of war in armour.

3. That he will not only keep them from evil, but from the fear of evil, v. 5, 6. God by his grace will keep thee from disquieting distrustful fear (that fear which hath torment) in the midst of the greatest dangers. Wisdom shall keep thee from being causelessly afraid, and faith shall keep thee from being inordinately afraid. Thou shalt not be afraid of the arrow, as knowing that though it may hit thee it cannot hurt thee; if it take away the natural life, yet it shall be so far from doing any prejudice to the spiritual life that it shall be its perfection.

4. That they shall be preserved in common calamities, in a distinguishing way (v. 7): "When thousands and ten thousands fall, fall by sickness, or fall by the sword in battle, fall at thy side, at thy right hand, yet it shall not come nigh thee, the fear of death shall not." When multitudes die round about us, though thereby we must be awakened to prepare for our own death, yet we must not be afraid with any amazement, nor make ourselves subject to bondage, as many do all their life-time, through fear of death, Heb. ii. 15. Only with thy eyes shalt thou behold and see the just reward of the wicked, which perhaps refers to the destruction of the first-born of Egypt by the pestilence.

More promises to the same purport with those in the foregoing verses.

I. The psalmist assures believers of divine protection, from his own experience. The character of those who shall have the benefit and comfort of these promises. They are such as make the Most High their habitation (v. 9), as dwell in love and so dwell in God. It is our duty to be at home in God, to make our choice of him, and then to live our life in him as our habitation. We shall be welcome to him as a man to his own habitation. To encourage us to make the Lord our habitation, and to hope for safety and satisfaction in him, the psalmist intimates the comfort he had had in doing so: "He whom thou makest thy habitation is my refuge; and I have found him firm and faithful, and in him there is room enough, and shelter enough, both for thee and me." The promises are sure to all those who have thus made the Most High their habitation. Whatever happens to them, nothing shall hurt them (v. 10). Though trouble or affliction befall thee, yet there shall be no real evil in it, for it shall come from the love of God and shall be sanctified; it shall come, not for thy hurt, but for thy good; and though, for the present, it be not joyous but grievous yet, in the end, it shall yield so well that thou thyself shalt own no evil befell thee. He who is the Lord of the angels, who gave them their being and gives laws to them, whose they are and whom they were made to serve, he shall give his angels a charge over thee, not only over the church in general, but over every particular believer. The charge is to keep thee in all thy ways; here is a limitation of the promise: They shall keep thee in thy ways. Wherever the saints go the angels are charged with them, as the servants are with the children. Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder. The devil is called a roaring lion, the old serpent, the red dragon; so that to this promise the apostle seems to refer (Rom. xvi. 20), The God of peace shall tread Satan under your feet. Christ has broken the serpent's head, spoiled our spiritual enemies (Col. ii. 15). It may be applied to that care of the divine Providence by which we are preserved from ravenous noxious creatures (the wild beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee, Job v. 23); yea, and have ways and means of taming them, James iii. 7.

II. He brings in God himself speaking words of comfort to the saints, and declaring the mercy he had in store for them, v. 14–16. Observe,

1. To whom these promises do belong; they are described by three characters:—(1) They are such as know God's name. His nature we cannot fully know; but by his name he has made himself known. (1) They are such as have set their love upon him; those who rightly know him will love him. (3) They are such as by prayer keep up a constant correspondence with him.

2. What the promises are which God makes to the saints. (1) That he will, in due time, deliver them out of trouble: I will deliver him (v. 14 and again v. 15), denoting a double deliverance, living and dying, a deliverance in trouble and a deliverance out of trouble. (2) That he will, in the mean time, be with them in trouble, v. 15. If he does not immediately put a period to their afflictions, yet they shall have his gracious presence with them in their troubles. (3) That herein he will answer their prayers: He shall call upon me; I will pour upon him the spirit of prayer, and then I will answer, by providences, and answer by graces, strengthening them with strength in their souls (cxxxviii. 3); thus he answered Paul with grace sufficient, 2 Cor. xii. 9. (4) That he will exalt and dignify them: I will set him on high, out of the reach of trouble, above the stormy region on a rock above the waves, Isa. xxxiii. 16. They shall be enabled, by the grace of God, to look down upon the things of this world with a holy contempt and indifference, to look up to the things of the other world with a holy ambition and concern. (5) That they shall have a sufficiency of life in this world (v. 16). With length of days will I satisfy him. They shall live long enough: they shall be continued in this world till they have done the work they were sent into this world for and are ready for heaven, and that is long enough. A man may die young, and yet die full of days, satur dierum—satisfied with living. (6) That they shall have an eternal life in the other world. This crowns the blessedness: I will show him my salvation. It is probable that the word refers to the better country, that is, the heavenly.

PSALM XCII

It is probable that it was penned by David. I. Praise, the business of the sabbath, is here recommended, ver 1–3. II. God's works, which gave occasion for the sabbath, are here celebrated as great and unsearchable in general, ver. 4–6. In particular, with reference to the works both of providence and redemption, the psalmist sings unto God both of mercy and judgment, three times counterchanged. 1. The wicked shall perish (ver. 7), but God is eternal, ver. 8. 2. God's enemies shall be cut off, but David shall be exalted, ver. 9, 10. 3. David's enemies shall be confounded (ver. 11), but all the righteous shall be fruitful and flourishing, ver. 12–15.

A psalm or song for the sabbath day.

This psalm was appointed to be sung, at least it usually was sung, in the house of the sanctuary on the sabbath day. The sabbath day must be a day, not only of holy rest, but of holy work. The proper work of the sabbath is praising God; every sabbath day must be a thanksgiving day. One of the Jewish writers refers it to the kingdom of the Messiah, and calls it, A psalm or song for the age to come, which shall be all sabbath.

I. We are called upon and encouraged to praise God (v. 1–3): It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord. Praising God is good work: it is good in itself and good for us. 1. How we must praise God. We must do it by showing forth his lovingkindness and his faithfulness. We must show forth, not only his greatness and majesty, his holiness and justice, which magnify him and strike an awe upon us, but his lovingkindness and his faithfulness; for his goodness is his glory (Exod. xxxiii. 18, 19), and by these he proclaims his name. His mercy and truth are the great supports of our faith and hope, and the great encouragements of our love and obedience. This was then done, not only by singing, but by music joined with it, upon an instrument of ten strings (v. 3). 2. When we must praise God—in the morning and every night, not only on sabbath days, but every day; not only in public assemblies, but in secret, and in our families. We must begin and end every day with praising God.

II. We have an example set before us in the psalmist himself (v. 4): Thou, Lord, hast made me glad through thy work. I will triumph in the works of thy hands. From a joyful remembrance of what God has done for us we may raise a joyful prospect of what he will do. We cannot comprehend the greatness of God's works, and therefore must reverently and awfully wonder at them. "Men's works are little and trifling, for their thoughts are shallow; but, Lord, thy works are great and such as cannot be measured; for thy thoughts are very deep and such as cannot be fathomed." The greatness of God's works shall lead us to consider the depth of his thoughts.

III. We are admonished not to neglect the works of God, by the character of those who do so, v. 6. Those are fools who will not acquaint themselves with them, nor give him the glory of them.

The psalmist had said (v. 4) that from the works of God he would take occasion to triumph; and here he does so.

I. He triumphs over God's enemies (v. 7, 9, 11). When they are flourishing (v. 7) as the grass in spring (so thickly sown, so green, and growing so fast), and all the workers of iniquity do flourish in pomp, and power, one would think that it was a certain evidence of God's favour; but it is quite otherwise. The very prosperity of fools shall slay them, Prov. i. 32. Though they are daring, v. 9. They are thy enemies, and they fight against God. They shall perish: for who ever hardened his heart against God and prospered? Though they had a particular malice against the psalmist, yet he triumphs over them (v. 11): "My eye shall see my desire on my enemies that rise up against me; I shall see them not only disabled from doing me any further mischief, but reckoned with for the mischief they have done me, and brought either to repentance or ruin."

II. He triumphs in God, and his glory and grace. 1. In the glory of God (v. 8). 2. In the grace of God, his favour and the fruits of it (v. 10). My horn shall thou exalt, when thy enemies perish; for then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun, when the wicked shall be doomed to shame and everlasting contempt. He adds, I shall be anointed with fresh oil, which denotes a fresh confirmation in his office to which he had been anointed, or abundance of plenty, so that he should have fresh oil as often as he pleased, or renewed comforts to revive him when his spirits drooped. Grace is the anointing of the Spirit. The saints are here represented as trees of righteousness, Isa. lxi. 3; Ps. i. 3. They are planted in the house of the Lord, v. 13. The trees of righteousness do not grow of themselves; they are planted, not in common soil, but in the house of the Lord. Trees are not usually planted in a house; but God's trees are said to be planted in his house because it is from his grace, by his word and Spirit, that they receive all the sap and virtue that keep them alive and make them fruitful. It is here promised that they shall grow, v. 12. Where God gives true grace he will give more grace. God's trees shall grow higher, like the tall cedars in Lebanon; they shall grow nearer heaven; they shall grow stronger, like the cedars, and fitter for use. They shall be cheerful and respected by all about them. They shall flourish like the palm-tree, which has a stately body and large boughs. Dates, the fruit of it, are very pleasant, and it is ever green. The wicked flourish as the grass (v. 7), which is soon withered, but the righteous as the palm-tree, which is long-lived and which the winter does not change. It has been said of the palm-tree, Sub pondere crescit—The more it is pressed down the more it grows; so the righteous flourish under their burdens. They shall be fruitful. The products of sanctification, all the instances of a lively devotion, good works, by which God is glorified and others are edified, these are the fruits of righteousness, in which it is the privilege of the righteous to abound. It is promised that they shall bring forth fruit in old age. Other trees, when they are old, leave off bearing, but in God's trees the strength of grace does not fail with the strength of nature. The last days of the saints are sometimes their best days, and their last work is their best work. As it is by the promises that believers first partake of a divine nature, so it is by the promises that that divine nature is preserved and kept up. All that ever trusted in God found him faithful and all-sufficient, and none were ever made ashamed of their hope in him.

PSALM XCIII

This short psalm sets forth the honour of the kingdom of God among men. It relates to the kingdom of his providence, by which he governs the world, and to the kingdom of his grace, by which he secures the church. The administration of both these kingdoms is put into the hands of the Messiah, and to him, doubtless, the prophet here bears witness, and to his kingdom. Concerning God's kingdom glorious things are here spoken. I. Have other kings their royal robes? So has he, ver. 1. II. Have they their thrones? So has he, ver. 2. III. Have they their enemies whom they subdue and triumph over? So has he, ver. 3, 4. IV. Is it their honour to be faithful and holy? So is it his, ver. 5.

Verses 1–5

The Lord reigns. It is the song of the gospel church, of the glorified church (Rev. xix. 6), Hallelujah; the Lord God omnipotent reigns. Here we are told how he reigns.

I. The Lord reigns gloriously: He is clothed with majesty.

II. He reigns powerfully. He is not only clothed with majesty, as a prince in his court, but he is clothed with strength, as a general in the camp. He has wherewithal to support his greatness and to make it truly formidable. See him not only clad in robes, but clad in armour. With this power he has girded himself; it is not derived from any other, nor does the executing of it depend upon any other. The world is established by the creating power of God, when he founded it upon the seas; it is so still, by that providence which upholds all things and is a continued creation. Though God clothes himself with majesty, yet he condescends to take care of this lower world and to settle its affairs; and, if he established the world, much more will he establish his church, that it cannot be moved.

III. He reigns eternally (v. 2): Thy throne is established of old. The whole administration of his government was settled in his eternal counsels before all worlds. Because God himself was from everlasting, his throne and all the determinations of it were so too; for in an eternal mind there could not but be eternal thoughts.

IV. He reigns triumphantly, v. 3, 4. The floods have lifted up, O Lord! (to God himself the remonstrance is made) the floods have lifted up their voice, which speaks terror. It alludes to a tempestuous sea. The church is said to be tossed with tempests (Isa. liv. 11). We may apply it to the tumults that are sometimes in our own bosoms, but, if the Lord reign there, even the winds and seas shall obey him. An immovable anchor is cast in this storm (v. 4): The Lord himself is mightier. The power of the church's enemies is but as the noise of many waters; there is more of sound than substance in it. Pharaoh king of Egypt is but a noise, Jer. xlvi. 17. The unlimited sovereignty and irresistible power of the great Jehovah are very encouraging to the people of God, in reference to all the noises and hurries they meet with in this world, Ps. xlvi. 1, 2.

V. He reigns in truth and holiness, v. 5. All his promises are inviolably faithful: Thy testimonies are very sure. As God is able to protect his church, so he is true to the promises he has made of its safety and victory. God's church is his house. The holiness of it is its beauty. and it is its strength and safety; it is the holiness of God's house that secures it against the many waters and their noise. Where there is purity there shall be peace.

PSALM XCIV

This psalm was penned when the church of God was under hatches, oppressed and persecuted; and it is an appeal to God, for his people against his and their enemies. Two things this psalm speaks:—I. Conviction and terror to the persecutors (ver. 1–11), showing them their danger and folly, and arguing with them. II. Comfort and peace to the persecuted (ver. 12–23), assuring them, both from God's promise and from the psalmist's own experience, that their troubles would end well.

Verses 1–11

I. A solemn appeal to God against the cruel oppressors of his people, v. 1, 2.

1. The titles they give to God for the encouraging of their faith in this appeal: O God! to whom vengeance belongeth; and thou Judge of the earth. He is judge, supreme judge, judge alone, from whom every man's judgments proceeds. He that gives law gives sentence upon every man according to his works, by the rule of that law. His throne is the last refuge (the dernier ressort, as the law speaks) of oppressed innocency. He is judge of the earth, of the whole earth. As he has authority to avenge wrong, so it is his nature, and property. O God! to whom vengeance belongs, who will not suffer might always to prevail against right. This is a good reason why we must not avenge ourselves, because God has said, Vengeance is mine; and it is daring presumption to usurp his prerogative and step into his throne, Rom. xii. 19.

2. What is it they ask of God. "Lord," say they, "show thyself; make them know that thou art and that thou art ready to show thyself strong on the behalf of those whose hearts are upright with thee." The enemies thought God was conquered because his people were. Render a reward to the proud; that is, "Reckon with them for all their insolence, and the injuries they have done to thy people."

II. A humble complaint to God of the pride and cruelty of the oppressors, v. 3. They are wicked; they are workers of iniquity; and therefore they hate and persecute those whose goodness shames and condemns them. They are insolent, and take a pleasure in magnifying themselves. Those that speak highly of themselves, that triumph and boast, are apt to speak hardly of others. "They break in pieces thy people, O Lord! and do all they can to afflict thy heritage, to grieve them, to crush them, to run them down, to root them out." God's people are his heritage. They are inhuman, and take a pleasure in wronging those that are least able to help themselves (v. 6). "Lord, how long shall they do thus?"

III. A charge of atheism exhibited against the persecutors. Their atheistical thoughts are here discovered (v. 7): They say, The Lord shall not see. They have the confidence to say, "The Lord shall not see; he will not only wink at small faults, but shut his eyes at great ones too." He that says either that Jehovah the living God shall not see or that the God of Jacob shall not regard the injuries done to his people, Nabal is his name and folly is with him (v. 8): "Understand, you brutish among the people, and let reason guide you." God sees and regards all you say and do. None are so bad but means are to be used for the reclaiming and reforming of them, none so brutish, so foolish, but it should be tried whether they may not yet be made wise; while there is life there is hope. The works of creation (v. 9), the formation of human bodies, prove that there is a God, prove also that God has infinitely and transcendently in himself all those perfections that are in any creature. He that planted the ear shall he not hear? He that formed the eye shall he not see? Could he give, would he give, that perfection to a creature which he has not in himself? By the knowledge of ourselves we may be led a great way towards the knowledge of God—if by the knowledge of our own bodies, and the organs of sense, so as to conclude that if we can see and hear much more can God, then certainly by the knowledge of our own souls. The gods of the heathen had eyes and saw not, ears and heard not; our God has no eyes nor ears, as we have, and yet we must conclude he both sees and hears, because we have our sight and hearing from him. He that chastises the heathen for their polytheism and idolatry, shall not he much more correct his own people for their atheism and profaneness? Dr. Hammond gives another very probable sense of this: "He that instructs the nations (that is, gives them his law), shall not he correct, that is, shall not he judge them according to that law, and call them to an account for their violations of it?" The same word signifies to chastise and to instruct, because chastisement is intended for instruction and instruction should go along with chastisement. He that teaches man knowledge, shall he not know? He not only, as the God of nature, has given the light of reason, but, as the God of grace, has given the light of revelation, has shown man what is true wisdom and understanding; and he that does this, shall he not know? Job xxviii. 23, 28. God will take cognizance even of what we think (v. 11): The Lord knows the thoughts of man, that they are vanity. Even in good thoughts there is a fickleness and inconstancy which may well be called vanity. Thoughts are words to God, and vain thoughts are provocations.

The psalmist speaks comfort to suffering saints from God's promises and his own experience.

I. From God's promises, which are such as not only save them from being miserable, but secure a happiness to them (v. 12): Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest. Here he looks above the instruments of trouble, and eyes the hand of God, which puts quite another colour upon it. The enemies break in pieces God's people (v. 5); but God by them chastens his people, as the father the son in whom he delights, and the persecutors are only the rod he makes use of. Now it is here promised,

1. That God's people shall get good by their sufferings. When he chastens them he will teach them, and blessed is the man who is thus taken under a divine discipline, for none teaches like God. When we are chastened we must pray to be taught, and look into the law as the best expositor of Providence. It is not the chastening itself that does good, but the teaching that goes along with it and is the exposition of it.

2. That they shall see through their sufferings (v. 13): That thou mayest give him rest from the days of adversity. The days of their adversity shall not last always. God therefore teaches his people by their troubles, that he may prepare them for deliverance, and so give them rest from their troubles, that the affliction, having done its work, may be removed.

3. That they shall see the ruin of those that are the instruments of their sufferings.

4. That, though they may be cast down, yet certainly they shall not be cast off, v. 14. Whatever their friends do, God will not cast them off, nor throw them out of his covenant or out of his care. St. Paul comforted himself with this, Rom. xi. 1.

5. That, bad as things are, they shall mend (v. 15): Judgment shall return unto righteousness; the seeming disorders of Providence (for real ones there never were) shall be rectified. Then all the upright in heart shall be after it; they shall return to a prosperous and flourishing condition, and shine forth out of obscurity; they shall accommodate themselves to the dispensations of divine Providence with suitable affections. Dr. Hammond thinks this was most eminently fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem first, and afterwards of heathen Rome, the crucifiers of Christ and persecutors of Christians, and the rest which the churches had thereby.

II. From his own experiences and observations.

1. He and his friends had been oppressed by cruel and imperious men, that had power in their hands and abused it by abusing all good people with it. They were evil-doers and workers of iniquity (v. 16); they abandoned themselves to all manner of impiety and immorality, and then their throne was a throne of iniquity, v. 20. Iniquity is daring enough even when human laws are against it, which often prove too weak to give an effectual check to it; but how insolent, how mischievous, is it when it is backed by a law! These workers of iniquity condemn the innocent blood for violating their decrees. See an instance in Daniel's enemies; they framed mischief by a law when they obtained an impious edict against prayer (Dan. vi. 7), and, when Daniel would not obey it, condemned his innocent blood to the lions. The best benefactors of mankind have often been thus treated, under colour of law and justice, as the worst of malefactors.

2. The oppression they were under bore very hard upon them. The psalmist had almost dwelt in silence (v. 17); he was at his wits' end, and knew not what to say or do; he was ready to drop into the grave, that land of silence. (St. Paul, in a like case, received a sentence of death within himself, 2 Cor. i. 8, 9). He said, "My foot slippeth (v. 18); I must fall. I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul. My hope fails me; I do not find such firm footing for my faith as I have sometimes found." See Ps. lxxiii. 2. He had a multitude of perplexed entangled thoughts within him concerning the course he should take and what was likely to be the issue of it.

3. In this distress they sought for help, and succour, and some relief (v. 16): "Who will rise up for me against the evil-doers? Have I any friend who, in love to me will appear for me?" He looked, but there was none to save, there was none to uphold. When St. Paul was brought before Nero's throne of iniquity no man stood by him, 2 Tim. iv. 16. They cried out: "Lord, shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee? Wilt thou countenance and support these tyrants in their wickedness? We know thou wilt not." A throne has fellowship with God when it is a throne of justice and answers the end of the erecting of it; but, when it becomes a throne of iniquity, it has no longer fellowship with God.

4. They found succour and relief in God, and in him only. Unless I had made him my help, by putting my trust in him and expecting relief from him, I could never have kept possession of my own soul; but living by faith in him has kept my head above water, has given me breath, and something to say. We are beholden not only to God's power, but to his pity, for spiritual supports: Thy mercy, the gifts of thy mercy and my hope in thy mercy, held me up. "In the multitude of my thoughts within me, crowding and jostling one another like a multitude, thy comforts delight my soul; silence my unquiet thoughts and keep my mind easy." God's comforts will reach the soul, and not the fancy only, and will bring with them that peace and that pleasure which the smiles of the world cannot give and which the frowns of the world cannot take away.

5. God is, and will be, as a righteous Judge, the protector of right and the punisher of wrong; this the psalmist had both the assurance of and the experience of. "When none else will, nor can, nor dare, shelter me, the Lord is my defence, to preserve me from the evil of my troubles, from sinking under them and being ruined by them; and he is the rock of my refuge, in the clefts of which I may take shelter, and on the top of which I may set my feet, to be out of the reach of danger."

PSALM XCV

For the expounding of this psalm we may borrow a great deal of light from Heb. iii and iv, where it appears both to have been penned by David and to have been calculated for the days of the Messiah; for it is there said expressly (Heb. iv. 7) that the day here spoken of (ver. 7) is to be understood of the gospel day, in which God speaks to us by his Son and proposes to us a rest besides that of Canaan. In singing psalms it is intended, I. That we should "make melody unto the Lord" (ver. 1, 2) as a great God (ver. 3–5) and as our gracious benefactor, ver. 6, 7. II. That we should teach and admonish ourselves and one another; and we are here taught and warned to hear God's voice (ver. 7), and not to harden our hearts, as the Israelites in the wilderness did (ver. 8, 9), lest we fall under God's wrath and fall short of his rest, as they did, ver. 10, 11.

Verses 1–7

The psalmist here, as often elsewhere, stirs up himself and others to praise God.

I. How God is to be praised. The praising song must be a joyful noise, v. 1 and again v. 2. Spiritual joy is the heart and soul of thankful praise. Rejoice in him as our Father and King, and a God in covenant with us. With humble reverence, and holy awe (v. 6): "Let us worship, and bow down, and kneel before him, as becomes those who know what an infinite distance there is between us and God, how much we are in danger of his wrath and in need of his mercy." We must speak forth, sing forth, his praises out of the abundance of a heart filled with love, and joy, and thankfulness—Sing to the Lord; make a noise, a joyful noise to him, with psalms. We must praise God in concert, in the solemn assemblies: "Come, let us sing; let us join in singing to the Lord. Let us come together before his presence, where his people are wont to expect his manifestations of himself."

II. Why God is to be praised.

1. Because he is a great God, and sovereign Lord of all, v. 3. (1) He has great power: He is a great King above all gods, above all deputed deities, all magistrates, to whom he said, You are gods above all counterfeit deities. (2) He has great possessions. This lower world is here particularly specified. How great is that God whose the whole earth is, and the fulness thereof, in whose hand it is, as he has the actual directing and disposing of all (v. 4); even the deep places of the earth are in his hand; and the height of the hills, whatever grows or feeds upon them, is his also. Whatever strength is in any creature it is derived from God and employed for him (v. 5): The sea is his for he made it, gathered its waters and fixed its shores; the dry land is his, for his hands formed it, when his word made the dry land appear. His being the Creator of all makes him, without dispute, the owner of all. This being a gospel psalm, we may very well suppose that it is the Lord Jesus whom we are here taught to praise. As Mediator, he is a great King above all gods; by him, as the eternal Word, all things were made (John i. 3), and it was fit he should be the restorer and reconciler of all who was the Creator of all, Col. i. 16, 20.

2. Because he is our God, not only has he dominion over us, as he has over all the creatures, but stands in special relation to us (v. 7): He is our God. He is our Creator; we must kneel before the Lord our Maker, v. 6. Idolaters kneel before gods which they themselves made; we kneel before a God who made us. He is our Saviour, and the author of our blessedness. He is here called the rock of our salvation (v. 1). We are therefore his, under all possible obligations: We are the people of his pasture and the sheep of his hand. We must praise him, because he preserves and maintains us. All the church's children are in a special manner so; Israel are the people of his pasture and the sheep of his hand; and therefore he demands their homage in a special manner. The gospel church is his flock. Christ is the great and good Shepherd of it, and therefore to him must be glory in the churches throughout all ages, Eph. iii. 21.

Verses 7–11

The latter part of this psalm is an exhortation to those who sing gospel psalms to live gospel lives.

I. The duty required of all those that are the people of Christ's pasture and the sheep of his hand. He expects that they hear his voice, for he has said, My sheep hear my voice, John x. 27. If you call him Master, or Lord, then do the things which he says, and be his willing obedient people. Hearing the voice of Christ is the same with believing.

II. The sin they are warned against is hardness of heart. If you will hear his voice, and profit by what you hear, then do not harden your hearts; for the seed sown on the rock never brought any fruit to perfection.

III. The example of the Israelites in the wilderness.

1. "Take heed of sinning as they did, lest you be shut out of the everlasting rest as they were out of Canaan." So often did they provoke God by their distrusts and murmurings that the whole time of their continuance in the wilderness might be called a day of temptation, or Massah, the other name given to that place (Exod. xvii. 7), because they tempted the Lord, saying, Is the Lord among us or is he not? The more experience we have had of the power and goodness of God the greater is our sin if we distrust him.

2. The charge drawn up, in God's name, against the unbelieving Israelites, v. 9, 10. Their sin was unbelief: they tempted God and proved him, Num. xiv. 3, 4. This is called rebellion, Deut. i. 26, 32. The aggravation of this sin was that they saw God's work; they saw what he had done for them in bringing them out of Egypt, what he was now doing for them every day in the bread he rained from heaven, and the water out of the rock, than which they could not have more unquestionable evidences of God's presence with them. It is a people that do err in their hearts, and they have not known my ways. Men's unbelief and distrust of God, their murmurings and quarrels with him, are the effect of their ignorance. They saw his work (v. 9) and he made known his acts to them (ciii. 7); and yet they did not know the ways of his providence, or the ways of his commandments. The reason why people slight and forsake the ways of God is because they do not know them. They do err in their heart; they wander out of the way; in heart they turn back. The sins of God's professing people do not only anger him, but grieve him, especially their distrust of him. See the patience of God towards provoking sinners; he was grieved with them forty years, and yet those years ended in a triumphant entrance into Canaan made by the next generation. The sentence passed upon them for their sin (v. 11). He swore solemnly in his wrath, his just and holy wrath. God is not subject to such passions as we are; but he is said to be angry at sin and sinners, to show the malignity of sin and the justice of God's government. That they should not enter into his rest, the rest which he had prepared for them, a settlement for them and theirs.

Now this case of Israel may be applied to those of their posterity that lived in David's time, when this psalm was penned. But it must be applied to us Christians, because so the apostle applies it. There is a spiritual and eternal rest set before us, and promised to us, of which Canaan was a type. Those that, like Israel, distrust God, will justly be shut out from his rest: they themselves have decided it, Heb. iv. 1.

PSALM XCVI

This psalm was sung at the translation of the ark. It looks further, to the kingdom of Christ, and is designed to celebrate the glories of that kingdom, especially the accession of the Gentiles to it. Here is, I. A call given to all people to praise God, to worship him as a great and glorious God, ver. 1–9. II. Notice given to all people of God's universal government and judgment, which ought to be the matter of universal joy, ver. 10–13.

Verses 1–9

The call here given us to praise God is very lively.

1. We are here required to honour God,

1. With songs, v. 1, 2. Three times we are here called to sing unto the Lord; that is, "Bless his name, speak well of him, that you may bring others to think well of him." Sing a new song, the product of new affections. A new song is a song for new favours. A new song is a New Testament song, a song of praise for the new covenant and the precious privileges of that covenant. A new song is a song that shall be ever new. This is a prophecy of the calling of the Gentiles; all the earth shall have this new song put into their mouths. Let the subject-matter of this song be his salvation, the great salvation which was to be wrought out by the Lord Jesus.

2. With sermons (v. 3): Declare his glory among the heathen, even his wonders among all people. Salvation by Christ is here spoken of as a work of wonder. This salvation was, in the Old Testament times, as heaven's happiness is now, a glory to be revealed.

3. With religious services, v. 7 9. Hitherto, though in every nation those that feared God and wrought righteousness were accepted of him, yet instituted ordinances were the peculiarities of the Jewish religion. All the earth is here summoned to fear before the Lord, to worship him. The acts of devotion to God are here described. We must give unto the Lord. It is what must be paid, and, if not, will be recovered, and yet, if it come from holy love, God is pleased to accept it as a gift. We must give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name. We must bring an offering into his courts. We must bring ourselves in the first place, the offering up of the Gentiles, Rom. xv. 16. We must worship him in the beauty of holiness, with holy hearts, sanctified by the grace of God, devoted to the glory of God. All the acts of worship must be performed with a holy awe and reverence.

II. Glorious things are here said of him; The Lord is great, and therefore greatly to be praised (v. 4) and to be feared. Even the new song proclaims God great as well as good. He is great in his sovereignty over all that pretend to be deities; feared above all gods—all princes, who were often deified after their deaths. He is great in his right, even to the noblest part of the creation; for it is his own work and derives its being from him. Splendour and majesty are before him, in his immediate presence above, where the angels cover their faces, as unable to bear the dazzling lustre of his glory. Strength and beauty are in his sanctuary, both that above and this below. If we attend him in his sanctuary, we shall behold his beauty, for God is love, and experience his strength for he is our rock.

Instructions given to those who were to preach the gospel to the nations.

I. Let it be told that the Lord reigns, the Lord Christ reigns, that King whom God determined to set upon his holy hill of Zion. See how this was first said among the heathen by Peter, Acts x. 42. Some of the ancients added a gloss to this, which by degrees crept into the text, The Lord reigneth from the tree (so Justin Martyr, Austin, and others, quote it), meaning the cross, when he had this title written over him, The King of the Jews.

II. Let it be told that Christ's government will be the world's happy settlement: The world also shall be established, that it shall not be moved. Sin had given it a shock, and still threatens it; but Christ, as Redeemer, upholds all things, and preserves the course of nature. The Christian religion, as far as it is embraced, shall establish states and kingdoms, and preserve good order among men.

III. Let them be told that Christ's government will be just and righteous, v. 13. He says himself, For judgment have I come into this world (John ix. 39, xii. 31), and declares that all judgment was committed to him, John v. 22, 27. He shall rule in the hearts and consciences of men by the commanding power of truth and the Spirit of righteousness and sanctification. When Pilate asked our Saviour, Art thou a king? he answered, For this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth (John xviii. 37).

IV. Let them be told that his coming draws nigh, that this King, this Judge, standeth before the door. Between this and his first coming the revolutions of many ages intervened, and yet he came at the set time, and so sure will his second coming be.

V. Let them be called upon to rejoice in the Messiah, and this great trust that is to be lodged in his hand (v. 11, 12): Let heaven and earth rejoice, the sea, the field, and all the trees of the wood. The meaning is, 1. That the days of the Messiah will be joyful days. When Samaria received the gospel there was great joy in that city (Acts viii. 8), and, when the eunuch was baptized, he went on his way rejoicing, v. 39. 2. That it is the duty of every one of us to bid Christ and his kingdom welcome; for, though he comes conquering and to conquer, yet he comes peaceably. 3. That the whole creation will have reason to rejoice in the setting up of Christ's kingdom, even the sea and the field. There will, in the first place, be joy in heaven, joy in the presence of the angels of God.

PSALM XCVII

This psalm is set to the same tune, with the foregoing psalm. Christ is the Alpha and the Omega of both. He it is that reigns, to the joy of all mankind (ver. 1); and his government speaks, I. Terror to his enemies; for he is a prince of inflexible justice and irresistible power, ver. 2–7. II. Comfort to his friends and loyal subjects, arising from his sovereign dominion, the care he takes of his people, and the provision he makes for them, ver. 8–12.

Verses 1–7

What was to be said among the heathen in the foregoing psalm (v. 10) is here said again (v. 1) and is made the subject of this psalm, and of psalm xcix. The Lord reigns; that is the great truth here laid down. The Lord Jesus reigns.

I. Let the earth rejoice, for hereby it is established (xcvi. 10). Not only let the people of Israel rejoice in him as King of the Jews, and the daughter of Zion as her King, but let all the earth rejoice. Let the multitude of isles, the many or great isles, be glad thereof. All have reason to rejoice in Christ's government. Sometimes indeed clouds and darkness are round about him; his dispensations are altogether unaccountable; his way is in the sea and his path in the great waters. There is a depth in his counsels, which we must not pretend to fathom. But still righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne; a golden thread of justice runs through the whole web of his administration. In this he resides, for it is his habitation. In this he rules, for it is the habitation of his throne. His commandments are, and will be, all righteous. Who can contradict or dispute what the heavens declare? All the people see his glory, or may see it. The glory of God, in the face of Christ, was made to shine in distant countries. Worship him, all you gods. The words in Heb. i. 6, "Let all the angels of God worship him," are a key to this whole psalm, and show us that it must be applied to the exalted Redeemer. All power is given him both in heaven and earth, angels, authorities, and powers, being made subject unto him, 1 Pet. iii. 22.

II. Christ's government, though it may be matter of joy to all, will yet be matter of terror to some, and it is their own fault that it is so, v. 3–5, 7. He that reigns, to the joy of the whole earth, yet, as he has his subjects, so he has his enemies (v. 3). These enemies are here called hills (v. 5), for their height, and strength, and immovable obstinacy. Their persecuting the apostles, and forbidding them to speak to the Gentiles, filled up their sin, and brought wrath upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16. That wrath is here compared to consuming fire, which will not only burn the rubbish upon the hills, but will even melt the hills themselves like wax, v. 5. The most resolute and daring opposition will be baffled at the presence of the Lord. The earth saw and trembled, and the ears of all that heard were made to tingle. This was fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation by the Romans, about forty years after Christ's resurrection, which, like fire, and like lightning, astonished all their neighbours (Deut. xxix. 24). Idolaters also would be put to confusion by the setting up of Christ's kingdom (v. 7): Confounded be all those who serve graven images, the Gentile world, who did service to those that by nature are no gods (Gal. iv. 8). This is a prayer for the conversion of the Gentiles, that those who have been so long serving dumb idols may be convinced of their error, ashamed of their folly, and may, by the power of Christ's gospel, be brought to serve the only living and true God. The destruction of Paganism in the Roman empire was fulfilled about 300 years after Christ.

Verses 8–12

I. The reasons that are given for Zion's joy in the government of the Redeemer. God is glorified, and whatever redounds to his honour is his people's pleasure. Thou, Lord, art high above all the earth (v. 9). The exaltation of Christ, and the advancement of God's glory among men thereby, are the rejoicing of all the saints. He preserves the souls of the saints; he preserves their lives as long as he has any work for them to do. But something more is meant than their lives; for those that will be his disciples must be willing to lay down their lives. It is the immortal soul that Christ preserves, the inward man, which may be renewed more and more when the outward man decays. Light is sown for the righteous, that is, gladness for the upright in heart. The subjects of Christ's kingdom are told to expect tribulation in the world, yet let them know, to their comfort, that light is sown for them. What is sown will come up again in due time; though, like winter seed, it may lie long under the clods, yet it will return in a rich and plentiful increase. Christ told his disciples, at parting (John xvi. 20), You shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy.

II. The rules that are given for Zion's joy. Let it be a pure and holy joy. You that love the Lord Jesus, that love his appearing and kingdom, that love his word and his exaltation, see that you hate evil. A true love to God will show itself in a real hatred of all sin, as that abominable thing which he hates. Let the joy terminate in God (v. 12): Rejoice in the Lord, you righteous. All the lines of joy must meet in him as in the centre. See Phil. iii. 3; iv. 4. Let it express itself in praise and thanksgiving: Give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness.

PSALM XCVIII

This psalm is to the same purport with the two foregoing psalms; it is a prophecy of the kingdom of the Messiah, the setting of it up in the world, and the bringing of the Gentiles into it. The Chaldee entitles it a prophetic psalm. It sets forth, I. The glory of the Redeemer, ver. 1–3. II. The joy of the redeemed, ver. 4–9.

A psalm

Verses 1–3

A song of praise for redeeming love is a new song. Converts sing a new song; they change their wonder and change their joy, and therefore change their note.

I. The wonders he has wrought: He has done marvellous things, v. 1. The work of our salvation by Christ is a work of wonder. The more it is known the more it will be admired.

II. The conquests he has won: His right hand and his holy arm have gotten him the victory. Our Redeemer has surmounted all the difficulties that lay in the way of our redemption. He got his victory by his own power.

III. The discoveries he has made to the world of the work of redemption. What he has wrought for us he has revealed to us, and both by his Son; the gospel-revelation is that on which the gospel-kingdom is founded—the word which God sent, Acts x. 36.

IV. The accomplishment of the prophecies and promises of the Old Testament. God is said, in sending Christ, to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember the holy covenant, Luke i. 72. It was in consideration of that, and not of their merit.

Verses 4–9

The setting up of the kingdom of Christ is here represented as a matter of joy and praise.

I. Let all the children of men rejoice in it, for they all have, or may have, benefit by it. Again and again we are here called upon by all ways and means possible to express our joy in it and give God praise for it. Let sacred songs attend the new King. Let these be music, not only with the soft and gentle melody of the harp, but since it is a victorious King whose glory is to be celebrated, let him be proclaimed with the martial sound of the trumpet and cornet, v. 6.

II. Let the inferior creatures rejoice in it, v. 7–9. This is to the same purport with what we had before (xcvi. 11–13): Let the sea roar, and let that be called, not as it used to be, a dreadful noise, but a joyful noise; for the coming of Christ, and the salvation wrought out by him, have quite altered the property of the troubles and terrors of this world, so that when the floods lift up their voice, lift up their waves, we must not construe that to be the sea roaring against us, but rather rejoicing with us. One would think that Virgil had these psalms in his eye, as well as the oracles of the Cumean Sibyl, in his fourth eclogue, where he either ignorantly or basely applies to Asinius Pollio the ancient prophecies, which at that time were expected to be fulfilled; for he lived in the reign of Augustus Caesar, a little before our Saviour's birth. He owns they looked for the birth of a child from heaven that should be a great blessing to the world, and restore the golden age:—

> A new race descends from the lofty sky;
> Thy influence shall efface every stain of corruption,
> And free the world from alarm.

Many other things he says of this long-looked-for child, which Ludovicus Vives thinks applicable to Christ; and he concludes, as the psalmist here, with a prospect of the rejoicing of the whole creation herein:

> See how this promis'd age makes all rejoice.
> And, if all rejoice, why should not we?

PSALM XCIX

This psalm seems to dwell more upon the Old Testament dispensation and the manifestation of God's glory and grace in that. To Israel indeed pertained the promises, which they were bound to believe; but to them pertained also the giving of the law, and the service of God, which they were also bound dutifully and conscientiously to attend to, Rom. ix. 4. And this they are called to do in this psalm, where yet there is much of Christ, for the government of the church was in the hands of the eternal Word before he was incarnate; and, besides, the ceremonial services were types and figures of evangelical worship. The people of Israel are here required to praise and exalt God, and to worship before him, in consideration of these two things — I. The happy constitution of the government they were under, both in sacred and civil things, ver. 1–5. II. Some instances of the happy administration of it, ver. 6–9.

Verses 1–5

The foundation of all religion is laid in this truth, That the Lord reigns. God governs the world by his providence, governs the church by his grace, and both by his Son. We are to believe not only that the Lord lives, but that the Lord reigns. This is the triumph of the Christian church, and here it was the triumph of the Jewish church, that Jehovah was their King; and hence it is inferred, Let the people tremble. The Old Testament dispensation had much of terror in it. But we are not now come to that mount that burned with fire, Heb. xii. 18. Now that the Lord reigns let the earth rejoice. Then he ruled more by the power of holy fear; now he rules by the power of holy love. The Lord reigns, let the earth be moved. Those that submit to him shall be established, and not moved (xcvi. 10); but those that oppose him will be moved. The kingdom of Christ cannot be moved; the things which cannot be shaken shall remain, Heb. xii. 27. In these is continuance, Isa. lxiv. 5.

God's kingdom, set up in Israel, is here the subject of the psalmist's praise.

I. Two things the psalmist affirms:—1. God presided in the affairs of religion: He sitteth between the cherubim (v. 1), to give law by the oracles thence delivered. This was the honour of Israel, that they had among them the Shechinah, or special presence of God. The Lord is great in Zion (v. 2); there he is known and praised (lxxvi. 1, 2). He is high there above all people; so in Zion the perfections of the divine nature appear more illustrious than anywhere else. Therefore let those that dwell in Zion, and worship there, praise thy great and terrible name, for it is holy. 2. He was all in all in their civil government, v. 4. As in Jerusalem was the testimony of Israel, so there were set thrones of judgment, cxxii. 4, 5. Their government was a theocracy. God raised up David to rule over them. and he is the king whose strength loves judgment. He is strong; all his strength he has from God. The people of Israel had a good king; but they are here taught to look up to God as he by whom their king reigns: Thou dost establish equity (that is, God gave them those excellent laws by which they were governed), and thou executest judgment and righteousness in Jacob.

II. Putting these two things together, we see what was the happiness of Israel above any other people (v. 5): "Exalt you the Lord our God, and worship at his footstool; give him the glory of the good government you are under, as it is now established, both in church and state."

Verses 6–9

The happiness of Israel in God's government is here further made out by some particular instances of his administration, especially with reference to those that were the most useful governors of that people—Moses, Aaron, and Samuel, in the two former of whom the theocracy or divine government began, and in the last of whom that form of government, in a great measure, ended.

I. The intimate communion they had with God. None of all the nations of the earth could produce three such men as these, that had such an intercourse with Heaven, and whom God knew by name, Exod. xxxiii. 17. Samuel, though not among his priests, yet was among those that called on his name; and for this they were all famous, They called upon the Lord. By their obedience: They kept his testimonies, and the ordinances that he gave them; they made conscience of their duty. Moses did all according to the pattern shown him; it is often repeated, According to all that God commanded Moses, so did he. Aaron and Samuel did likewise. They all wonderfully prevailed with God in prayer; miracles were wrought at their special instance and request. He communed with them as one friend familiarly converses with another (v. 7).

II. The good offices they did to Israel. They interceded for the people, and for them also they obtained many an answer of peace. Moses stood in the gap, and Aaron between the living and the dead; and, when Israel was in distress, Samuel cried unto the Lord for them, 1 Sam. vii. 9. This is here referred to (v. 8): "Thou answeredst them, O Lord our God! thou wast a God that forgavest" the people they prayed for. The people are again called upon to praise God (v. 9): "Exalt the Lord our God, on account of what he has done for us formerly, as well as of late, and worship at his holy hill of Zion."

PSALM C

It is with good reason that many sing this psalm very frequently in their religious assemblies. The Jews say it was penned to be sung with their thank-offerings; but we say that as there is nothing in it peculiar to their economy so its beginning with a call to all lands to praise God plainly extends it to the gospel-church. Here, I. We are called upon to praise God and rejoice in him, ver. 1, 2, 4. II. We are furnished with matter for praise; considering his being and relation to us (ver. 3) and his mercy and truth, ver. 5.

A psalm of praise.

Verses 1–5

The psalm does indeed answer to the title, A psalm of praise. If we take the foregoing psalm to be a call to the Jewish church to rejoice in the administration of God's kingdom, which they were under (as the four psalms before it were calculated for the days of the Messiah), this psalm, perhaps, was intended for proselytes, that came over out of all lands to the Jews' religion.

I. A strong invitation to worship God. In all acts of religious worship, whether in secret or in our families, we come into God's presence, and serve him; but it is in public worship especially that we enter into his gates and into his courts. Serve the Lord with gladness. By holy joy we do really serve God. Gospel-worshippers should be joyful worshippers. We must come before his presence with singing, not only songs of joy, but songs of praise. Enter into his gates with thanksgiving, v. 4. We must take it as a favour to be admitted into his service, and that we have ordinances instituted and opportunity continued of waiting upon God in those ordinances.

II. The matter of praise, and motives to it, are very important, v. 3, 5. Know you what God is in himself and what he is to you. Knowledge is the mother of devotion and of all obedience: blind sacrifices will never please a seeing God. Let us know then these six things concerning the Lord Jehovah:—1. That the Lord he is God, the only living and true God—that he is a Being infinitely perfect, self-existent, and self-sufficient, and the fountain of all being. He is an eternal Spirit, incomprehensible and independent, the first cause and last end. 2. That he is our Creator: It is he that has made us, and not we ourselves. He gave us being, he gave us this being; he is both the former of our bodies and the Father of our spirits. We did not, we could not, make ourselves. 3. That therefore he is our rightful owner. The Masorites, by altering one letter in the Hebrew, read it, He made us, and his we are, or to him we belong. Put both the readings together, and we learn that because God made us, and not we ourselves, therefore we are not our own, but his. 4. That he is our sovereign ruler: We are his people. 5. That he is our bountiful benefactor. We are the sheep of his pasture, whom he takes care of; the flock of his feeding (so it may be read). 6. That he is a God of infinite mercy and goodness (v. 5).

PSALM CI

David was certainly the penman of this psalm; it is a solemn vow which he made to God when he took upon him the charge of a family and of the kingdom. Whether it was penned when he entered upon the government, immediately after the death of Saul (as some think), or when he began to reign over all Israel, and brought up the ark to the city of David (as others think), is not material; it is an excellent plan or model for the good government of a court, or the keeping up of virtue and piety, and, by that means, good order, in it: but it is applicable to private families, it is the householder's psalm. I. The general scope of David's vow, ver. 1, 2. II. The particulars of it (ver. 3–5, 7, 8), and that he would favour and encourage such as were virtuous, ver. 6.

A psalm of David.

David here cuts out to himself and others a pattern both of a good magistrate and a good master of a family.

I. The chosen subject of the psalm (v. 1): I will sing of mercy and judgment, that is, David since he was first anointed to be king, had met with many a rebuke and much hardship on the one hand, and yet, on the other hand, had had many wonderful deliverances wrought for him and favours bestowed upon him; of these he will sing unto God. God's providences concerning his people are commonly mixed —mercy and judgment; God has set the one over-against the other, and appointed them April-days, showers and sunshine. Whatever our outward condition neither the laughter of a prosperous condition nor the tears of an afflicted condition must put us out of tune for sacred songs. It may be understood of David's mercy and judgment; he would, in this psalm, promise to be merciful, and just. Family-mercies and family-afflictions are both of them calls to family-religion.

II. The general resolution David took up to conduct himself carefully and conscientiously in his court, v. 2. We have here,

1. A good purpose concerning his conversation; he would live by rule. In his family particularly, he would walk within his house, where he was more out of the eye of the world, but where he still saw himself under the eye of God. He resolves to walk in a perfect way, in the way of God's commandments. I will behave myself wisely.

2. A good prayer: O when wilt thou come unto me? It is a desirable thing, when a man has a house of his own, to have God come to him and dwell with him in it. David, as he purposed, behaved himself wisely in all his ways; and, as he prayed, the Lord was with him.

III. His particular resolution to practise no evil himself (v. 3): "I will set no wicked thing before my eyes; I will not design nor aim at anything but what is for the glory of God and the public welfare."

IV. His further resolution not to keep bad servants, nor to employ those about him that were vicious. He will have nothing to do with spiteful malicious people, who care not what mischief they do to those they have a pique against (v. 4): "A froward heart (one that delights to be cross and perverse) shall depart from me, as not fit for society, the bond of which is love, I will not know." "Whoso privily slanders his neighbour, either raises or spreads false stories, to the prejudice of his good name, him will I cut off from my family and court." David will prevent the preferment of those that hope to curry favour with him. "Therefore him that has a high look and a proud heart will I not suffer; I will have no patience with those that are still grasping at all preferments, for it is certain that they do not aim at doing good, but only at aggrandizing themselves and their families." God resists the proud, and so will David. "He that worketh deceit, though he may insinuate himself into my family, yet, as soon as he is discovered, shall not dwell within my house." David will make use of no such persons as agents for him.

V. His resolution to put those in trust under him that were honest and good (v. 6): My eyes shall be upon the faithful in the land. The kingdom must be searched for honest men to make courtiers of; and, if any man is better than another, he must be preferred. Saul chose servants for their goodliness (1 Sam. viii. 16), but David for their goodness.

VI. His resolution to extend his zeal to the reformation of the city and country, as well as of the court (v. 8). He would be forward and zealous in promoting the reformation of manners and suppression of vice. That which he aimed at was not only the securing of his own government and the peace of the country, but the honour of God in the purity of his church, That I may cut off all wicked doers from the city of the Lord.

PSALM CII

Some think that David penned this psalm at the time of Absalom's rebellion; others that Daniel, Nehemiah, or some other prophet, penned it for the use of the church, when it was in captivity in Babylon. But it is clear, from the application of ver. 25, 26, to Christ (Heb. i. 10–12), that the psalm has reference to the days of the Messiah, and speaks either of his affliction or of the afflictions of his church for his sake. In the psalm we have, I. A sorrowful complaint which the psalmist makes, either for himself or in the name of the church, of great afflictions, ver. 1–11. II. Seasonable comfort, 1. From the eternity of God, ver. 12, 24, 27. 2. From a believing prospect of the deliverance which God would, in due time, work for his afflicted church (ver. 13–22) and the continuance of it in the world, ver. 28.

A prayer of the afflicted, when he is overwhelmed, and poureth out his complaint before the Lord.

The title of this psalm is a prayer of the afflicted. Here is a prayer put into the hands of the afflicted: let them set, not their hands, but their hearts to it, and present it to God. When our state and our spirits are overwhelmed, it is our duty by prayer to pour out our complaints before the Lord, which intimates the leave God gives us to be free with him and the liberty of speech we have before him. It intimates also what an ease it is to an afflicted spirit to unburden itself by a humble representation of its grievances and griefs.

I. The psalmist humbly begs of God to take notice of his affliction, and of his prayer in his affliction, v. 1, 2. Let us lift up the prayer, and our souls with it. If we put up a prayer in faith, we may in faith say, Hear my prayer, O Lord! "Manifest thyself for me; not only hear me, but answer me; grant me the deliverance I am in want of and in pursuit of; answer me speedily, even in the day when I call."

II. He makes a lamentable complaint of the low condition to which he was reduced by his afflictions. His body was emaciated. As prosperity and joy are represented by making fat the bones, so great trouble and grief are here represented by the contrary: My bones are burnt as a hearth (v. 3); they cleave to my skin (v. 5); nay, my heart is smitten, and withered like grass (v. 4). I am withered like grass (v. 11), scorched with the burning heat of my troubles. He was so taken up with the thoughts of his troubles that he forgot to eat his bread (v. 4); he had no appetite. He affected solitude, as melancholy people do. His friends deserted him and were shy of him (v. 6, 7): "I am like a pelican of the wilderness, or a bittern (so some) that makes a doleful noise; I am like an owl, that affects to lodge in deserted ruined buildings; I watch, and am as a sparrow upon the house-top. I live in a garret, and there spend my hours in poring on my troubles and bemoaning myself." When his friends went off from him his foes set themselves against him (v. 8). When they could not otherwise reach him they shot arrows at him, even bitter words. He fasted and wept under the tokens of God's displeasure (v. 9, 10). It was not so much the trouble itself that troubled him as the wrath of God which he was under the apprehensions of as the cause of the trouble. My days are consumed like smoke (v. 3), which vanishes away quickly. They are like a shadow that declines (v. 11), like the evening-shadow. Now all this is properly a prayer for a particular person afflicted, yet is supposed to be a description of the afflictions of the church of God, with which the psalmist sympathizes, making public grievances his own.

Many exceedingly great and precious comforts are here to balance the foregoing complaints; for unto the upright there arises light in the darkness.

I. We are dying creatures, and our interests and comforts are dying, but God is an everliving everlasting God (v. 12): "My days are like a shadow; there is no remedy; night is coming upon me; but, thou, O Lord! shalt endure for ever." God endures for ever, his church's faithful protector; and we may be confident that they shall not be neglected.

II. Poor Zion is now in distress, but there will come a time for her relief and succour (v. 13). The hope of deliverance is built upon the goodness of God and upon the power of God. There is a time set for the deliverance of the church, which will come at the time which Infinite Wisdom has appointed (and therefore it is the best time) and which Eternal Truth has fixed it to, and therefore it is a certain time, and shall not be forgotten nor further adjourned. Zion was now in ruins, that is, the temple that was built in the city of David: the favouring of Zion is the building of the temple up again, as it is explained, v. 16. Thy servants take pleasure even in the stones of the temple, though they were thrown down and scattered, and favour the dust, the very rubbish and ruins of it, v. 14. When the temple was ruined, yet the stones of it were to be had for a new building, and there were those who encouraged themselves with that. The heathen shall fear the name of the Lord, shall have better thoughts of the church of God than they have had, when God by his providence thus puts an honour upon it. They shall say, We will go with you, for we have seen that God is with you, Zech. viii. 23. All that have made his glory their highest end desire it and pray for it.

III. The prayers of God's people now seem to be slighted and no notice taken of them, but they will be reviewed and greatly encouraged (v. 17): He will regard the prayer of the destitute. They are the destitute. It is an elegant word that is here used, which signifies the heath in the wilderness, a low shrub, or bush, like the hyssop of the wall. They are in a low and broken state, enriched with spiritual blessings, but destitute of temporal good things. When we consider our own meanness, our darkness and deadness, and the manifold defects in our prayers, we have cause to suspect that our prayers will be received with disdain in heaven; but we are here assured of the contrary, for we have an advocate with the Father, and are under grace, not under the law. This shall be written for the generation to come, that none may despair, though they be destitute, nor think their prayers forgotten because they have not an answer to them immediately. Many that are now unborn, shall, by reading the history of the church, praise the Lord for his answers to prayer.

IV. The prisoners under condemnation unjustly seem as sheep appointed for the slaughter, but care shall be taken for their discharge (v. 19, 20): God has looked down from the height of his sanctuary, from heaven, to do acts of grace, to hear the groaning of the prisoners, to loose those that are appointed to death. God takes notice not only of the prayers of his afflicted people, which are the language of grace, but even of their groans, which are the language of nature. We have an instance in Peter, Acts xii. 6. If God by his providences declare his name, we must by our acknowledgments of them declare his praise, which ought to be the echo of his name. God will discharge his people that were prisoners and captives in Babylon, that they may declare his name in Zion, the place he has chosen to put his name, and his praise in Jerusalem, at their return thither. They will help to draw in others to the worship of God (v. 22): When the people of God are gathered together at Jerusalem (as they were after their return out of Babylon) many out of the kingdoms joined with them to serve the Lord (Ezra vi. 21). But look further, at the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ in the latter days. Christ has proclaimed liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to those that were bound, that they may declare the name of the Lord in the gospel-church, in which Jews and Gentiles shall unite.

I. The imminent danger that the Jewish church was in of being quite extirpated and cut off by the captivity in Babylon (v. 23): He weakened my strength in the way. This the psalmist speaks of as in his own person, and it is very applicable to common afflictions. Bodily distempers soon weaken our strength in the way. When in the midst of our days our strength is weakened, what can we expect but that the number of our months should be cut off in the midst? It has often been the lot of those that have used their strength well to have it weakened, and of those that could very ill be spared to have their days shortened.

II. A prayer for continuance (v. 24): "O my God! take me not away in the midst of my days." This is a prayer for the afflicted, that God would not take us away in the midst of our days, but that, if it be his will, he would spare us to do him further service and to be made riper for heaven.

III. A plea to enforce this prayer taken from the eternity of the Messiah promised, v. 25–27. The apostle quotes these verses (Heb. i. 10–12). It is very comfortable, in reference to all the changes and all the dangers that Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Thy years are throughout all generations, and cannot be shortened. It is comfortable in reference to the death of our own bodies, and the removal of our friends from us, that God is an ever living God, and that therefore, if he be ours, in him we may have everlasting consolation. Earth and heaven, the universe and its fulness, derive their being from God by his Son (v. 25): "Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth, which is founded on the seas and on the floods and yet it abides; much more shall the church, which is built upon a rock." God will unmake the world again (v. 26, 27): They shall perish, for thou shalt change them by the same almighty power that made them, and thou shalt endure; thou art the same. God and the world, Christ and the creature, are rivals for the innermost and uppermost place in the soul of man, the immortal soul. 1. A portion in the creature is fading and dying: They shall perish; they will not last so long as we shall last. Heaven and earth shall wax old as a garment. As a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed, altered, so that they shall be new heavens and a new earth. See God's sovereign dominion over heaven and earth. He can change them as he pleases and when he pleases; and the revolutions of day and night, summer and winter, are earnests of their last and final change, when the heavens and time (which is measured by them) shall be no more. 2. A portion in God is perpetual and everlasting: Thou art the same, subject to no change; and thy years have no end, v. 27. Christ will be the same in the performance that he was in the promise, the same to his church in captivity that he was to his church at liberty. Let not the church fear the weakening of her strength, or the shortening of her days, while Christ himself is both her strength and her life; he is the same, and has said, Because I live you shall live also.

IV. A comfortable assurance of an answer to this prayer (v. 28): The children of thy servants shall continue; since Christ is the same, the church shall continue from one generation to another; from the eternity of the head we may infer the perpetuity of the body, though often weak and distempered, and even at death's door. Those that hope to wear out the saints of the Most High will be mistaken.

PSALM CIII

This psalm calls more for devotion than exposition. The psalmist, I. Stirs up himself and his own soul to praise God (ver. 1, 2) for his favour to him in particular (ver. 3–5), to the church in general, and to all good men, to whom he is, and will be, just, and kind, and constant (ver. 6–18), and for his government of the world, ver. 19. II. He desires the assistance of the holy angels, and all the works of God, in praising him, ver. 20–22.

A psalm of David.

David is here communing with his own heart, and he is no fool that thus talks to himself.

I. How he stirs up himself to the duty of praise, v. 1, 2. It is the Lord that is to be blessed. It is the soul that is to be employed in blessing God, and all that is within us. The work requires the inward man, the whole man, and all little enough.

II. How he furnishes himself with abundant matter for praise: "Come, my soul, consider what God has done for thee." 1. "He has pardoned thy sins (v. 3); he has forgiven, and does forgive, all thy iniquities." This is mentioned first because by the pardon of sin that is taken away which kept good things from us, and we are restored to the favour of God, which bestows good things on us. He is still forgiving, as we are still sinning and repenting. 2. "He has cured thy sickness." Our crimes were capital, but God saves our lives by pardoning them; our diseases were mortal, but God saves our lives by healing them. These two go together; for, as for God, his work is perfect and not done by halves; if God take away the guilt of sin by pardoning mercy, he will break the power of it by renewing grace. 3. "He has rescued thee from danger." The redemption of the soul is precious; we cannot compass it, and therefore are the more indebted to divine grace that has wrought it out, to him who has obtained eternal redemption for us. See Job xxxiii. 24, 28. 4. "He has not only saved thee from death and ruin, but has made thee truly and completely happy, with honour, pleasure, and long life." He crowns thee with his lovingkindness and tender mercies, and what greater dignity is a poor soul capable of than to be advanced into the love and favour of God? "He has given thee a prospect and pledge of long life: Thy youth is renewed like the eagle's." The eagle is long-lived, and, as naturalists say, when she is old, casts all her feathers (as indeed she changes them every year at moulting time), and fresh ones come, so that she becomes young again. When God, by the graces and comforts of his Spirit, recovers his people from their decays, and fills them with new life and joy, an earnest of eternal life and joy, then they may be said to return to the days of their youth, Job xxxiii. 25.

Verses 6–18

I. Truly God is good to all (v. 6): He executes righteousness and judgment for all that are oppressed.

II. He is in a special manner good to Israel.

1. He has revealed himself and his grace to us (v. 7): He made known his ways unto Moses, and by him his acts to the children of Israel. Divine revelation is one of the greatest of divine favours, for God restores us to himself by revealing himself to us, and gives us all good by giving us knowledge.

2. He has never been rigorous and severe with us, but always tender, full of compassion, and ready to forgive.

(1) It is in his nature to be so (v. 8): The Lord is merciful and gracious. He is not soon angry, v. 8. He is slow to anger, bears long with those that are very provoking, defers punishing, that he may give space to repent, and does not speedily execute the sentence of his law. Though he signify his displeasure against us for our sins by the rebukes of Providence, and the reproaches of our own consciences, yet he will not always keep us in pain and terror, but, after the spirit of bondage, will give the spirit of adoption.

(2) We have found him so; he has not dealt with us after our sins, v. 10. He has not inflicted the judgments which we have merited; God's patience should lead us to repentance, Rom. ii. 4.

3. He has pardoned our sins, not only my iniquity (v. 3), but our transgressions, v. 12. As the heaven is high above the earth (v. 11) (so high that the earth is but a point to the vast expanse), so God's mercy is above the merits of those that fear him most, so much above and beyond them that there is no proportion at all between them. The fulness of his pardons, an evidence of the riches of his mercy (v. 12): As far as the east is from the west so far has he removed our transgressions from us, so that they shall never be laid to our charge, nor rise up in judgment against us. If we thoroughly forsake them, God will thoroughly forgive them.

4. He has pitied our sorrows, v. 13, 14. God is a Father to those that fear him and owns them for his children, and he is tender of them as a father. The father pities his children that are weak in knowledge and instructs them, pities them when they are froward and bears with them, pities them when they are sick and comforts them (Isa. lxvi. 13), pities them when they have fallen and helps them up again, pities them when they have offended, and, upon their submission, forgives them, pities them when they are wronged and gives them redress; thus the Lord pities those that fear him. He has reason to know our frame, for he framed us; and, having himself made man of the dust, he remembers that he is dust.

5. He has perpetuated his covenant-mercy and thereby provided relief for our frailty, v. 15–18. As for man, his days are as grass, which grows out of the earth, rises but a little way above it, and soon withers. Man, in his best estate, is but like a flower of the field, which, though distinguished a little from the grass, will wither with it. The flower of the garden is commonly more choice and valuable, and, though in its own nature withering, will last the longer for its being sheltered by the garden wall and the gardener's care; but the flower of the field (to which life is here compared) is not only withering in itself, but exposed to the cold blasts, and liable to be cropped and trodden on by the beasts of the field. Man's life is not only wasting of itself, but its period may be anticipated by a thousand accidents. God considers this, and pities him; let him consider it himself, and be humble. How long and lasting God's mercy is to his people (v. 17, 18): it will continue longer than their lives, and will survive their present state. Those only shall have the benefit of God's promises that make conscience of his precepts. The continuance of the mercy which belongs to such as these; it will last them longer than their lives on earth, and therefore they need not be troubled though their lives be short, since death itself will be no abridgement, no infringement, of their bliss. God's mercy is better than life, for it will out-live it.

I. The doctrine of universal providence laid down, v. 19. He has secured the happiness of his peculiar people by promise and covenant, but the order of mankind, and the world in general, he secures by common providence. The Lord has a throne of his own, a throne of glory, a throne of government. But though God's throne is in heaven, and there he keeps his court, and thither we are to direct to him (Our Father who art in heaven), yet his kingdom rules over all. He takes cognizance of all the inhabitants, and all the affairs, of this lower world. His kingdom rules over all.

II. The duty of universal praise inferred from it: if all are under God's dominion, all must do him homage.

1. Let the holy angels praise him (v. 20, 21): not as if they needed any excitement of ours to praise God, they do it continually; but thus David expresses his high thoughts of God as worthy of the adorations of the holy angels.

2. Let all his works praise him (v. 22), that is, all the children of men, in all parts of the world, let them all praise God; yea, and the inferior creatures too, which are God's works also; let them praise him objectively, though they cannot praise him actually, cxlv. 10. He began with Bless the Lord, O my soul! and, when he had penned and sung this excellent hymn to his honour, David does not say, Now, O my soul! thou hast blessed the Lord, sit down, and rest thee, but, Bless the Lord, O my soul! yet more and more.

PSALM CIV

It is very probable that this psalm was penned by the same hand, and at the same time, as the former; for as that ended this begins, with "Bless the Lord, O my soul!" and concludes with it too. The style indeed is somewhat different, because the matter is so: the scope of the foregoing psalm was to celebrate the goodness of God and his tender mercy and compassion, to which a soft and sweet style was most agreeable; the scope of this is to celebrate his greatness, and majesty, and sovereign dominion, which ought to be done in the most stately lofty strains of poetry. God is there praised as the God of grace, here as the God of nature. This noble poem is thought by very competent judges greatly to excel, not only for piety and devotion (that is past dispute), but for flight of fancy, and all the beauties and ornaments of expression, the Greek and Latin poets upon any subject of this nature. Many great things the psalmist here gives God the glory of. I. The splendour of his majesty in the upper world, ver. 1–4. II. The creation of the sea and the dry land, ver. 5–9. III. The provision he makes for the maintenance of all the creatures according to their nature, ver. 10–18 and again ver. 27, 28. IV. The regular course of the sun and moon, ver. 19–24. V. The furniture of the sea, ver. 25, 26. VI. God's sovereign power over all the creatures, ver. 29–32. And, lastly, he concludes with a pleasant and firm resolution to continue praising God (ver. 33–35).

Verses 1–9

When we are addressing ourselves to any religious service we must stir up ourselves to take hold on God in it (Isa. lxiv. 7); so David does here.

I. The psalmist looks up to the divine glory shining in the upper world, of which, though it is one of the things not seen, faith is the evidence. With what reverence and holy awe does he begin his meditation: O Lord my God! thou art very great! Princes appear great, 1. In their robes; and what are God's robes? Thou art clothed with honour and majesty, v. 1. Thou coverest thyself with light as with a garment, v. 2. God dwells in light (1 Tim. vi. 16); he clothes himself with it. 2. In their palaces or pavilions; and what is God's palace and his pavilion? He stretches out the heavens like a curtain, v. 2. So he did at first, when he made the firmament, which in the Hebrew has its name from its being expanded, or stretched out, Gen. i. 7. God covers himself with light, yet, in compassion to us, he makes darkness his pavilion. Thick clouds are a covering to him. The vastness of this pavilion may lead us to consider how great, how very great, he is that fills heaven and earth. Though air and water are fluid bodies, yet, by the divine power, they are kept as tight and as firm in the place assigned them as a chamber is with beams and rafters. How great a God is he whose presence-chamber is thus reared, thus fixed! 3. In their coaches of state, with their stately horses, which add much to the magnificence of their entries; but God makes the clouds his chariots. He descended in a cloud, as in a chariot, to Mount Sinai, to give the law, and to Mount Tabor, to proclaim the gospel (Matt. xvii. 5), and he walks (a gentle pace indeed, yet stately) upon the wings of the wind. 4. In their retinue or train of attendants; and here also God is very great, for (v. 4) he makes his angels spirits.

II. He looks down, and looks about, to the power of God shining in this lower world.

1. He has founded the earth, v. 5. Though he has hung it upon nothing (Job xxvi. 2), yet it is as immovable as if it had been laid upon the surest foundations. Though it has received a dangerous shock by the sin of man, and the malice of hell strikes at it, yet it shall not be removed for ever, that is, not till the end of time, when it must give way to the new earth.

2. He has set bounds to the sea; for that also is his. (1) He brought it within bounds in the creation. God said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered to one place, and let the dry land appear, Gen. i. 9. This command of God is here called his rebuke, as if he gave it because he was displeased that the earth was not fit for man to dwell on. Power went along with this word, and therefore it is also called here the voice of his thunder, v. 7. At thy rebuke, as if they were made sensible that they were out of their place, they fled. As it is said on another occasion (lxxvii. 16), The waters saw thee, O God! the waters saw thee; they were afraid. So here; God rebuked the waters for man's sake, to prepare room for him. (2) He keeps it within bounds, v. 9. The waters are forbidden to pass over the limits set them; they may not, and therefore they do not, turn again to cover the earth.

Verses 10–18

I. He provides fresh water: He sends the springs into the valleys, v. 10. It is God that sends the springs into the brooks, which walk by easy steps between the hills, and receive increase from the rain-water that descends from them. These give drink, not only to man, and those creatures that are immediately useful to him, but to every beast of the field (v. 11); for where God has given life he provides a livelihood.

II. He provides food convenient for them, both for man and beast: He waters the hills from his chambers (v. 13), from those chambers spoken of (v. 3), the beams of which he lays in the waters, those store-chambers, the clouds that distil fruitful showers. It is a satisfaction to the earth to bear the fruit of God's works for the benefit of man, for thus it answers the end of its creation.

1. For the cattle there is grass, and the beasts of prey, that live not on grass, feed on those that do; for man there is herb, wine, and oil, and bread, v. 15. We have a necessary dependence upon God for all the supports of this life. Let us also consider that we are in this respect fellow-commoners with the beasts; the same earth, the same spot of ground, that brings grass for the cattle, brings corn for man.

2. The divine providence not only furnishes animals with their proper food, but vegetables also with theirs (v. 16): The trees of the Lord are full of sap, not only men's trees, which they take care of and have an eye to, in their orchards, and parks, and other enclosures, but God's trees, which grow in the wildernesses, and are taken care of only by his providence: they are full of sap and want no nourishment. Even the cedars of Lebanon have enough from the earth; they are trees which he has planted, and which therefore he will protect and provide for. We may apply this to the trees of righteousness, which are the planting of the Lord, planted in his vineyard; these are full of sap, for what God plants he will water, and those that are planted in the house of the Lord shall flourish in the courts of our God, xcii. 13.

III. He takes care that they shall have suitable habitations to dwell in. To men God has given discretion to build for themselves and for the cattle that are serviceable to them; but there are some creatures which God more immediately provides a settlement for. 1. The birds. Some birds, by instinct, make their nests in the bushes near rivers (v. 12): By the springs that run among the hills some of the fowls of heaven have their habitation, which sing among the branches. They sing, according to their capacity, to the honour of their Creator and benefactor, and their singing may shame our silence. Our heavenly Father feeds them (Matt. vi. 26). Those that fly heavenward shall not want resting-places. The stork is particularly mentioned; the fir-trees, which are very high, are her house, her castle. 2. The smaller sorts of beasts (v. 18): The wild goats are guided by instinct to the high hills, which are a refuge to them; and the rabbits, which are also helpless animals, find shelter in the rocks, where they can set the beasts of prey at defiance. Does God provide thus for the inferior creatures; and will he not himself be a refuge and dwelling-place to his own people?

Verses 19–30

We are here taught to praise and magnify God,

I. For the constant revolutions and succession of day and night, and the dominion of sun and moon over them. The heathen worshipped them as deities; and therefore the scripture takes all occasions to show that the gods they worshipped are the creatures and servants of the true God (v. 19). 1. The shadows of the evening befriend the repose of the night (v. 20): Thou makest darkness and it is night, which, though black, contributes to the beauty of nature, and is as a foil to the light of the day; and under the protection of the night all the beasts of the forest creep forth to feed, which they are afraid to do in the day. 2. The light of the morning befriends the business of the day (v. 22, 23): The sun arises (for, as he knows his going down, so, thanks be to God, he knows his rising again), and then the wild beasts betake themselves to their rest. The beasts of prey creep forth with fear; man goes forth with boldness, as one that has dominion.

II. For the replenishing of the ocean (v. 25, 26): As the earth is full of God's riches, so is this great and wide sea. God has appointed it its place and made it serviceable to man both for navigation, and also to be his storehouse for fish. God made not the sea in vain, any more than the earth.

III. For the seasonable and plentiful provision which is made for all the creatures, v. 27, 28. God is a bountiful benefactor to them: He gives them their meat; he opens his hand and they are filled with good. Even the meanest creatures are not below his cognizance. They all wait upon him. They seek their food, according to the natural instinct God has put into them and in the proper season for it.

IV. For the absolute power and sovereign dominion which he has over all the creatures, by which every species is still continued, though the individuals of each are daily dying and dropping off. Thou takest away their breath, which is in thy hand, and then, and not till then, they die and return to their dust, to their first principles. The spirit of the beast, which goes downward, is at God's command, as well as the spirit of a man, which goes upward. Though one generation of them passes away, another comes, and from time to time they are created; new ones rise up instead of the old ones, and this is a continual creation. Thus the face of the earth is renewed from day to day by the light of the sun (which beautifies it anew every morning), from year to year by the products of it, which enrich it anew every spring and put quite another face upon it from what it had all winter.

In the midst of this discourse the psalmist breaks out into wonder at the works of God (v. 24): O Lord! how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all.

Verses 31–35

The psalmist concludes this meditation with:

I. Praise to God: The glory of the Lord shall endure for ever, v. 31. It shall endure to the end of time in his works of creation and providence; it shall endure to eternity in the felicity and adorations of saints and angels. Man's glory is fading; God's glory is everlasting. The Lord shall rejoice in his works. We often do that which, upon review, we cannot rejoice in, but are displeased at, and wish undone again. But God always rejoices in his works, because they are all done in wisdom. As a God of almighty power (v. 32): He looks on the earth, and it trembles, as unable to bear his frowns—trembles, as Sinai did, at the presence of the Lord. He touches the hills, and they smoke. The volcanoes, or burning mountains, such as Etna, are emblems of the power of God's wrath, fastening upon proud unhumbled sinners. Who knows the power of his anger? Who then dares set it at defiance? Because we have our being from God, and depend upon him for the support and continuance of it, as long as we live and have our being we must continue to praise God; and when we have no life, no being, on earth, we hope to have a better life and better being in a better world and there to be doing this work in a better manner and in better company.

II. Joy to himself (v. 34): My meditation of him shall be sweet; it shall be fixed and close; it shall be affecting and influencing; and therefore it shall be sweet. "I will be glad in the Lord; it shall be a pleasure to me to praise him; I will be glad of all opportunities to set forth his glory; and I will rejoice in the Lord always and in him only."

III. Terror to the wicked (v. 35): Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth; and let the wicked be no more. None can prosper that harden themselves against the Almighty. When the wicked are no more I hope to be praising God world without end; and therefore, Praise you the Lord; let all about me join with me in praising God. Hallelujah; sing praise to Jehovah. This is the first time that we meet with Hallelujah.

PSALM CV

This is a long psalm; the general scope is the same with most of the psalms, to set forth the glory of God, but the subject-matter is particular. Every time we come to the throne of grace we may, if we please, furnish ourselves out of the word of God with new songs. In the foregoing psalm we are taught to praise God for his wondrous works of common providence with reference to the world in general. In this we are directed to praise him for his special favours to his church. We find the first eleven verses of this psalm in the beginning of that psalm which David delivered to Asaph to be used (as it should seem) in the daily service of the sanctuary when the ark was fixed in the place he had prepared for it, 1 Chron. xvi. 7. David by it designed to instruct his people in the obligations they lay under to adhere faithfully to their holy religion. Here is the preface (ver. 1–7) and the history itself in several articles. I. God's covenant with the patriarchs, ver. 8–11. II. His care of them while they were strangers, ver. 12–15. III. His raising up Joseph to be the shepherd and stone of Israel, ver. 16–22. IV. The increase of Israel in Egypt and their deliverance out of Egypt, ver. 23–38. V. The care he took of them in the wilderness and their settlement in Canaan, ver. 39–45.

Verses 1–7

I. Give unto God the glory due unto his name. 1. We must give thanks to him, as one who has always been our bountiful benefactor. 2. Call upon his name, as one whom you depend upon for further favours. Praying for further mercies is an acknowledgement of former mercies. 3. Make known his deeds (v. 1), that others may join with you in praising him. Talk of all his wondrous works (v. 2), as we talk of things that we are full of. We should talk of them as we sit in the house and as we go by the way (Deut. vi. 7). 4. Sing psalms to God's honour, as those that rejoice in him, and desire to testify that joy and to transmit it to posterity, as memorable things anciently were handed down by songs, when writing was scarce. 5. Glory in his holy name; glory not of their own achievements, but of their acquaintance with God and their relation to him, Jer. ix. 23, 24. 6. Seek him; place your happiness in him, and then pursue that happiness. Seek his strength, that is, his grace, the strength of his Spirit to work in you that which is good, which we cannot do but by strength derived from him. "Seek his face evermore. Seek it while you live in this world, and you shall have it while you live in the other world, and even there shall be for ever seeking it in an infinite progression, and be ever satisfied." 7. Let the hearts of those rejoice that do seek him (v. 3); for they have chosen well. If those have reason to rejoice that seek the Lord, much more those that have found him.

II. Some arguments to quicken us to these duties. 1. "Consider both what he has said and what he has done to engage us for ever to him. Remember the wonders of his providence which he has wrought for you and those who are gone before you—the wonders of his law, which he has written to you, and entrusted you with, the judgments of his mouth, as well as the judgments of his hand," v. 5. 2. "Consider the relation you stand in to him (v. 6): You are the seed of Abraham his servant; the children of Jacob his chosen, chosen and beloved for the fathers' sake, and therefore ought to tread in the steps of those whose honours you inherit. You are the children of godly parents; do not degenerate. You are God's church upon earth, and, if you do not praise him, who should?"

We are here taught, in praising God, to look a great way back, and to give him the glory of what he did for his church in former ages, especially when it was in the founding and forming. We may fetch proper matter for praise from the histories of the gospels and the acts of the apostles, which relate the birth of the Christian church, as the psalmist here does from the histories of Genesis and Exodus, which relate the birth of the Jewish church.

I. God's promise to the patriarchs, that he would give to their seed the land of Canaan for an inheritance, was a type of the promise of eternal life made in Christ to all believers. In all the marvellous works which God did for Israel he remembered his covenant (v. 8) and he will remember it for ever. In the parallel place it is expressed as our duty (1 Chron. xvi. 15), Be you mindful always of his covenant. The promise is here called a covenant, because there was something required on man's part as the condition of the promise. See to whom God swore by himself, Heb. vi. 13, 14. The covenant itself: Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, v. 11. The patriarchs had a right to it, not by providence, but by promise; and their seed should be put in possession of it, as the lot of their inheritance, a sure title, by virtue of their birth; it shall come to them by the favour of God, and not any merit of their own. Heaven is the inheritance we have obtained, Eph. i. 11. And this is the promise which God has promised us (as Canaan was the promise he promised them), even eternal life, 1 John ii. 25; Tit. i. 2.

II. His providences concerning the patriarchs while they were waiting for the accomplishment of this promise, which represent to us the care God takes of his people in this world, while they are yet on this side the heavenly Canaan; for these things happened unto them for examples and encouragements to all the heirs of promise, that live by faith as they did.

1. They were wonderfully protected and sheltered, and (as the Jewish masters express it) gathered under the wings of the divine Majesty. This is accounted for, v. 12-15. They were exposed to injuries from men. To the three renowned patriarchs, Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, God's promises were very rich; again and again he told them he would be their God. Even in this world he was not wanting to them, but that he might appear, to do uncommon things for them, he exercised them with uncommon trials. (1) They were few, very few. Abraham was called alone (Isa. li. 2). (2) They were strangers, and therefore were the most likely to be abused. Their religion made them to be looked upon as strangers (1 Pet. iv. 4) and to be hooted at as speckled birds, Jer. xii. 9. (3) They were unsettled (v. 13): They went from one nation to another, from one part of that land to another, from one kingdom to another people, from Canaan to Egypt, from Egypt to the land of the Philistines, forced to it by famine. They were guarded by the special providence of God, v. 14, 15. They were not able to help themselves and yet, (4) No men were suffered to wrong them, but even those that hated them, had their hands tied, and could not do what they would. This may refer to Gen. xxxv. 5, where we find that the terror of God was upon the cities that were round about them, so that, though provoked, they did not pursue after the sons of Jacob. (5) Even crowned heads, that did offer to wrong them, were controlled and baffled. He reproved kings for their sakes in dreams and visions, saying, "Touch not my anointed; do my prophets no harm." Pharaoh king of Egypt was plagued (Gen. xii. 17) and Abimelech king of Gerar was sharply rebuked (Gen. xx. 6) for doing wrong to Abraham.

2. They were wonderfully provided for and supplied. To try the faith of the patriarchs, God broke the whole staff of bread, even in that good land. God graciously took care for their relief. It was in obedience to his precept, and in dependence upon his promise, that they were now sojourners in Canaan, and therefore he could not in honour suffer any good thing to be wanting to them. As he restrained one Pharaoh from doing them wrong, so he raised up another to do them a kindness, by preferring and entrusting Joseph, of whose story we have here an abstract. Many years before the famine began, he was sent before them, to nourish them in the famine. He went not so much as a factor or commissary; but he was sold thither for a servant, a slave for term of life, without any prospect of being ever set at liberty. And yet he was brought lower; he was made a prisoner (v. 18): His feet they hurt with fetters. Being unjustly charged with a rape upon his mistress, the iron entered into his soul, that is, was very painful to him; yet all this was the way to his preferment. He continued a prisoner, neither tried nor bailed, until the time appointed of God for his release (v. 19), when his word came, that is, his interpretations of dreams came to pass, and the report thereof came to Pharaoh's ears by the chief butler. And then the word of the Lord cleared him; that is, the power God gave him to foretell things to come rolled away the reproach his mistress had loaded him with; for it could not be thought that God would give such a power to so bad a man as he was represented to be. God's word tried him, tried his faith and patience, and then it came in power to give command for his release. There is a time set when God's word will come for the comfort of all that trust in it, Hab. ii. 3. At the end it shall speak, and not lie. God gave the word, and then the king sent and loosed him. Pharaoh, finding him to be a favourite of Heaven, let him go free. He advanced him to the highest posts of honour, v. 21, 22, lord high chamberlain of his household. He made him prime minister of state. In all this Joseph was designed to save the house of Israel from perishing by the famine. Joseph being thus sent before, and put into a capacity of maintaining all his father's house, Israel also came into Egypt (v. 23), where he and all his were comfortably provided for many years.

Verses 25-45

After the history of the patriarchs follows the history of the people of Israel, when they grew into a nation.

I. Their affliction in Egypt (v. 25): He turned the heart of the Egyptians, who had protected them, to hate them and deal subtilely with them. God's goodness to his people exasperated the Egyptians against them. They dealt subtilely with them, to find out ways and means to weaken them and prevent their growth; they made their burdens heavy and their lives bitter, and slew their male children as soon as they were born.

II. Their deliverance out of Egypt, that it might never be forgotten, is put into the preface to the ten commandments.

1. The instruments employed in that deliverance (v. 26): He sent Moses his servant on this errand and joined Aaron in commission with him. Moses was designed to be their lawgiver and chief magistrate, Aaron to be their chief priest.

2. The means of accomplishing that deliverance; these were the plagues of Egypt. They showed the words of his signs (so it is in the original), for every plague had an exposition going along with it; they spoke loud. They are all or most of them here specified, though not in the order in which they were inflicted. (1) The plague of darkness, v. 28. This was one of the last, though here mentioned first. They were not obedient to his word, which may be applied to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who, notwithstanding the terror of this plague, would not let the people go. (2) The turning of the river Nilus (which they idolized) into blood, which slew their fish (v. 29), Num. xi. 5. (3) The frogs, shoals of which their land brought forth. (4) Flies of divers sorts swarmed in their air, and lice in their clothes, v. 31; Exod. viii.

17, 24. (5) Hail-stones shattered their trees, even the strongest timber-trees in their coasts, and killed their vines, and their other fruit-trees, v. 32, 33; Exod. ix. 23. (6) Locusts and caterpillars destroyed all the herbs which were made for the service of man and ate the bread out of their mouths, v. 34, 35. (7) Having mentioned all the plagues but those of the murrain and boils, he concludes with that which gave the conquering stroke, and that was the death of the first-born, v. 36.

3. The mercies that accompanied this deliverance. They had been impoverished, and yet they came out rich and wealthy. God not only brought them forth, but he brought them forth with silver and gold, v. 37. Their lives had been made bitter to them, and their bodies and spirits broken by their bondage; and yet, when God brought them forth, there was not one feeble person, none sick, none so much as sickly, among their tribes. They had been trampled upon and insulted over; and yet they were brought out with honour (v. 38). They had spent their days in sorrow and in sighing, by reason of their bondage; but now he brought them forth with joy and gladness, v. 43.

4. The special care God took of them in the wilderness. He spread a cloud for a covering (v. 39), which was to them not only a screen and umbrella, but a cloth of state. A cloud was often God's pavilion (xviii. 11) and now it was Israel's. He appointed a pillar of fire to give light in the night. He fed them both with necessaries and dainties (v. 40). He opened the rock, and the waters gushed out, v. 41.

5. Their entrance, at length, into Canaan (v. 44): He gave them the lands of the heathen.

6. The reasons why God did all this for them. (1) Because he would himself perform the promises of the world, v. 42. Because he remembered the word of his holiness (that is, his covenant) with Abraham his servant, he would not suffer one iota or tittle of that to fall to the ground. See Deut. vii. 8. (2) Because he would have them to perform the precepts of the word, to bind them to which was the greatest kindness he could put upon them. God having thus done them good, they might the more cheerfully receive his law, designed for their good, and might be sensible of their obligations in gratitude to live in obedience to him. We are therefore made, maintained, and redeemed, that we may live in obedience to the will of God; and the hallelujah with which the psalm concludes may be taken as a thankful acknowledgment of God's favours.

PSALM CVI

We must give glory to God by making confession, not only of his goodness but our own badness. The foregoing psalm was a history of God's goodness to Israel; this is a history of their rebellions and provocations, and yet it begins and ends with Hallelujah; for even sorrow for sin must not put us out of tune for praising God. In this psalm we have, I. The preface to the narrative, speaking honour to God (ver. 1, 2), comfort to the saints (ver. 3), and the desire of the faithful towards God's favour, ver. 4, 5. II. The narrative itself of the sins of Israel, aggravated by the great things God did for them, an account of which is intermixed. Their provocations at the Red Sea (ver. 6–12), lusting (ver. 13–15), mutinying (ver. 16–18), worshipping the golden calf (ver. 19–23), murmuring (ver. 24–27), joining themselves to Baal-peor (ver. 28–31), quarrelling with Moses (ver. 32, 33), incorporating themselves with the nations of Canaan, ver. 34–39. To this is added an account how God had rebuked them for their sins, and yet saved them from ruin, ver. 40–46. III. The conclusion of the psalm with prayer and praise, ver. 47, 48.

Verses 1–5

I. Bless God (v. 1, 2). Give him thanks for his goodness. Give him the glory of his greatness, his mighty acts. When we have said the most we can of the mighty acts of the Lord, the one half is not told.

II. Bless the people of God, account them happy (v. 3). God's people are those whose principles are sound—They keep judgment; they do righteousness, are just to God and to all men, and herein they are steady and constant.

III. Bless ourselves in the favour of God, place our happiness in it, and seek it, accordingly, with all seriousness, v. 4, 5. As there are a people in the world who are in a peculiar manner God's people, so there is a peculiar favour which God bears to that people, which all gracious souls desire an interest in. O visit me with thy salvation. That salvation be my portion for ever (v. 5): "That I may see the good of thy chosen and be as happy as the saints are; and happier I do not desire to be."

Verses 6–12

A penitential confession of sin, which was in a special manner seasonable now that the church was in distress; thus we must justify God in all that he brings upon us, acknowledging that therefore he has done right, because we have done wickedly.

1. God's afflicted people here own themselves guilty before God (v. 6): "We have sinned with our fathers. We have committed iniquity, that which is in its own nature sinful, and we have sinned with a high hand presumptuously."

II. They bewail the sins of their fathers when they were first formed into a people.

1. The strange stupidity of Israel in the midst of the favours God bestowed upon them (v. 7): They understood not thy wonders in Egypt. They thought the plagues of Egypt were intended for their deliverance, whereas they were intended also for their instruction and conviction, not only to force them out of their Egyptian slavery, but to cure them of their inclination to Egyptian idolatry. We lose the benefit of providences for want of understanding them. And, as their understandings were dull, so their memories were treacherous; they remembered not the multitude of God's mercies in them.

2. Their perverseness arising from this stupidity: They provoked him at the sea, even at the Red Sea. The provocation was, despair of deliverance and wishing they had been left in Egypt still, Exod. xiv. 11, 12. They reproach him, as if all that power had no mercy in it, but he had brought them out of Egypt on purpose to kill them in the wilderness.

3. The great salvation God wrought for them notwithstanding their provocations, v. 8–11. He forced a passage for them through the sea. He interposed between them and their pursuers, and prevented them from cutting them off, as they designed. The Red Sea, which was a lane to them, was a grave to the Egyptians (v. 11) (Exod. xiv. 30). Though they did not deserve this favour, he designed it; and their undeservings should not alter his designs, nor make him withdraw his promise, or fail in the performance of it. Moses prays (Num. xiv. 17, 19), Let the power of my Lord be great and pardon the iniquity of this people. The power of the God of grace in pardoning sin and sparing sinners is as much to be admired as the power of the God of nature in dividing the waters.

4. The good impression this made upon them for the present (v. 12): Then believed they his words, and acknowledged that God was with them of a truth, and had, in mercy to them, brought them out of Egypt, and not with any design to slay them in the wilderness. Then they sang his praise, in that song of Moses penned on this great occasion, Exod. xv. 1.

Verses 13–33

This is an abridgment of the history of Israel's provocations in the wilderness, and this abridgment is abridged by the apostle, with application to us Christians (1 Cor. x. 5, &c.).

I. The cause of their sin was disregard to the works and word of God, v. 13. 1. They minded not what he had done for them: They soon forgot his works. They made haste; their expectations anticipated God's promises; they expected to be in Canaan shortly, and because they were not they questioned whether they should ever be there. Again (v. 21, 22): They forgot God their Saviour. Those that forget the works of God forget God himself, who makes himself known by his works. 2. They minded not what God had said to them nor would they depend upon it: They waited not for his counsel. They had not patience to tarry God's time. The difficulties were looked upon as insuperable.

II. Many of their sins are here mentioned, together with the tokens of God's displeasure which they fell under for those sins.

1. They would have flesh, and yet would not believe that God would give it to them (v. 14). They were also, in all probability, within a step of Canaan, yet had not patience to stay for dainties till they came thither. Now how did God show his displeasure against them for this. We are told how (v. 15): He gave them their request, but gave it them in anger, and with a curse, for he sent leanness into their soul; he filled them with uneasiness of mind, and terror of conscience, and a self-reproach. Or this is put for that great plague with which the Lord smote them, while the flesh was yet between their teeth, as we read, Num. xi. 33.

2. They quarrelled with the government which God had set over them both in church and state (v. 16): They envied Moses his authority in the camp, as generalissimo and chief justice; they envied Aaron his power, as saint of the Lord, consecrated to the office of high priest, and Korah would needs put in for the pontificate, while Dathan and Abiram, as princes of the tribe of Reuben, Jacob's eldest son, would claim to be chief magistrates. How did God show his displeasure for this? We are told how (v. 17, 18); we have the story, Num. xvi. 32, 35. Those that flew in the face of the civil authority were punished by the earth, which opened and swallowed them up. Those that would usurp the ecclesiastical authority in things pertaining to God suffered the vengeance of heaven, and the pretending sacrificers were themselves sacrificed to divine justice.

3. They made and worshipped the golden calf, and this in Horeb, where the law was given, and where God had expressly said, Thou shalt neither make any graven image nor bow down to it; they did both: They made a calf and worshipped it, v. 19. Herein they put an affront upon the two great lights which God has made to rule the moral world: That of human reason; for they changed their glory, their God, into the similitude of Apis, one of the Egyptian idols, an ox that eateth grass, than which nothing could be more grossly and scandalously absurd, v. 20. That of divine revelation, which was afforded to them, not only in the words God spoke to them, but in the works he wrought for them, v. 21, 22. For this God showed his displeasure by declaring the decree that he would cut them off from being a people, as they had, as far as lay in their power, in effect cut him off from being a God; he spoke of destroying them (v. 23), and certainly he would have done it if Moses, his chosen, had not stood before him in the breach (v. 23). See the power of prayer, and the interest which God's chosen have in heaven. See a type of Christ, God's chosen, his elect, in whom his soul delights, who stood before him in the breach to turn away his wrath from a provoking world, and ever lives, for this end, making intercession.

4. They gave credit to the report of the evil spies concerning the land of Canaan, in contradiction to the promise of God (v. 24), and therefore were for making a captain and returning to Egypt again, basely charging God with a design upon them in bringing them thither that they might become a prey to the Canaanites, Num. xiv. 2, 3. And, when they were reminded of God's power and promise, they were so far from hearkening to that voice of the Lord that they attempted to stone those who spoke to them, Num. xiv. 10. This also was displeasing to God, for he swore in his wrath that they should not enter into his rest (xcv. 11; Num. xiv. 28); and he threatened that their children also should be overthrown and scattered (v. 26, 27), and the whole nation dispersed; but Moses prevailed for mercy for their seed, that they might enter Canaan.

5. They were guilty of a great sin in the matter of Peor; and this was the sin of the new generation, when they were within a step of Canaan (v. 28): They joined themselves to Baal-peor, and so were entangled both in idolatry and in adultery, in corporeal and in spiritual whoredom, Num. xxv. 1–3. Those that did often partake of the altar of the living God now ate the sacrifices of the dead, of the idols of Moab (that were dead images, or dead men canonized or deified), or sacrifices to the infernal deities on the behalf of their dead friends. Thus they provoked God to anger with their inventions (v. 29). A plague among them, in a little time swept away 24,000 of those impudent sinners. God stirred up Phinehas to use his power as a magistrate for the suppressing of the sin and checking the contagion of it. He stood up in his zeal for the Lord of hosts, and executed judgment upon Zimri and Cozbi, a service so pleasing to God that upon it the plague was stayed, v. 30. But, Phinehas herein signalizing himself, a special mark of honour was put upon him, for what he did was counted to him for righteousness to all generations (v. 31).

6. Their continued murmurings to the very last of their wanderings; for in the fortieth year they angered God at the waters of strife (v. 32), which refers to that story, Num. xx. 3–5. It went ill with Moses for their sakes; for, though he was the meekest of all the men in the earth, yet their clamours at that time were so peevish and provoking that they put him into a passion, and, having now grown very old and off his guard, he spoke unadvisedly with his lips (v. 33). For he said in a heat, Hear now, you rebels, must we fetch water out of this rock for you? God shows his displeasure against this sin of theirs by shutting Moses and Aaron out of Canaan for their misconduct upon this occasion. If he deals thus severely with Moses for one unadvised word, what does their sin deserve who have spoken so many presumptuous wicked words? God deprived them of the blessing of Moses's guidance and government at a time when they most needed it, so that his death was more a punishment to them than to himself.

I. The narrative concludes with an account of Israel's conduct in Canaan, which was of a piece with that in the wilderness, and God's dealings with them, wherein, as all along, both justice and mercy appeared.

1. They were very provoking to God. By the time they were just settled in Canaan they corrupted themselves, and forsook God. They spared the nations which God had doomed to destruction (v. 34). They promised themselves that, notwithstanding this, they would not join in any dangerous affinity with them. The next news we hear is, They were mingled among the heathen, made leagues with them and contracted an intimacy with them, so that they learned their works, v. 35. They thought they would never join with them in their worship; but by degrees they learned that too (v. 36). That sin drew on many more, and brought the judgments of God upon them. When they joined with them in some of their idolatrous services, they little thought that ever they should be guilty of that barbarous and inhuman piece of idolatry the sacrificing of their living children to their dead gods; but they came to that at last (v. 37, 38). They sacrificed their sons and daughters, pieces of themselves, to devils, and added the most unnatural murder to their idolatry. They shed innocent blood, the most innocent, for it was infant-blood, nay, it was the blood of their sons and daughters. Their sin was, in part, their own punishment; for by it The land was polluted with blood, v. 38. They wronged their consciences (v. 39), and so debauched their own minds, and were rendered odious in the eyes of the holy God.

2. God brought his judgments upon them; and what else could be expected? He was angry with them, for from them he took it as more ungrateful than from the heathen that never knew him. He abhorred his own inheritance. This is the worst thing in sin, that it makes us loathsome to God; and the nearer any are to God in profession the more loathsome are they if they rebel against him, like a dunghill at our door. Their enemies then fell upon them, and their defence having departed, made an easy prey of them (v. 41, 42): He gave them into the hands of the heathen. The punishment answered to the sin. They mingled with the heathen and learned their works; and therefore God justly made use of them as the instruments of their correction. The heathen hated them. Apostates lose all the love on God's side, and get none on Satan's; and when those that hated them ruled over them, no marvel that they oppressed them. When God granted them some relief, yet they went on in their sins, and their troubles also were continued, v. 43. This refers to the days of the Judges, when God often raised up deliverers and wrought deliverances for them, and yet they relapsed to idolatry. Those that will not by repentance humble themselves, are justly debased. At length they cried unto God, and God returned in favour to them, v. 44–46. They were chastened for their sins, but not destroyed, cast down, but not cast off. God heard their cry with tender compassion (Exod. iii. 7) and overlooked their provocations. Though he is not a man that he should repent, so as to change his mind, yet he is a gracious God, who pities us, and changes his way. Bad as they were, he would not break with them, because he would not break his own promise. He not only restrained the remainder of their enemies' wrath, but he infused compassion even into their stony hearts, and made them relent, which was more than any art of man could have done.

II. The psalm concludes with prayer and praise. 1. Prayer for the completing of his people's deliverance. Many who were forced into foreign countries, in the times of the Judges (as Naomi was, Ruth i. 1), had not returned in the beginning of David's reign, and therefore it was seasonable to pray, Lord, gather the dispersed Israelites from among the heathen, to give thanks to thy holy name, in the Lord's house, from which they were now banished. 2. Praise for the beginning and progress of it (v. 48): Blessed be the Lord God of Israel from everlasting to everlasting. Let the priests say this, and then let all the people say, Amen, Hallelujah.

PSALM CVII

The psalmist here observes some of the instances of his providential care of the children of men in general, especially in their distresses; for he is the God of the whole earth, and a common Father to all mankind. There were those who pertained not to the commonwealth of Israel and yet were worshippers of the true God; and even those who worshipped images had some knowledge of a supreme "Numen", to whom, when they were in earnest, they looked above all their false gods. And of these, when they prayed in their distresses, God took a particular care. I. The psalmist specifies some of the most common calamities of human life, and shows how God succours those that labour under them, in answer to their prayers. 1. Banishment and dispersion, ver. 2–9. 2. Captivity and imprisonment, ver. 10–16. 3. Sickness and distemper of body, ver. 17–22. 4. Danger and distress at sea, ver. 23–32. II. He specifies events concerning nations and families, in which God's hand is to be eyed by his own people, with joyful acknowledgments of his goodness, ver. 33–43.

Verses 1–9

I. A general call to all to give thanks to God, v. 1.

II. A particular demand hereof from the redeemed of the Lord, which may well be applied spiritually to the children of God that were scattered abroad, whom Christ died to gather together in one, out of all lands, John xi. 52; Matt. xxiv. 31. But it seems here to be meant of a temporal deliverance, wrought for them when they cried unto the Lord, v. 6. 1. They were in an enemy's country, but God wrought out their rescue: He redeemed them from the hand of the enemy (v. 2), it may be by the Spirit of God working on the spirits of men. 2. They were dispersed as outcasts, but God gathered them out of all the countries whither they were scattered, v. 3. God knows those that are his, and where to find them. 3. They were bewildered, had no road to travel in, no dwelling place to rest in, v. 4. They wandered in the wilderness. But God led them forth by the right way (v. 7), directed them that they might go to a city of habitation, which they themselves should inhabit. This may refer to poor travellers in general, those particularly whose way lay through the wilds of Arabia, where they were often at a loss. Or it has an eye to the wanderings of the children of Israel in the wilderness for forty years. 4. They were ready to perish for hunger (v. 5). Israel's wants were seasonably supplied. The same God that has led us has fed us all our life long unto this day. Now for all this those who receive mercy are called upon to return thanks (v. 8): Oh that men (it is meant especially of those men whom God has graciously relieved) would praise the Lord for his goodness to them in particular, and for his wonderful works to others of the children of men!

Verses 10–16

The goodness of God towards prisoners and captives. Prisoners are said to sit in darkness (v. 10), desolate and disconsolate; they sit in the shadow of death, which intimates great danger. They are bound in affliction, and many times in iron, because they rebelled against the words of God. They contemned the counsel of the Most High, and thought they neither needed it nor could be the better for it; and those that will not be counselled cannot be helped. For this they are bound in affliction. The design of this affliction is to bring down their heart (v. 12), to humble them for sin. The duty of this afflicted state is to pray (v. 13). Prisoners have time to pray, who, when they were at liberty, could not find time; they see they have need of God's help, though formerly they thought they could do well enough without him. They cried unto the Lord, and he saved them, v. 13. He brought them out of darkness into light, and their liberty was to them life from the dead, v. 14. Were they fettered? He broke their bands asunder. Were they imprisoned in strong castles? He broke the gates of brass and the bars of iron wherewith those gates were made fast; he did not put back, but cut in sunder.

Verses 17–22

Bodily sickness is another of the calamities of this life which gives us an opportunity of experiencing the goodness of God.

I. If we knew no sin, we should know no sickness. Sinners are fools; they wrong themselves, and all against their own interest, not only their spiritual, but their secular interest. They prejudice their bodily health by intemperance and endanger their lives by indulging their appetites. Those that dote most on the meat that perishes, when they come to be sick are sick of it, and the dainties they love are loathed. And when the appetite is gone the life is as good as gone: Then they cry unto the Lord, v. 19. Is any sick? Let him pray; let him be prayed for. Prayer is a salve for every sore.

II. It is by the power and mercy of God that we are recovered from sickness, and then it is our duty to be thankful. He sent his word and healed them, v. 20. This may be applied to the miraculous cures which Christ wrought when he was upon earth; he said, Be clean, Be whole, and the work was done. It may also be applied to the spiritual cures which the Spirit of grace works in regeneration; he sends his word, and heals souls. In the common instances of recovery from sickness God in his providence does but speak, and it is done. When those that have been sick are restored they must return to God an answer of praise (v. 21, 22): Let all men praise the Lord for his goodness, and let those, particularly, to whom God has thus granted a new life, spend it in his service; let them sacrifice with thanksgiving, not only bring a thank-offering to the altar, but a thankful heart to God.

Verses 23–32

The psalmist here calls upon those to give glory to God who are delivered from dangers at sea. Though the Israelites dealt not much in merchandise, yet their neighbours the Tyrians and Zidonians did, and for them perhaps this part of the psalm was especially calculated.

I. The power of God appears at all times in the sea, v. 23, 24. It appears to those that go down to the sea in ships, as mariners, merchants, fishermen, or passengers, that do business in great waters. These see the works of the Lord, and his wonders. The deep itself is a wonder, its vastness, its saltness, its ebbing and flowing. The great variety of living creatures in the sea is wonderful. Let those that go to sea be led, by all the wonders they observe there, to consider and adore the infinite perfections of that God whose the sea is, for he made it and manages it.

II. It especially appears in storms at sea. Then wonders begin to appear in the deep, when God commands and raises the strong wind, which fulfils his word, cxlviii. 8. A stranger, who had never seen it, would not think it possible for a ship to live at sea, as it will in a storm, and ride it out, and yet God taught man to make ships that should so strangely keep above water. When the storm is very high, even those that are used to the sea can neither shake off nor dissemble their fears, but are quite at their wits' end (v. 27), not knowing what to do more for their preservation. Those that go to sea must expect such perils and the best preparation for them is liberty of access to God by prayer. We have a saying, "Let those that would learn to pray go to sea"; I say, Let those that will go to sea learn to pray. Those that have the Lord for their God have a present help in every time of need, so that when they are at their wits' end they are not at their faith's end. God sometimes appears for those that are in distress at sea, in answer to their prayers: He brings them out of the danger. He makes the storm a calm, v. 29. The seamen are made easy. The voyage becomes prosperous and successful: So he brings them to their desired haven, v. 30. Thus he carries his people safely through all the storms and tempests that they meet with in their voyage heaven-ward, and lands them, at length, in the desired harbour.

The psalmist, having given God the glory of the providential reliefs granted to persons in distress, here gives him the glory of the revolutions of providence, and the surprising changes it sometimes makes in the affairs of the children of men.

I. He gives some instances of these revolutions.

1. Fruitful countries are made barren and barren countries are made fruitful. Much of the comfort of this life depends upon the soil in which our lot is cast. The sin of man has often marred the fruitfulness of the soil, v. 33, 34. The goodness of God has often mended the barrenness of the soil, and turned a wilderness, a land of drought, into water-springs, v. 35.

2. Necessitous families are raised and enriched, while prosperous families are impoverished and go to decay. We see many greatly increasing whose beginning was small, v. 36–38. Those that were hungry are made to dwell in fruitful lands; there they take root, and gain a settlement. Providence puts good land under their hands, and they build upon it. But lodgings, though ever so convenient, will not serve without lands, and therefore they must sow the fields, and plant vineyards (v. 37). Man's industry must attend God's blessing, and then God's blessing will crown man's industry. The fruitfulness of the soil should engage, for it does encourage, diligence; and, ordinarily, the hand of the diligent, by the blessing of God, makes rich, v. 38. We see many that have suddenly risen as suddenly sunk and brought to nothing (v. 39) by adverse providences, and end their days as low as they began them; or their families after them lose as fast as they got, and scatter what they heaped together. Those that were high and great in the world are abased, and those that were mean and despicable are advanced to honour, v. 40, 41. Those that exalt themselves God will abase. He makes them to wander in the wilderness, where there is no way. Those that were afflicted and trampled on are not only delivered, but set on high out of the reach of their troubles. God is to be acknowledged both in setting up families and in building them up. Let not princes be envied, nor the poor despised, for God has many ways of changing the condition of both.

II. Such surprising turns as these are of use, 1. For the solacing of saints. They observe these dispensations with pleasure (v. 42). It is a great comfort to a good man to see how God manages the children of men, as the potter does the clay, to see despised virtue advanced and impious pride brought low, to see it evinced that verily there is a God that judges in the earth. 2. For the silencing of sinners. When sinners see how their punishment answers to their sin, and how justly God deals with them in taking away from them those gifts of his which they had abused, they shall not have one word to say for themselves. 3. For the satisfying of all concerning the divine goodness (v. 43): Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, these various dispensations of divine providence, even they shall understand the lovingkindness of the Lord. A prudent observance of the providences of God will contribute very much to the accomplishing of a good Christian.

PSALM CVIII

This psalm begins with praise and concludes with prayer, and faith is at work in both. I. David here gives thanks to God for mercies to himself, ver. 1–5. II. He prays to God for mercies for the land, ver. 6–13. The former part is taken out of Ps. lvii. 7, &c., the latter out of Ps. lx. 5, &c. It intimates likewise that it is not only allowable, but sometimes convenient, to gather some verses out of one psalm and some out of another, and to put them together, to be sung to the glory of God.

A song or psalm of David.

We may here learn how to praise God from the example of one who was master of the art. 1. We must praise God with fixedness of heart. Wandering straggling thoughts must be gathered in, and kept close to the business. 2. We must praise God with freeness of expression: I will praise him with my glory, that is, with my tongue. Our tongue is our glory, and never more so than when it is employed in praising God. David's skill in music was his glory, it made him famous, and this should be consecrated to the praise of God. Whatever gift we excel in we must praise God with. 3. We must praise God with affection, and must stir up ourselves that it may be done in a lively manner and not carelessly (v. 2): Awake, psaltery and harp; let it not be done with a dull and sleepy tune, but let the airs be all lively. Warm devotions honour God. 4. We must praise God publicly, as those that are not ashamed to own our obligations to him. 5. We must, in our praises, magnify the mercy and truth of God (v. 4). We cannot see further than the heavens and clouds; whatever we see of God's mercy and truth there is still more to be seen, more reserved to be seen, in the other world.

We must be public-spirited in prayer, and bear upon our hearts the concerns of the church of God, v. 6. It is God's beloved, and therefore must be ours; and therefore we must pray for its deliverance. An active faith can rejoice in what God has said, though it be not yet done; for with him saying and doing are not two things, whatever they are with us. God had promised David to give him the hearts of his subjects; and therefore he surveys the several parts of the country as his own already: "Shechem and Succoth, Gilead and Manassah, Ephraim and Judah, are all my own," v. 8. He will, without fail, give him the heathen for his inheritance and the utmost parts of the earth for his possessions. David looks upon Moab, and Edom, and Philistia, as his own already (v. 9). We must take encouragement from the beginnings of mercy to pray and hope for the perfecting of it (v. 10, 11): "Who will bring me into the strong cities that are yet unconquered? Who will make me master of the country of Edom, which is yet unsubdued?" The question was probably to be debated in a council of war, what methods they should take to subdue the Edomites; but he brings it into his prayers, Wilt not thou, O God? We must not be discouraged in prayer, nor beaten off from our hold of God, though Providence has in some instances frowned upon us. We must seek help from God, renouncing all confidence in the creature (v. 12). Vain is the help of man. "It is really so, and therefore we are undone if thou do not help us; we apprehend it to be so, and therefore depend upon thee for help and have the more reason to expect it." We must do our part, but we can do nothing of ourselves; it is only through God that we shall do valiantly.

PSALM CIX

Whether David penned this psalm when he was persecuted by Saul, or when his son Absalom rebelled against him, or upon occasion of some other trouble is uncertain; but the imprecation (ver. 8) is applied to Judas, Acts i. 20. The rest of the prayers here against his enemies were the expressions, not of passion, but of the Spirit of prophecy. I. He lodges a complaint of the malice of his enemies and with it an appeal to the righteous God, ver. 1–5. II. He prays against his enemies, ver. 6–20. III. He prays for himself, that God would help him in his low condition, ver. 21–29. IV. He concludes with a joyful expectation that God would appear for him, ver. 30, 31.

To the chief Musician. A psalm of David.

Verses 1–5

It is the unspeakable comfort of all good people that, whoever is against them, God is for them.

I. David refers himself to God's judgment (v. 1): "Hold not thy peace, but let my sentence come forth from thy presence, xvii. 2. Delay not to give judgment upon the appeal made to thee." The title he gives to God is: "O God of my praise! the God in whom I glory, and not in any wisdom or strength of my own."

II. He complains of his enemies. They are wicked; they delight in doing mischief (v. 2); their words are words of hatred, v. 3. "They are deceitful in their protestations and professions of kindness, while at the same time they speak against me behind my back, with a lying tongue." They were restless in their designs. They were unjust; their accusations of him, and sentence against him, were all groundless: "They have fought against me without a cause; I never gave them any provocation." They were very ungrateful, and rewarded him evil for good, v. 5. For my love they are my adversaries. The more he endeavoured to gratify them the more they hated him.

III. He resolves to keep close to his duty and take the comfort of that: But I give myself unto prayer (v. 4). When David's enemies falsely accused him, and misrepresented him, he applied to God and by prayer committed his cause to him. Though they were his adversaries for his love, yet he continued to pray for them; if others are abusive and injurious to us, yet let not us fail to do our duty to them, nor sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for them, 1 Sam. xii. 23. Now herein David was a type of Christ, who was compassed about with words of hatred, and yet gave himself to prayer, to pray for them. Father, forgive them.

David here fastens upon one particular person worse than the rest of his enemies, and in a holy zeal for God and against sin and the enemies of Christ, particularly Judas who betrayed him, he imprecates and predicts his destruction, and such a one as our Saviour calls him, A son of perdition. Calvin speaks of it as a detestable piece of sacrilege, common in his time among Franciscan friars and other monks, that if anyone had malice against a neighbour he might hire some of them to curse him every day, which he would do in the words of these verses. Greater impiety can scarcely be imagined than to vent a devilish passion in the language of sacred writ.

I. The imprecations here are very terrible in full force against the implacable enemies and persecutors of God's church and people, that will not repent, to give him glory. It is here foretold concerning this bad man,

1. That he should be sentenced as a criminal (v. 6, 7): Set thou a wicked man over him, to be as cruel and oppressive to him as he has been to others. Set his own wicked heart over him, set his own conscience against him; let that fly in his face.

2. That, being condemned, he should be executed as a most notorious malefactor. He should lose his life, and the number of his months be cut off in the midst, by the sword of justice. Such bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days. Consequently all his places should be disposed of to others. His family should be beheaded and beggared, his wife should be made a widow and his children fatherless, by his untimely death, v. 9. They shall be vagabonds and shall beg, because they are conscious to themselves that all mankind have reason to hate them for their father's sake. His estate should be ruined, as the estates of malefactors are confiscated (v. 11). This wicked man having never shown mercy there shall be none to extend mercy to him, by favouring his fatherless children when he is gone, v. 12. The children of wicked parents often fare the worse for their parents' wickedness in this way that the bowels of men's compassion are shut up from them, which yet ought not to be, for why should children suffer for that which was not their fault, but their infelicity?

What hurries some to shameful deaths, and brings the families and estates of others to ruin, makes them and theirs despicable and odious, and entails poverty, and shame, and misery, upon their posterity. It is sin, that mischievous destructive thing.

II. The ground of these imprecations bespeaks them just, though they sound very severe. 1. To justify the imprecations of vengeance upon the sinner's posterity, the sin of his ancestors is here brought into the account (v. 14, 15), the iniquity of his fathers and the sin of his mother. All the innocent blood that had been shed upon the earth, from that of righteous Abel, was required from that persecuting generation, who, by putting Christ to death, filled up the measure of their fathers. 2. To justify the imprecations of vengeance upon the sinner himself, his own sin is here charged upon him, which called aloud for it. He had loved cruelty, persecuted the poor, whom he should have protected and relieved, and slew the broken in heart, whom he should have comforted and healed. Here is a barbarous man indeed, not fit to live. He had loved cursing, and therefore let the curse come upon his head, v. 17–19. Let God's cursing him be his shame, as his cursing his neighbour was his pride. This points at the utter ruin of Judas, and the spiritual judgments which fell on the Jews for crucifying Christ. The psalmist concludes his imprecations with a terrible Amen.

David takes God's comforts to himself, but in a very humble manner.

I. "I am poor and needy, and one that needs and craves thy help." He was troubled in mind (v. 22): My heart is wounded within me, not only broken with outward troubles, but wounded with a sense of guilt; and a wounded spirit who can bear? He was unsettled, tossed up and down like the locust, his mind unsteady, hunted like a partridge on the mountains. His body was wasted, and almost worn away (v. 24): My knees are weak through fasting, either forced fasting or voluntary fasting, when he chastened his soul. But it is better to have this leanness in the body, while the soul prospers and is in health, than, like Israel, to have leanness sent into the soul, while the body is feasted. In all this David was a type of Christ, who in his humiliation was thus weakened, thus reproached.

II. He prays for mercy for himself. "Lord, do for me what seems good in thy eyes. Do that which thou knowest will be for me, really for me, in the issue for me, though for the present it may seem to make against me." More particularly, he prays (v. 26): "Help me, O Lord my God! O save me! Save me from sin, help me to do my duty." He prays (v. 28), Though they curse, bless thou. If God bless us, we need not care who curses us.

III. He prays that his enemies might be ashamed (v. 28), clothed with shame (v. 29), that they might cover themselves with their own confusion, that they might be left to themselves, to do that which would expose them and manifest their folly before all men. In this he prays that they might be brought to repentance which is the chief thing we should beg of God for our enemies.

IV. He pleads God's glory, the honour of his name. "Deliver me, because thy mercy is good; let that be the measure, of my salvation." He concludes the psalm with joy, the joy of faith. He promises God that he will praise him (v. 30). He promises himself that he shall have cause to praise God (v. 31). God was David's protector in his sufferings, and was present also with the Lord Jesus in his, saved his soul from those that pretended to be the judges of it, and received it into his own hands.

PSALM CX

This psalm is pure gospel; concerning Christ, the Messiah promised to the fathers and expected by them. It is plain that the Jews of old, even the worst of them, so understood it; for when the Lord Jesus proposed a question to the Pharisees upon the first words of this psalm, where he takes it for granted that David, in spirit, calls Christ his Lord though he was his Son, they chose rather to say nothing, than to make it a question whether David does indeed speak of the Messiah or no; for they freely yield so plain a truth, though they foresee it will turn to their own disgrace, Matt. xxii. 41, &c. Christ, as our Redeemer, executes the office of a prophet, of a priest, and of a king, with reference both to his humiliation and his exaltation; and of each of these we have here an account. I. His prophetical office, ver. 2. II. His priestly office, ver. 4. III. His kingly office, ver. 1, 3, 5, 6. IV. His estates of humiliation and exaltation, ver. 7.

A psalm of David.

Verses 1–4

Some have called this psalm David's creed, almost all the articles of the Christian faith being found in it, the title calls it David's psalm, for in the believing foresight of the Messiah he both praised God and solaced himself. Much more may we, in singing it, to whom that is fulfilled, which is here foretold. Glorious things are here spoken of Christ.

I. He is David's Lord. We must take special notice of this because he himself does. Matt. xxii. 43, David, in spirit, calls him Lord.

II. He is constituted a sovereign Lord by the counsel and decree of God himself: The Lord, Jehovah, said unto him, Sit as a king. He receives of the Father this honour and glory (2 Pet. i. 17).

III. He was to be advanced to the highest honour, and entrusted with absolute sovereign power. Sit thou at my right hand. Sitting is a resting posture; after his services and sufferings, he entered into rest. It is a ruling posture; he sits to give law, to give judgment.

IV. All his enemies were in due time to be made his footstool. Even Christ himself has enemies that fight against his kingdom. There are those that will not have him to reign over them, and thereby they join themselves to Satan, who will not have him to reign at all. These enemies will be made his footstool. It will not be done immediately. This the apostle observes. Heb. ii. 8, We see not yet all things put under him. Christ himself shall wait till it is done.

V. He should have a kingdom set up in the world, beginning at Jerusalem (v. 2). The kingdom of Christ took rise from Zion, the city of David, for he was the Son of David, and was to have the throne of his father David. By the rod of his strength, or his strong rod, is meant his everlasting gospel, and the power of the Holy Ghost. This strong rod God sent forth; he poured out the Spirit, and gave both commissions and qualifications to those that preached the word, and ministered the Spirit, Gal. iii. 5. It was sent out of Zion, for there the Spirit was given, and there the preaching of the gospel among all nations must begin, at Jerusalem.

VI. That his kingdom, being set up, should be maintained and kept up in the world, in spite of all the opposition of the power of darkness. He shall rule in the midst of his enemies. He sits in heaven in the midst of his friends; he rules on earth in the midst of his enemies.

VII. He should have a great number of subjects, who should be to him for a name and a praise, v. 3.

1. They are given to him by the Father. Thine they were and thou gavest them me, John xvii. 6. They are redeemed by him, Tit. ii. 14. They are his by right, antecedent to their consent.

2. They should be a willing people, servants that choose their service, soldiers that are volunteers and not pressed men.

3. That they should be so in the day of his power, in the day of thy muster. In the day of thy armies (so some); "when the first preachers of the gospel shall be sent forth, as Christ's armies, then all that are thy people shall be willing; that will be thy time of setting up thy kingdom."

4. They should be so in the beauty of holiness; they shall be charmed into a subjection to Christ by the sight given them of his beauty, who is the holy Jesus. They shall be admitted by him into the beauty of holiness, as spiritual priests, to minister in his sanctuary in the beautiful attire or ornaments of grace and sanctification. Holiness is the livery of Christ's family and that which becomes his house for ever. Christ's soldiers are all thus clothed; these are the colours they wear.

5. He should have great numbers of people devoted to him. In the early days of the gospel, in the morning of the New Testament, the youth of the church, great numbers flocked to Christ, and there were multitudes that believed, a remnant of Jacob, that was as a dew from the Lord, Mic. v. 7; Isa. lxiv. 4, 8. The dew of the youth is a numerous, illustrious, hopeful show of young people flocking to Christ, which would be to the world as dew to the ground, to make it fruitful.

6. He should be not only a king, but a priest, v. 4. Our Lord Jesus Christ is God's minister to us, and our advocate with God, and so is a Mediator between us and God. He is said to be a priest for ever, not only because we are never to expect any other dispensation of grace than this by the priesthood of Christ, but because the blessed fruits and consequences of it will remain to eternity. He is a priest, not of the order of Aaron, but of that of Melchizedek, which, as it was prior, so it was upon many accounts superior. The apostle comments largely upon these words (Heb. vii) and builds on them his discourse of Christ's priestly office, which he shows was no new notion, but built upon this most sure word of prophecy. For, as the New Testament explains the Old, so the Old Testament confirms the New, and Jesus Christ is the Alpha and Omega of both.

Verses 5–7

Here we have our great Redeemer.

I. Conquering his enemies (v. 5, 6): Our Lord Jesus will certainly bring to nought all the opposition made to his kingdom.

1. The conqueror: The Lord—Adonai, the Lord Jesus, he to whom all judgment is committed, he shall make his own part good against his enemies. Christ's sitting at the right hand of God speaks as much terror to his enemies as happiness to his people.

2. The time fixed for this victory: In the day of his wrath, that is, the time appointed for it, when the measure of their iniquities is full and they are ripe for ruin.

3. The extent of this victory. He shall strike through kings. Satan is the prince of this world, Death the king of terrors, and we read of kings that make war with the Lamb; but they shall all be brought down and broken. The trophies of Christ's victories will be set up among the heathen, and in many countries, wherever any of his enemies are.

4. The equity of this victory: He shall judge among them. It is not a military execution, which is done in fury, but a judicial one.

5. The effect of this victory; it shall be the complete and utter ruin of all his enemies. He shall wound the heads, which seems to refer to the first promise of the Messiah (Gen. iii. 15), that he should bruise the serpent's head. He shall fill the places with the dead bodies. The slain of the Lord shall be many.

II. We have here the Redeemer saving his friends and comforting them (v. 7). 1. He shall be humbled: He shall drink of the brook in the way, that bitter cup which the Father put into his hand. Christ drank of this brook when he was made a curse for us, and therefore, when he entered upon his suffering, he went over the brook Kidron, John xviii. 1. 2. He shall be exalted: Therefore shall he lift up the head. When he died he bowed the head (John xix. 30), but he soon lifted up the head by his own power in his resurrection. He lifted up the head as a conqueror. Because he drank of the brook in the way therefore he lifted up his own head, and so lifted up the heads of all his faithful followers, who, if they suffer with him, shall also reign with him.

PSALM CXI

This and divers of the psalms that follow it seem to have been penned by David for the service of the church in their solemn feasts. This is a psalm of praise. The title of it is "Hallelujah—Praise you the Lord", intimating that we must address ourselves to the use of this psalm with hearts disposed to praise God. It is composed alphabetically, each sentence beginning with a several letter of the Hebrew alphabet, in order exactly, two sentences to each verse, and three a piece to the last two. The psalmist, exhorting to praise God, I. Sets himself for an example, ver. 1. II. Furnishes us with matter for praise from the works of God. III. Recommends the holy fear of God, and a conscientious obedience to his commands, as the most acceptable way of praising God, ver. 10.

Verses 1–5

The title of the psalm being Hallelujah, the psalmist keeps to his text.

I. He resolves to praise God himself, v. 1. We must praise God both in private and in public, in less and greater assemblies, in our own families and in the courts of the Lord's house.

II. He recommends to us the works of the Lord as the proper subject of our meditations when we are praising him—the dispensations of his providence towards the world, towards the church, and towards particular persons. 1. God's works are great like himself; there is nothing in them that is mean or trifling: they are the products of infinite wisdom and power. 2. They are entertaining and exercising to the inquisitive—sought out of all those that have pleasure therein. Those that have pleasure in the works of God will not take up with a superficial transient view of them, but will diligently search into them and observe them. In studying both natural and political history we discover the greatness and glory of God's works. 3. They are all just and holy: His righteousness endures for ever. 4. They are memorable, fit to be registered and kept on record. Much that we do is so trifling that the greatest kindness is to forget it. But notice is to be taken of God's works, and an account to be kept of them (v. 4). He has made his wonderful works to be remembered. 5. In them the Lord shows that he is gracious and full of compassion. He will be ever mindful of his covenant; so that they can taste covenant-love even in common mercies. Some refer this to the manna with which God fed his people Israel in the wilderness.

Verses 6–10

Glory to God,

I. For the great things he has done for his people, for his people Israel, of old and of late: He has shown his people the power of his works (v. 6). 1. The possession God gave to Israel in the land of Canaan. This he did in Joshua's time, when the seven nations were subdued, and in Davids' time, when the neighbouring nations became tributaries to David. 2. The many deliverances which he wrought for his people when by their iniquities they had sold themselves into the hand of their enemies (v. 9). These redemptions were typical of the great redemption which in the fulness of time was to be wrought out by the Lord Jesus.

II. For the stability both of his word and of his works, which assure us of the great things he will do for them. 1. What God has done shall never be undone. He will not undo it himself, and men and devils cannot (v. 7): The works of his hand are verity and judgment (v. 8), that is, they are done in truth and uprightness. Upon the beginning of his works we may depend for the perfecting of them. 2. What God has said shall never be unsaid: All his commandments are sure, all straight and therefore all steady.

III. For the setting up and establishing of religion among men. Because the discoveries of religion tend so much to his honour. Review what he has made known of himself in his word and in his works, and you will see, and say, that God is great. Because the dictates of religion tend so much to man's happiness. Reverence of him and obedience to him are as much our interest as they are our duty. Men can never begin to be wise till they begin to fear God; all true wisdom takes its rise from true religion, and has its foundation in it. A good understanding have all those that do his commandments. Where the fear of the Lord rules in the heart there will be a constant conscientious care to keep his commandments, not to talk of them, but to do them; and such have a good understanding. Their obedience is a plain indication of their mind that they do indeed fear God. We have reason to praise God, to praise him for ever, for putting man into such a fair way to happiness.

PSALM CXII

This psalm is composed alphabetically, as the former is, and is (like the former) entitled "Hallelujah", though it treats of the happiness of the saints, because it redounds to the glory of God. It is a comment upon the last verse of the foregoing psalm, and shows how much it is our wisdom to fear God and do his commandments. I. The character of the righteous, ver. 1. II. The blessedness of the righteous. III. The misery of the wicked, ver. 10. So then good and evil are set before us, the blessing and the curse.

Verses 1–5

The psalmist begins with a call to us to praise God, but immediately applies himself to praise the people of God. We have reason to praise the Lord that there are a people in the world who fear him and serve him, and that they are a happy people, both which are owing entirely to the grace of God.

I. A description of those who are here pronounced blessed, and to whom these promises are made.

1. They are well-principled, well affected to his government, such as stand in awe of God and have a constant reverence for his majesty and deference to his will. He that fears the Lord, as a Father, with the disposition of a child, not of a slave, delights greatly in his commandments. They are written in his heart and he calls them an easy, a pleasant, yoke. He delights not only in God's promises, but in his precepts.

2. They are honest and sincere in their professions and intentions. They are called the upright (v. 2, 4), who are really as good as they seem to be, and deal faithfully both with God and man. There is no true religion without sincerity; that is gospel-perfection.

3. They are both just and kind in all their dealings. One instance is given of his beneficence (v. 5): He shows favour and lends. Sometimes there is as much charity in lending as in giving, as it obliges the borrower both to industry and honesty.

II. The blessedness that is here entailed upon those that answer to these characters. Happiness, all happiness, to the man that feareth the Lord.

1. The posterity of good men shall fare the better for his goodness (v. 2): His seed shall be mighty on earth. Religion has been the raising of many a family, if not so as to advance it high, yet so as to fix it firmly. When good men themselves are happy in heaven their seed perhaps are considerable on earth, and will themselves own that it is by virtue of a blessing descending from them. The generation of the upright shall be blessed; if they tread in their steps, they shall be the more blessed for their relation to them.

2. They shall prosper in the world, and especially their souls shall prosper, v. 3. They shall be blessed with outward prosperity as far as is good for them. But, which is much better, is that they shall be blessed with spiritual blessings, which are the true riches. Grace is better than gold, for it will outlast it. He shall have wealth and riches, and yet shall keep up his religion. When this endures in the family, and the heirs of the father's estate inherit his virtues too, that is a happy family indeed.

3. They shall have comfort in affliction (v. 4): Unto the upright there arises light in the darkness. They shall have their share in the common calamities of human life; but, when they sit in darkness, the Lord shall be a light to them, Mic. vii. 8.

4. They shall have wisdom for the management of all their concerns, v. 5. It is part of the character of a good man that he will use his discretion in managing his affairs, in getting and saving, that he may have to give.

I. The satisfaction of saints, and their stability. It is the happiness of a good man that he shall not be moved for ever, v. 6.

1. A good man will have a settled reputation. A good name with God and good people: The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance (v. 6). There are those that do all they can to sully his reputation and to load him with reproach; but his integrity shall survive him. Some that have been eminently righteous are had in a lasting remembrance on earth; but in heaven their remembrance shall be truly everlasting. Those that are forgotten on earth, and despised, are remembered there, and honoured, and their righteousness found unto praise, and honour, and glory (1 Pet. i. 7). That which shall especially turn to the honour of good men is their liberality to the poor: He has dispersed, he has given to the poor; he has not suffered his charity to run all in one channel, or directed it to some few objects that he had a particular kindness for, but he has dispersed it.

2. A good man shall have a settled spirit, for he shall not be afraid; his heart is established, v. 7, 8. It is their endeavour to keep their minds stayed upon God, and so to keep them calm and God has promised them both cause to do so and grace to do so. The fixedness of the heart is a sovereign remedy against the disquieting fear of evil tidings. Trusting in the Lord is the best and surest way of fixing and establishing the heart. He shall not be afraid, till he see his desire upon his enemies, that is, till he come to heaven, where he shall see Satan, and all his spiritual enemies, trodden under his feet. Till he look upon his oppressors, look boldly in their faces, as being now no longer under their power.

II. The vexation of sinners, v. 10. Two things shall fret them:—1. The felicity of the righteous. It will vex them to see those whom they hated and despised, and whose ruin they sought and hoped to see, the favourites of Heaven, and advanced to have dominion over them (xlix. 14).

PSALM CXIII

This psalm begins and ends with "Hallelujah"; for, as many others, it is designed to promote the great and good work of praising God. I. We are urged to praise God, ver. 1–3. II. We are furnished with matter for praise. The elevations of his glory and greatness, ver. 4, 5. The condescensions of his grace and goodness (ver. 6–9), very much illustrate one another.

Verses 1–9

I. Glory to God,

1. The invitation is very pressing: Praise you the Lord, and again and again, Praise him, praise him; blessed be his name, for it is to be praised, v. 1–3.

2. The invitation is very extensive. God has praise —from his own people. They have most reason to praise him. The angels are the servants of the Lord; they praise God, and praise him better than we can.

Let God be praised through all the generations of time. Blessed be his name now and always. From the rising of the sun to the going down of the same, that is, throughout the habitable world. It ought to be praised by all nations; for in every place, from east to west, there appear the manifest proofs and products of his wisdom, power, and goodness.

II. We are here directed what to give him the glory of. Let us look up with an eye of faith, and see how high his glory is in the upper world, and mention that to his praise, v. 4, 5. Put all the nations together, and he is above them all; they are before him as the drop of the bucket and the small dust of the balance, Isa. xl. 15, 17. The throne of his glory is in the highest heavens. His glory is above the heavens, that is, above the angels; he is above what they are—above what they do, for they are under his command—and above what even they can speak him to be. He is a God who exalts himself to dwell, who humbles himself, in heaven, and in earth. God is said to exalt himself and to humble himself, both are his own act and deed. God's condescending goodness appears in the cognizance he takes of the world below him. His glory is above the nations and above the heavens, and yet neither is neglected by him. God is great, yet he despises not any, Job xxxvi. 5. He humbles himself to behold all his creatures. Considering the infinite perfection, sufficiency, and felicity of the divine nature, it must be acknowledged as an act of wonderful condescension that God is pleased to take into the thoughts of his eternal counsel, and into the hand of his universal Providence, both the armies of heaven and the inhabitants of the earth (Dan. iv. 35); even in this dominion he humbles himself. If it be such condescension for God to behold things in heaven and earth, what an amazing condescension was it for the Son of God to come from heaven to earth and take our nature upon him, that he might seek and save those that were lost! He not only beholds the great things in the earth, but the meanest, and does wonders for them, out of the common road of providence and chain of causes, which shows that the world is governed, not by a course of nature, for that would always run in the same channel, but by a God of nature, who delights in doing things we looked not for. Sometimes, on a sudden (v. 7, 8): He raises up the poor out of the dust, that he may set him with princes. Gideon is fetched from threshing, Saul from seeking the asses, and David from keeping the sheep; the apostles are sent from fishing to be fishers of men. The treasure of the gospel is put into earthen vessels, and the weak and foolish ones of the world are pitched upon to be preachers of it, to confound the wise and mighty (1 Cor. i. 27, 28), that the excellency of the power may be of God. When Joseph's virtue was tried and manifested he was raised from the prison-dust and set with princes. Those that have been long barren are sometimes, on a sudden, made fruitful, v. 9. This may look back to Sarah and Rebecca, Rachel, Hannah, and Samson's mother, or forward to Elizabeth; and many such instances there have been, in which God has looked on the affliction of his handmaids and taken away their reproach. He makes the barren woman to keep house, not only builds up the family, but thereby finds the heads of the family something to do.

PSALM CXIV

The deliverance of Israel out of Egypt gave birth to their church and nation. In this psalm it is celebrated in lively strains of praise; it was fitly therefore made a part of the great Hallelujah, or song of praise, which the Jews were wont to sing at the close of the passover-supper. It must never be forgotten, I. That they were brought out of slavery, ver. 1. II. That God set up his tabernacle among them, ver. 2. III. That the sea and Jordan were divided before them, ver. 3. 5. IV. That the earth shook at the giving of the law, when God came down on Mount Sinai, ver. 4, 6, 7. V. That God gave them water out of the rock, ver. 8.

Verses 1–8

The psalmist is here remembering the days of old, and the wonders which their fathers told them of (Judges vi. 13), for time, as it does not wear out the guilt of sin, so it should not wear out the sense of mercy.

I. God brought Israel out of the house of bondage with a high hand and a stretched-out arm: Israel went out of Egypt, v. 1. They did not steal out clandestinely, but marched out with all the marks of honour.

II. God himself framed their civil and sacred constitution (v. 2): Judah and Israel were his sanctuary, his dominion. When he delivered them out of the hand of their oppressors it was that they might serve him in the duties of religious worship and in obedience to the moral law. He set up his sanctuary among them, in which he gave them the special tokens of his presence with them and promised to receive their homage and tribute. He was himself their lawgiver and their judge, and their government was a theocracy: The Lord was their King.

III. The Red Sea was divided before them at their coming out of Egypt, both for their rescue and the ruin of their enemies; and the river Jordan, when they entered into Canaan (v. 3). The psalmist asks, in a poetical strain (v. 5), What ailed thee, O thou sea! that thou fleddest? And furnishes the sea with an answer (v. 7); it was at the presence of the Lord. This is designed to express that it was not from any natural cause, but it was at the presence of the Lord, who gave the word. Israel are taught to triumph over the sea, and Jordan. There is no sea, no Jordan, so deep, so broad, but, when God's time shall come for the redemption of his people, it shall be divided and driven back if it stand in their way. Apply this, (1) To the planting of the Christian church in the world. What ailed Satan and the powers of darkness, that they trembled and truckled as they did? Mark i. 34. What ailed the heathen oracles, that they were silenced, struck dead? What ailed their idolatries, and witchcrafts, that they died away before the gospel. What ailed the persecutors and opposers of the gospel, that they gave up their cause, and called to rocks and mountains for shelter? It was at the presence of the Lord, and that power which went along with the gospel. (2.) To the work of grace in the heart. What turns the stream in a regenerate soul? What ails the lusts and corruptions, that they fly back, that the prejudices are removed and the whole man has become new? It is at the presence of God's Spirit that imaginations are cast down, 2 Cor. x. 5.

IV. The earth shook and trembled when God came down on Mount Sinai to give the law (v. 4): The mountains skipped like rams, and then the little hills might well be excused if they skipped like lambs, either when they are frightened or when they sport themselves.

V. God supplied them with water out of the rock, which followed them through the dry and sandy deserts. The same almighty power that turned waters into a rock to be a wall to Israel (Exod. xiv. 22) turned the rock into waters to be a well to Israel: as they were protected, so they were provided for, by miracles; for such was the standing water, that fountain of waters into which the rock, the flinty rock, was turned, and that rock was Christ, 1 Cor. x. 4.

PSALM CXV

Many ancient translations join this psalm to that which goes next before it, the Septuagint particularly, and the vulgar Latin; but it is, in the Hebrew, a distinct psalm. In it we are taught to give glory, I. To God, and not to ourselves, ver. 1. II. To God, and not to idols, ver. 2–8. We must give glory to God, 1. By trusting in him, and in his promise and blessing, ver. 9–15. 2. By blessing him, ver. 16–18.

Verses 1–8

I. Boasting is here for ever excluded, v. 1. Let no opinion of our own merits have any room either in our prayers or in our praises, but let both centre in God's glory. All the good we do is done by the power of his grace, and all the good we have is the gift of his mere mercy, and therefore he must have all the praise. All our songs must be sung to this humble tune, Not unto us, O Lord! and again, Not unto us, but to thy name, let all the glory be given. This must be our highest and ultimate end in our prayers, and therefore it is made the first petition in the Lord's prayer, as that which guides all the rest, Hallowed be thy name; and, in order to that, Give us our daily bread, &c.

II. The reproach of the heathen is here for ever silenced.

1. The psalmist complains of the reproach of the heathen (v. 2): Wherefore should they say, Where is now their God? Do they not know that our God is everywhere by his providence and always nigh to us by his promise and grace?

2. He gives a direct answer to their question, v. 3. "Do they ask where is our God? Our God is in the heavens, where the gods of the heathen never were, in the heavens, and therefore out of sight; but, though his majesty be unapproachable, it does not therefore follow that his being is questionable. In the lower world are the products of his power. Do you ask where he is? He is at the beginning and end of everything, and not far from any of us.

3. He returns their question upon themselves. He does in effect ask, What are the gods of the heathen? He shows that their gods, though they are not shapeless things, are senseless things. Idolaters, at first, worshipped the sun and moon (Job xxxi. 26), which was bad enough, but not so bad as that which they were now come to, which was the worshipping of images, v. 4. The matter of them was silver and gold, dug out of the earth (man found them poor and dirty in a mine), proper things to make money of, but not to make gods of. The make of them was from the artificer; they are creatures of men's vain imaginations and the works of men's hands, and therefore can have no divinity in them. The workmen made it, therefore it is not God, Hos. viii. 6. These idols are represented here as the most ridiculous things, a mere jest, fitter for a toy-shop than a temple, for children to play with than for men to pray to. The painter, the carver, the statuary, did their part well enough; they made them with mouths and eyes, ears and noses, hands and feet, but they could put no life into them and therefore no sense. They had better have worshipped a dead carcase (for that had life in it once) than a dead image, which neither has life nor can have. They speak not, in answer to those that consult them; the crafty priest must speak for them. In Baal's image there was no voice, neither any that answered. They see not the prostrations of their worshippers before them, much less their burdens and wants. They hear not their prayers, though ever so loud; they smell not their incense, though ever so strong, ever so sweet; they handle not the gifts presented to them, much less have they any gifts to bestow on their worshippers; they cannot stretch forth their hands to the needy. They walk not, they cannot stir a step for the relief of those that apply to them. Nay, they do not so much as breathe through their throat; they have not the least sign or symptom of life. He thence infers the sottishness of their worshippers (v. 8): Those that make them images show their ingenuity, and doubtless are sensible men; but those that make them gods show their stupidity and folly. They see not the invisible things of the true and living God in the works of creation; they hear not the voice of the day and the night, which in every speech and language declare his glory, xix. 2, 3. By worshipping these foolish puppets, they make themselves more and more foolish like them, and set themselves at a greater distance from everything that is spiritual, sinking themselves deeper into the mire of sense.

Verses 9–18

I. We are earnestly exhorted, all of us, to repose our confidence in God, and not suffer our confidence in him to be shaken by the heathens' insulting over us upon the account of our present distresses. It is folly to trust in dead images, but it is wisdom to trust in the living God, for he is a help and a shield to those that do trust in them. Therefore, let Israel trust in the Lord; the body of the people, as to their public interests, and every particular Israelite, as to his own private concerns. Let the priests, the Lord's ministers, and all the families of the house of Aaron, trust in the Lord (v. 10). They ought to be examples to others of a cheerful confidence in God in the worst of times. Let the proselytes, who are not of the seed of Israel, but fear the Lord, who worship him and make conscience of their duty to him, let them trust in him, for he will not fail nor forsake them, v. 11.

II. We are greatly encouraged to trust in God. The Lord has been mindful of us. All our comforts are derived from God's thoughts to us-ward; he has been mindful of us, though we have forgotten him. From what he has done for us we may infer, He will bless us; he that has been our help and our shield will be so; so that we have reason to hope that he who has delivered, and does, will yet deliver. He will bless us; he has promised that he will. God's blessing us is not only speaking good to us, but doing well for us. Nay (v. 13), he will bless those that fear the Lord, though they be not of the house of Israel or the house of Aaron; for it was a truth, before Peter perceived it, That in every nation he that fears God is accepted of him, and blessed, Acts x. 34, 35. Both the weak in grace and the strong shall be blessed of God, the lambs and the sheep of his flock. It is promised (v. 14), The Lord shall increase you, especially increase in spiritual blessings, with the increasings of God. He will bless you with the increase of knowledge and wisdom, of grace, holiness and joy. "He shall increase you more and more; so that, as long as you live, you shall be still increasing, till you come to perfection, as the shining light," Prov. iv. 18. "You and your children; you in your children." For (v. 15), You are blessed of the Lord, you and your children are so; all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the Lord has blessed, Isa. lxi. 9.

III. We are stirred up to praise God by the psalmist's example, who concludes with a resolution to persevere in his praises. God is to be praised, v. 16. See how stately his palace is, and the throne he has prepared in the heavens: The heaven, even the heavens are the Lord's. The earth he has given to the children of men, having designed it, when he made it, for their use, to find them meat, drink, and lodging. The dead are not capable of praising him (v. 17), nor any that go into silence. The soul indeed lives in a state of separation from the body and is capable of praising God; and the souls of the faithful, after they are delivered from the burdens of the flesh, do praise God, are still praising him; for they go up to the land of perfect light and constant business. Therefore it concerns us to praise him (v. 18): But we, we that are alive, will bless the Lord from this time forth and to eternity. Hallelujah.

PSALM CXVI

This is a thanksgiving psalm. I. The great distress and danger that the psalmist was in, which almost drove him to despair, ver. 3, 10, 11. II. The application he made to God in that distress, ver. 4. III. The experience he had of God's goodness to him, in answer to prayer; God heard him (ver. 1, 2), pitied him (ver. 5, 6), delivered him, ver. 8. IV. His care respecting the acknowledgments he should make of the goodness of God to him, ver. 12. 1. He will love God, ver. 1. 2. He will continue to call upon him, ver. 2, 13, 17. 3. He will rest in him, ver. 7. 4. He will walk before him, ver. 9. 5. He will pay his vows of thanksgiving, in which he will own the tender regard God had to him, and this publicly, ver. 13–15, 17–19. Lastly, He will continue God's faithful servant to his life's end, ver. 16. These are such breathings of a holy soul as bespeak it very happy.

Verses 1–9

I. A general account of David's experience, and his pious resolutions (v. 1, 2), which are as the contents of the whole psalm, and give an idea of it. He had experienced God's goodness to him in answer to prayer. He has inclined his ear to me. It is wonderful condescension in God to hear prayer; it is bowing his ear. He begins the psalm somewhat abruptly with a profession of that which his heart was full of: I love the Lord (as xviii. 1); and fitly does he begin with this, in compliance with the first and great commandment. Therefore I will call upon him. Why should we glean in any other field when we have been so well treated in this? Nay, I will call upon him as long as I live (Heb., In my days), every day, to the last day.

II. A more particular narrative of God's gracious dealings with him. Let us review David's experiences. He was in great distress and trouble (v. 3): The sorrows of death compassed me, that is, such sorrows as were likely to be his death. Perhaps the extremity of bodily pain, or trouble of mind, is called here the pains of hell. In his trouble he had recourse to God by faithful and fervent prayer, v. 4. He tells us that he prayed: Then called I upon the name of the Lord. He tells us what his prayer was; it was short, but to the purpose: "O Lord! I beseech thee, deliver my soul; save me from death, and save me from sin, for that is it that is killing to the soul." He found by experience that God is gracious and merciful, and in his compassion preserves the simple, v. 6. Because they are simple (that is, sincere, and upright, and without guile) therefore God preserves them, as he preserved Paul, who had his conversation in the world not with fleshly wisdom, but in simplicity and godly sincerity. Let David speak his own experience. "I was brought low, was plunged into the depth of misery, and then he helped me, helped me both to bear the worst and to hope the best, helped me to pray, else desire had failed, helped me to wait, else faith had failed. I was one of the simple ones whom God preserved, the poor man who cried and the Lord heard him", xxxiv. 6. God graciously delivered, First, His soul from death. It is God's great mercy to us that we are alive; and the mercy is the more sensible if we have been at death's door and yet have been spared and raised up. The deliverance of the soul from spiritual death is especially to be acknowledged by all those who are now sanctified and shall be shortly glorified. Secondly, His eyes from tears, that is, his heart from inordinate grief. Thirdly, His feet from falling, from falling into sin and so into misery. God had done all this for him, and therefore he will live a life of delight in God (v. 7): Return unto thy rest, O my soul! God has dealt kindly with thee, and therefore thou needest not fear that ever he will deal hardly with thee. God is the soul's rest; in him only it can dwell at ease; to him therefore it must retire, and rejoice in him. Return to that rest which Christ gives to the weary and heavy-laden, Matt. xi. 28. He will live a life of devotedness to God (v. 9): I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living, that is, in this world, as long as I continue to live in it. The land of the living is a land of mercy, which we ought to be thankful for; it is a land of opportunity, which we should improve.

The Septuagint and some other ancient versions make these verses a distinct psalm separate from the former; and some have called it the Martyr's psalm, for the sake of v. 15. Three things David here makes confession of:—

I. His faith (v. 10): I believed, therefore have I spoken. This is quoted by the apostle (2 Cor. iv. 13) with application to himself and his fellow-ministers, who, though they suffered for Christ, were not ashamed to own him. David believed the being, providence, and promise of God, particularly the assurance God had given him by Samuel that he should exchange his crook for a sceptre: a great deal of hardship he went through in the belief of this, and therefore he spoke, spoke to God by prayer (v. 4), by praise, v. 12.

II. His fear (v. 11): I was greatly afflicted, and then I said in my haste—in my amazement (so some)—in my flight (so others), when Saul was in pursuit of me, All men are liars, all with whom he had to do, Saul and all his courtiers; his friends, who he thought would stand by him, deserted him and disowned him when he fell into disgrace at court. What we speak amiss, in haste, we must by repentance unsay again (as David, xxxi. 22), and then it shall not be laid to our charge.

III. His gratitude, v. 12, &c. God had been better to him than his fears, and had graciously delivered him out of his distresses. What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me? Here he speaks, sensible of many mercies received from God—all his benefits. Not as if he thought he could render anything proportionable, for what he had received; but he desired to render something acceptable, as the acknowledgment of a grateful mind. He will in the most devout and solemn manner offer up his praises and prayers to God, v. 13, 17. "I will take the cup of salvation, that is, I will offer the drink-offerings appointed by the law, in token of my thankfulness to God, and rejoice with my friends in God's goodness to me"; this is called the cup of deliverance because drunk in memory of the deliverance. "God, having bestowed so many benefits upon me, whatever cup he shall put into my hands I will readily take it, and not dispute it; but welcome his holy will." David spoke the language of the Son of David. John xviii. 11, The cup that my Father has given me, shall I not take it and drink it? We must first give our own selves to God as living sacrifices (Rom. xii. 1, 2 Cor. viii. 5), and then lay out of what we have for his honour in works of piety and charity. Why should we offer that to God which costs us nothing? He will always entertain thoughts of God, as very tender of the lives and comforts of his people (v. 15): Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints, so precious that he will not gratify any of David's enemies, with his death. This truth David had comforted himself with in the depth of his distress and danger; and, the event having confirmed it, he comforts others with it. Having asked, What shall I render? here he surrenders himself, which was more than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices (v. 16): O Lord! truly I am thy servant. I choose to be so; I resolve to be so; I will live and die in thy service. He had called God's people, who are dear to him, his saints; but, when he comes to apply it to himself, he does not say, Truly I am thy saint, but, I am thy servant. David was a king, and yet he glories in this, that he was God's servant. Two ways men came to be servants:—First, By birth. "Lord, I was born in thy house; I am the son of thy handmaid, and therefore thine." It is a great mercy to be the children of godly parents, as it obliges us to duty and is pleadable with God for mercy. Secondly, By redemption. He that procured the release of a captive took him for his servant. "Lord, thou hast loosed my bonds; and therefore I am thy servant, and entitled to thy protection as well as obliged to thy work." The very bonds which thou hast loosed shall tie me faster unto thee. He will make conscience of paying his vows and making good what he had promised. Vows are debts that must be paid, for it is better not to vow than to vow and not pay. He will pay his vows in the courts of the tabernacle, in the midst of Jerusalem that he might bring devotion into more reputation.

PSALM CXVII

This psalm is short and sweet; I doubt the reason why we sing it so often as we do is for the shortness of it; but, if we rightly understood and considered it, we should sing it oftener for the sweetness of it. Here is, I. A solemn call to all nations to praise God, ver. 1. II. Proper matter for that praise suggested, ver. 2.

There is a great deal of gospel in this psalm. The apostle has furnished us with a key to it (Rom. xv. 11), where he quotes it as a proof that the gospel was to be preached to the Gentile nations, which yet was so great a stumbling-block to the Jews. Why should that offend them when it is said, and they themselves had often sung it, Praise the Lord, all you Gentiles, and laud him, all you people. Some of the Jewish writers confess that this psalm refers to the kingdom of the Messiah; nay, one of them has a fancy that it consists of two verses to signify that in the days of the Messiah God should be glorified by two sorts of people, by the Jews, according to the law of Moses, and by the Gentiles, according to the seven precepts of the sons of Noah, which yet should make one church, as these two verses make one psalm.

I. The vast extent of the gospel church, v. 1. Here all nations are called to praise the Lord, which could not be applied to the Old Testament times, because, unless the people of the land became Jews and were circumcised, they were not admitted to praise God with them. But the gospel of Christ is ordered to be preached to all nations, and by him the partition-wall is taken down, and those that were afar off are made nigh. Who should be admitted into the church? All nations and all people. The original words are the same that are used for the heathen that rage and the people that imagine against Christ (ii. 1); those that had been enemies to his kingdom should become his willing subjects. The gospel of the kingdom was to be preached to all the world, for a witness to all nations, Matt. xxiv. 14; Mark xvi. 15. The tidings of the gospel, being sent to all nations, should give them cause to praise God; the institution of gospel-ordinances would give them opportunity to praise God; and the power of gospel-grace would give them hearts to praise him.

II. The unsearchable riches of gospel-grace, which are to be the matter of our praise, v. 2. In the gospel those celebrated attributes of God, his mercy and his truth, shine most brightly in themselves and most comfortably to us. Things for which the Gentiles should glorify God (Rom. xv. 8, 9), for the truth of God and for his mercy. God's mercy is the fountain of all our comforts and his truth the foundation of all our hopes, and therefore for both we must praise the Lord.

PSALM CXVIII

It is probable that David penned this psalm when he had, after many a storm, weathered his point at last, and gained a full possession of the kingdom to which he had been anointed. He then invites his friends to join with him in a believing expectation of the promised Messiah, of whose kingdom and his exaltation to it his were typical. To him, it is certain, the prophet here bears witness, in the latter part of the psalm. Christ himself applies it to himself (Matt. xxi. 42), and the former part of the psalm may fairly, and without forcing, be accommodated to him and his undertaking. Some think it was first calculated for the solemnity of the bringing of the ark to the city of David, and was afterwards sung at the feast of tabernacles. In it, I. David calls upon all about him to give to God the glory of his goodness, ver. 1–4. II. He encourages himself and others to trust in God, from the experience he had had of God's power and pity, ver. 5–18. III. He gives thanks for his advancement to the throne, as it was a figure of the exaltation of Christ, ver. 19–23. IV. The people, the priests, and the psalmist himself, triumph in the prospect of the Redeemer's kingdom, ver. 24–29.

Verses 1–18

It appears here, as often elsewhere, that David had his heart full of the goodness of God.

I. He celebrates God's mercy in general, and calls upon others to acknowledge it, from their own experience of it (v. 1). Priests and people, Jews and proselytes, must all own God's goodness, and all join in the same thankful song; if they can say no more, let them say this for him, that his mercy endures for ever, that they have had experience of it all their days.

II. He preserves an account of God's gracious dealings with him in particular. David had, in his time, waded through a great deal of difficulty, which gave him great experience of God's goodness. There are many who, when they are lifted up, care not for speaking of their former depressions; but David takes all occasions to remember his own low estate. He was in distress (v. 5), there were many that hated him (v. 7), and this could not but be a great grief to one of an ingenuous spirit, that strove to gain the good affections of all. All nations compassed me about, v. 10. All the nations adjacent to Israel set themselves to give disturbance to David, when he had newly come to the throne, Philistines, Moabites, Syrians, Ammonites, &c. They were confederate against him. They were virulent and violent, and, for a time, prevalent, in their attempts against him. They compassed me about like bees, came upon him in swarms, set upon him with their malignant stings; but it was to their own destruction, as the bee, they say, loses her life with her sting. Two ways David was brought into trouble:—(1) By the injuries that men did him (v. 13): Thou (O enemy!) hast thrust sore at me. Thrusting thou hast thrust at me (so the word is), so that I was ready to fall. (2) By the afflictions which God laid upon him (v. 18): The Lord has chastened me sore. Men thrust at him for his destruction; God chastened him for his instruction. They thrust at him with the malice of enemies; God chastened him with the love and tenderness of a Father. God heard his prayer (v. 5): "He answered me with enlargements; he did more for me than I was able to ask; he enlarged my heart in prayer and yet gave more largely than I desired." God baffled the designs of his enemies against him: They are quenched as the fire of thorns (v. 12), which burns furiously for a while, makes a great noise and a great blaze, but is presently out, and cannot do the mischief that it threatened. God preserved his life when there was but a step between him and death (v. 18): "He has chastened me, but he has not given me over unto death, for he has not given me over to the will of my enemies." From his own experience he can say, It is better, and more safe, there is more reason to trust in the Lord, than to put confidence in man, yea, though it be in princes, v. 8, 9. It enabled him to triumph in that trust. The Lord is on my side. If we are on God's side, he is on ours; if we be for him and with him, he will be for us and with us (v. 7): "The Lord takes my part, and stands up for me, with those that help me. If God be our strength, he must be our song; if he work all our works in us, he must have all praise and glory from us. If he be our strength and our song, he has become not only our Saviour, but our salvation.

He triumphs in an assurance of the continuance of his comfort, his victory, and his life. First, Of his comfort (v. 15): The voice of rejoicing and salvation is in the tabernacles of the righteous, and in mine particularly, in my family. The dwellings of the righteous in this world are but tabernacles, mean and movable; here we have no city, no continuing city. But these tabernacles are more comfortable to them than the palaces of the wicked are to them; for in the house where religion rules, 1. There is salvation. 2. Where there is salvation there is cause for rejoicing, for continual joy in God. 3. Where there is rejoicing there ought to be the voice of rejoicing, that is, praise and thanksgiving. Secondly, Of his victory: The right hand of the Lord does valiantly (v. 15) and is exalted; for (as some read it) it has exalted me. Thirdly, Of his life (v. 17): "I shall not die by the hands of my enemies that seek my life, but live and declare the works of the Lord; I shall live a monument of God's mercy and power; his works shall be declared in me, and I will make it the business of my life to praise and magnify God, looking upon that as the end of my preservation."

An illustrious prophecy of the humiliation and exaltation of our Lord Jesus, his sufferings, and the glory that should follow. Peter thus applies it directly to the chief priests and scribes, and none of them could charge him with misapplying it, Acts iv. 11.

I. The preface with which this precious prophecy is introduced, v. 19–21. 1. The psalmist desires admission into the sanctuary of God, there to celebrate the glory of him that cometh in the name of the Lord: Open to me the gates of righteousness. So the temple gates are called. And when the gates of righteousness are opened to us we must go into them, must enter into the holiest, as far as we have leave, and praise the Lord. 2. He sees admission granted him (v. 20): This is the gate of the Lord, the gate of his appointing, into which the righteous shall enter. Some by this gate understand Christ, by whom we are taken into fellowship with God and our praises are accepted; he is the way; there is no coming to the Father but by him (John xiv. 6). The psalmist triumphs in the discovery that the gate of righteousness, which had been so long shut, and so long knocked at, was now at length opened. 3. He promises to give thanks to God for this favour (v. 21): I will praise thee. Those that saw Christ's day at so great a distance saw cause to praise God for the prospect; for in him they saw that God had heard them, had heard the prayers of the Old Testament saints for the coming of the Messiah, and would be their salvation.

II. The prophecy itself, v. 22, 23. This may have some reference to David's preferment; he was the stone which Saul and his courtiers rejected, but was by the wonderful providence of God advanced to be the headstone of the building. But its principal reference is to Christ; and here we have, 1. His humiliation. He is the stone which the builders refused; he is the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, Dan. ii. 34. This stone was rejected by the builders, by the rulers and people of the Jews (Acts iv. 8, 10, 11); they refused to own him as the Messiah. They denied him in the presence of Pilate (Acts iii. 13) when they said, We have no king but Cæsar. 2. His exaltation. He has become the headstone of the corner; he is advanced to the highest degree both of honour and usefulness, to be above all, and all in all. He is the chief-corner-stone in the foundation, in whom Jew and Gentile are united, that they may be built up one holy house. He is the chief top-stone in the corner, in whom the building is completed, and who must in all things have the pre-eminence, as the author and finisher of our faith. 3. The hand of God in all this: His hand went with him throughout his whole undertaking, and from first to last he did his Father's will; and this ought to be marvellous in our eyes. Christ's name is Wonderful; and the redemption he wrought out is the most amazing of all God's works of wonder.

III. The joy wherewith it is entertained and the acclamations which attend this prediction.

1. Let the day be solemnized to the honour of God with great joy (v. 24): This is the day the Lord has made. Or it may very fitly be understood of the Christian sabbath, which we sanctify in remembrance of Christ's resurrection, when the rejected stone began to be exalted. Here is the doctrine of the Christian sabbath: It is the day which the Lord has made, has made remarkable, made holy, has distinguished from other days; he has made it for man. We will rejoice and be glad in it, not only in the institution of the day, but in the occasion of it, Christ's becoming the head of the corner. Sabbath days must be rejoicing days.

2. Let the exalted Redeemer be met, and attended, with joyful hosannas, v. 25, 26. This is like Vivat rex —Long live the king, and expresses a hearty joy for his accession to the crown. Hosanna signifies, Save now, I beseech thee. "Lord, save me, I beseech thee; let this Saviour be my Saviour, and, in order to that, my ruler; let me be taken under his protection and owned as one of his willing subjects. Let me have victory over those lusts that war against my soul, and let divine grace go on in my heart conquering and to conquer." "Lord, preserve even the Saviour himself. Let his name be sanctified, his kingdom come, his will be done." Thus let prayer be made for him continually, lxxii. 15. On the Lord's day, when we rejoice in his kingdom, we must pray for the advancement of it more and more. Let the priests, the Lord's ministers, do their part in this great solemnity, v. 26. Let them bless the prince with their praises: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. We must bid him welcome into our hearts, saying, "Come in, thou blessed of the Lord; come in by thy grace and Spirit, and take possession of me for thy own." We must pray for the enlargement and edification of his church, for the ripening of things for his second coming and then that he who has said, Surely I come quickly, would even so come. Christ's ministers are not only warranted, but appointed to pronounce a blessing, in his name, upon all his loyal subjects that love him, and his government in sincerity, Eph. vi. 24.

3. Let sacrifices of thanksgiving be offered to his honour who offered for us the great atoning sacrifice, v. 27. He has shown us light, that is, he has given us the knowledge of himself and his will. He has shined upon us (so some); he has given us occasion for joy and rejoicing, which is light to the soul, by giving us a prospect of everlasting light in heaven. The duty which this privilege calls for: Bind the sacrifice with cords, that, being killed, the blood of it may be sprinkled upon the horns of the altar, according to the law. Or this may have a peculiar significancy here; the sacrifice we are to offer to God, in gratitude for redeeming love, is ourselves, not to be slain upon the altar, but living sacrifices (Rom. xii. 1), to be bound to the altar, spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise.

4. The psalmist concludes with his own thankful acknowledgments of divine grace, in which he calls upon others to join with him, v. 28, 29. He will have all about him to give thanks to God for these glad tidings of great joy to all people, that there is a Redeemer, even Christ the Lord. In him it is that God is good to man and that his mercy endures for ever. He concludes this psalm as he began it (v. 1), for God's glory must be the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, of all our addresses to him.

PSALM CXIX

This is a psalm by itself, like none of the rest; it excels them all. It seems to me to be a collection of David's pious and devout ejaculations, the short and sudden breathings and elevations of his soul to God, which he wrote down as they occurred. There is seldom any coherence between the verses, but, like Solomon's proverbs, it is a chest of gold rings, not a chain of gold links. And we may learn, by the psalmist's example, to accustom ourselves to such pious ejaculations, which are an excellent means of maintaining constant communion with God. What some have said of this psalm is true, "He that shall read it considerately, it will either warm him or shame him." The composition of it is singular and very exact. It is divided into twenty-two parts, according to the number of the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, and each part consists of eight verses, all the verses of the first part beginning with Aleph, all the verses of the second with Beth, and so on, without any flaw throughout the whole psalm. Some have called it the saints' alphabet. However, it would be of use to the learners, a help to them both in committing it to memory and in calling it to mind upon occasion; by the letter the first word would be got, and that would bring in the whole verse; thus young people would the more easily learn it by heart and retain it the better even in old age.

II. The general scope and design of it is to magnify the law, and make it honourable; to set forth the excellency and usefulness of divine revelation, and to recommend it to us for the government of ourselves, by the psalmist's own example, who speaks by experience of the benefit of it, and earnestly prays, from first to last, for the continuance of God's grace with him. There are ten different words by which divine revelation is called in this psalm, each of them expressive of the whole compass of it and of the system of religion which is founded upon it and guided by it. The things contained in the scripture, and drawn from it, are here called, 1. God's law, because they are enacted by him as our Sovereign. 2. His way, because they are the rule both of his providence and of our obedience. 3. His testimonies, because they are solemnly declared to the world. 4. His commandments, because given with authority, and lodged with us as a trust. 5. His precepts, because prescribed to us. 6. His word, or saying, because it is the declaration of his mind, and Christ, the essential eternal Word, is all in all in it. 7. His judgments, because by them we must both judge and be judged. 8. His righteousness, because it is all holy, just, and good, and the rule and standard of righteousness. 9. His statutes, because they are fixed, and of perpetual obligation. 10. His truth, or faithfulness, because the principles upon which the divine law is built are eternal truths And I think there is but one verse (it is ver. 122) in all this long psalm in which there is not one or other of these ten words only in three or four they are used concerning God's providence or David's practice (as ver. 75, 84, 121), and ver. 132 they are called God's name. The great esteem and affection David had for the word of God, is the more admirable considering how little he had of it, in comparison with what we have, no more perhaps in writing than the first books of Moses, which were but the dawning of this day, which may shame us who enjoy the full discoveries of divine revelation and yet are so cold towards it. Many are the instructions which we here find about a religious life. Many are the sweet experiences of one that lived such a life. Here is something or other to suit the case of every Christian.

The psalmist here shows that godly people are happy people. What we must do and be that we may attain to it, we are here told. Those are happy, 1. Who make the will of God the rule of all their actions, v. 1. God's word is a law to them. They walk in the paths of that law. This is walking in God's ways (v. 3), the ways which he has marked out to us. 2. Who are upright and honest in their religion —undefiled in the way, not only who keep themselves unspotted from the world, but who are habitually sincere in their intentions, in whose spirit there is no guile, who are really as good as they seem to be and row the same way as they look. 3. Who are true to the trust reposed in them as God's professing people. Those who would walk in the law of the Lord must keep his testimonies, that is, his truths. Or his testimonies may denote his covenant; the ark of the covenant is called the ark of the testimony. Those do not keep covenant with God who do not keep the commandments of God. 4. Who have a single eye to God as their chief good and highest end in all they do in religion (v. 2): They seek him with their whole heart. 5. Who carefully avoid all sin (v. 3): They do no iniquity. They are conscious of much that clogs them in the ways of God, but not of that iniquity which draws them out of those ways.

Verses 4–6

We must own ourselves under the highest obligations to walk in God's law (v. 4): Thou hast commanded us to keep thy precepts, to make religion our rule, and look up to God for wisdom and grace to do so (v. 5). "Thou wouldest have me keep thy precepts, and, Lord, I fain would keep them." This is the will of God, even our sanctification; and it shall be our will. Every good man has a respect to all God's commandments, those that concern both the inward and the outward man, both the head and the heart. Those who have a sincere respect to all God's commandments shall not be ashamed. They shall have clearness and courage in their own souls.

Verses 7–8

I. David's endeavour to perfect himself in his religion. He hopes to learn God's righteous judgments. He knew much, but he was still pressing forward and desired to know more. As long as we live we must be scholars in Christ's school, and sit at his feet.

II. The use he would make of his divine learning. I will praise thee when I have learned thy judgments, intimating that he could not learn unless God taught him, and that divine instructions are special blessings. Those have well learned God's statutes who have come up to a full resolution, in the strength of his grace, to keep them.

III. His prayer to God not to leave him. Good men see themselves undone if God forsakes them; for then the tempter will be too hard for them.

2. BETH

Verse 9

1. A weighty question asked. By what means may the next generation be made better than this? Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? 2. A satisfactory answer given to this question. Young men may effectually cleanse their way by taking heed thereto according to the word of God. Young men must make the word of God their rule; that will do more towards the cleansing of young men than the laws of princes or the morals of philosophers. They must carefully apply that rule as a standard, and steer by that chart and compass.

Verse 10

David's experience: "I have sought thee. If I have not yet found thee, I have sought thee, and thou never saidst, Seek in vain, nor wilt say so to me, for I have sought thee with my whole heart. Thou that hast inclined me to seek thy precepts, never suffer me to wander from them."

Verse 11

The close application which David made of the word of God to himself: He hid it in his heart that it might be ready to him whenever he had occasion to use it. God's word is a treasure worth laying up, and there is no laying it up safely but in our hearts; if we have it only in our heads, our memories may fail us: but if our hearts be delivered into the mould of it, and the impressions of it remain on our souls, it is safe.

Verse 12

David gives glory to God: "Blessed art thou, O Lord! He asks grace from God: Teach me thy statutes; give me to know and do my duty in everything."

Verses 13–16

I. David had edified others with what he had been taught out of the word of God (v. 13). This he did, not only as a king in making orders, and giving judgment, according to the word of God, nor only as a prophet, by his psalms, but in his common discourse.

II. He looks forward with a holy resolution never to cool in his affection to the word of God; (v. 15): I will meditate in thy precepts. He not only discoursed of them to others but he communed with his own heart about them. David took more delight in God's statutes than in the pleasures of his court or the honours of his camp, more than in his sword or in his harp. When the law is written in the heart duty becomes a delight.

3. GIMEL

Verse 17

David prays, Deal bountifully with me, that I may live. It was God's bounty that gave us life, that gave us this life; and the same bounty that gave it continues it, and gives all the supports and comforts of it. Therefore we ought to spend our lives in God's service.

Verse 18

There are wondrous things in God's law, not only strange things, which are unexpected, but excellent things, which are to be valued, and things which were long hidden from the wise and prudent, but are now revealed unto babes. If there were wonders in the law, much more in the gospel. We are by nature blind to the things of God, till his grace cause the scales to fall from our eyes. And the more God opens our eyes the more wonders we see in the word of God.

Verse 19

The acknowledgment which David makes of his own condition: I am a stranger in the earth. All good people confess themselves to be so; for heaven is their home, and the world is but their inn, the land of their pilgrimage. David was a man that knew as much of the world, and was as well known in it, as most men. He had a name like the names of the great men, and yet he calls himself a stranger. "Lord, show thy commandments to me; as long as I live, give me to be growing in my acquaintance with it. I am a stranger, and therefore stand in need of a guide, a guard, a companion, a comforter; let me have thy commandments always in view, for they will be all this to me, all that a poor stranger can desire."

Verse 20

David had prayed that God would open his eyes (v. 18) and open the law (v. 19); now here he pleads the earnestness of his desire for knowledge and grace.

Verse 21

The wretched character of wicked people. The temper of their minds is bad. They are proud; they magnify themselves above others. And yet that is not all: they magnify themselves against God, and set up their wills in opposition to the will of God. There is something of pride at the bottom of every wilful sin. They do err from thy commandments, and embrace principles contrary to thy commandments, and then no wonder that they err in practice. They are certainly cursed, for God resists the proud; and those that throw off the commands of the law lay themselves under its curse (Gal. iii. 10).

Verse 22

David prays against the reproach and contempt of men, that they might be removed, or (as the word is) rolled, from off him. This intimates that they lay upon him, and that neither his greatness nor his goodness could secure him from being libelled and lampooned. He was not jeered out of well-doing: "Lord, remove it from me, for I have kept thy testimonies notwithstanding." If in a day of trial we still retain our integrity, we may be sure it will end well.

Verse 23

David was abused even by great men, who should have known better his character and his case. Herein David was a type of Christ, for they were the princes of this world that vilified and crucified the Lord of glory, 1 Cor. ii. 8. Under these abuses: he meditated in God's statutes, went on in his duty, and did not regard them. When they spoke against him, he found that in the word of God which spoke for him, and spoke comfort to him, and then none of these things moved him.

Verse 24

Here David explains his meditating in God's statutes (v. 23), which was of such use to him when princes sat and spoke against him. God's statutes were his counsellors, and they counselled him to bear it patiently and commit his cause to God.

4. DALETH

I. David's complaint. My soul cleaves to the dust, which is a complaint either, 1. Of his corruptions, his inclination to the world, and a deadness to holy duties. David's complaint here is like St. Paul's of a body of death that he carried about with him. Or, 2. Of his afflictions, either trouble of mind or outward trouble, and both together brought him even to the dust of death.

II. His petition for relief: "Quicken thou me according to thy word. By thy providence put life into my affairs, by thy grace put life into my affections; cure me of my spiritual deadness and make me lively in my devotion."

Verses 26–27

David had opened his case, opened his very heart to God: "I have declared my ways, and acknowledged thee in them all, have taken thee along with me in all my designs and enterprises." It is an unspeakable comfort to a gracious soul to think with what tenderness all its complaints are received by a gracious God, 1 John v. 14, 15. "Let me have a good understanding of the way of thy precepts; so shall I talk with the more assurance of thy wondrous works."

Verses 28–29

1. David's representation of his own griefs: My soul melteth for heaviness, which is to the same purport with v. 25, My soul cleaveth to the dust. Heaviness in the heart of man makes it to melt, to drop away like a candle that wastes. 2. His request for God's grace: "Strengthen thou me with strength in my soul, according to thy word. (Deut. xxxiii. 25): Remove from me the way of lying. David had, in a strait, cheated Ahimelech (1 Sam. xxi. 2), and Achish, v. 13 and ch. xxvii. 10. Great difficulties are great temptations to palliate a lie with the colour of a pious fraud and a necessary self-defence; therefore David prays that God would prevent him from falling into this sin any more. Grant me thy law graciously; grant me that to keep me from the way of lying. David had the law written with his own hand, for the king was obliged to transcribe a copy of it for his own use (Deut. xvii. 18); but he prays that he might have it written in his heart. "Grant it me graciously"; he begs it as a special token of God's favour.

Verses 30–32

Those who will make anything to purpose of their religion must first make it their deliberate choice; so David did: I have chosen the way of truth. Thy judgments have I laid before me, as he who learns to write lays his copy before him, that he may write according to it, as the workman lays his model and platform before him, that he may do his work exactly. We must have the word in our heart by an habitual conformity to it, that we may walk by rule. Those who make religion their choice and rule are likely to adhere to it faithfully. The choosing Christian is likely to be the steady Christian; while those that are Christians by chance tack about if the wind turn. "Lord, put me not to shame; do not reject my services, which will put me to the greatest confusion." The more comfort God gives us the more duty he expects from us, v. 32. God by his Spirit, enlarges the hearts of his people when he gives them wisdom (for that is called largeness of heart, 1 Kings iv. 29), when he sheds abroad the love of God in the heart, and puts gladness there. The joy of our Lord should be wheels to our obedience.

5. He

I. David begs to be taught of God, as knowing that none teaches like him, Job xxxvi. 22. Teach me the way of my duty in such a way as no man could teach: Lord, give me understanding.

II. He promises faithfully that he would be a good scholar. If God would teach him, he was sure he should learn to good purpose: "I shall keep the law, which I shall never do unless I be taught of God."

Verses 35–36

He had before prayed to God to enlighten his understanding, that he might know his duty; here he prays to God to bow his will, and quicken the active powers of his soul, that he might do his duty; for it is God that works in us both to will and to do, as well as to understand, what is good, Phil. ii. 13. "Make me to do; strengthen me for every good work." Incline my heart to thy testimonies, to those things which thy testimonies prescribe; not only make me willing to do my duty, as that which I must do, but make me desirous to do my duty. Duty is done with delight when the heart is inclined to it: it is God's grace that inclines us. "Restrain and mortify the inclination there is in me to covetousness." That is a sin which stands opposed to all God's testimonies. Those that would have the love of God rooted in them must get the love of the world rooted out of them.

Verse 37

David prays for restraining grace: Turn away my eyes from beholding vanity. The honours, pleasures, and profits of the world are the vanities, the prospect of which draw multitudes away from the paths of religion and godliness. The eye, when fastened on these, infects the heart with the love of them, and so it is alienated from God and divine things; so we ought to pray that God by his providence would keep vanity out of our sight and that by his grace he would keep us from being enamoured with the sight of it.

Verse 38

A good man is God's servant, subject to his law and employed in his work, that is, devoted to his fear, given up to his direction and disposal, and taken up with high thoughts of him and all those acts of devotion which have a tendency to his glory. Those that are God's servants may, in faith and with humble boldness, pray that God would establish his word to them, that is, that he would fulfil his promises to them in due time. What God has promised we must pray for; we need not be so aspiring as to ask more; we need not be so modest as to ask less.

Verse 39

David prays against reproach, as before, v. 22. He had done that which might give occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme; now he prays that God, who has all men's hearts and tongues in his hands, would be pleased to prevent this, to deliver him from all his transgressions, that he might not be the reproach of the foolish, which he feared (xxxix. 8). "Lord, thou sittest in the throne, and thy judgments are right and good, just and kind, to those that are wronged, and therefore to thee I appeal from the unjust and unkind censures of men."

Verse 40

David professes the ardent affection he had to the word of God: "I have longed after thy precepts, not only loved them, but I have earnestly desired to know them more. Thou hast wrought in me this languishing desire, put life into me, that I may prosecute it; quicken me in thy righteousness, in thy righteous ways, according to thy righteous promise."

6. Vau

Verses 41–42

1. David's prayer for the salvation of the Lord. "Lord, thou art my Saviour; I am miserable in myself, and thou only canst make me happy; let thy salvation come to me. Hasten temporal salvation to me from my present distresses, and hasten me to the eternal salvation, by giving me the necessary qualifications for it." Dependence upon the grace and promise of God for that salvation are the two pillars on which our hope is built, and they will not fail us.

Verses 43–44

David's humble petition for the tongue of the learned, that he might know how to speak a word in season for the glory of God: Take not the word of truth utterly out of my mouth. He means, "Lord, let the word of truth be always in my mouth; let me have the wisdom and courage which are necessary to enable me both to use my knowledge for the instruction of others, and to make profession of my faith whenever I am called to it." He professes his resolution to adhere to his duty in the strength of God's grace: "So I shall keep thy law continually. If I have thy word not only in my heart, but in my mouth, I shall do all I should do, stand complete in thy whole will."

Verses 45–48

What David experienced of an affection to the law of God: "I seek thy precepts, v. 45. I do all I can to understand what the will of the Lord is and to discover his mind. I seek thy precepts, for I have loved them. v. 47, 48. I not only give consent to them as good, but as good for me." Five things he promises himself in the strength of God's grace:—(1) That he should be free and easy in his duty: "I will walk at liberty, freed from that which is evil, and free to that which is good, doing it not by constraint but willingly." (2) That he should be bold and courageous in his duty: I will speak of thy testimonies also before kings. We must never be afraid to our own religion, though it should expose us to the wrath of kings, but speak of it as that which we will live and die by, like the three children before Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. iii. 16; Acts iv. 20. (3) That he should be cheerful and pleasant in his duty (v. 47): "I will delight myself in thy commandments, in conversing with them, in conforming to them. I will never be so well pleased with myself as when I do that which is pleasing to God." (4) That he should be diligent and vigorous in his duty: I will lift up my hands to thy commandments. "I will lay my hands to the command, not only to praise it, but practise it; nay, I will lift up my hands to it, that is I will put forth all the strength I have to do it." (5) That he should be thoughtful and considerate in his duty (v. 48): "I will meditate in thy statutes."

7. ZAIN

David here pleads with God in prayer for that mercy and grace which he hoped for. God had given him the promise on which he hoped: "Lord, I desire no more than that thou wouldst remember thy word unto thy servant, and do as thou hast said"; see 1 Chron. xvii. 23. Thou art faithful, and therefore wilt perform what thou hast promised, and not break thy word. He that did by his Spirit work faith in us, will, according to our faith, work for us, and will not disappoint us.

David's experience of benefit by the word. "Thy word has quickened me. It made me alive when I was dead in sin; it has many a time made me lively when I was dead in duty; it has quickened me to that which is good when I was backward and averse to it, and it has quickened me in that which is good when I was cold and indifferent."

Verse 51

David had been jeered for his religion. Though he had done eminent services to his country, yet, because he was a devout conscientious man, the proud had him greatly in derision; they laughed at him for his praying, and called it cant, for his seriousness, and called it mopishness, for his strictness, and called it needless preciseness. Yet he had not been jeered out of his religion. The traveller goes on his way though the dogs bark at him. Those can bear but little for Christ that cannot bear a hard word for him.

Verse 52

When David was derided for his godliness he not only held fast his integrity, but comforted himself. He not only bore reproach, but bore it cheerfully. It was a comfort to him to think that it was for God's sake that he bore reproach. Those that are derided for their adherence to God's law may comfort themselves with this, that the reproach of Christ will prove, in the end, greater riches to them than the treasures of Egypt.

Verse 53

Those that are openly and grossly wicked: They forsake thy law. The impression which the wickedness of the wicked made upon David: it frightened him. He trembled to think of the dishonour done to God, the gratification given to Satan, and the mischiefs done to the souls of men. He dreaded the consequences of it both to the sinners themselves and to the interests of God's kingdom among men.

Verse 54

This world is the house of our pilgrimage, the house in which we are pilgrims. We must confess ourselves strangers and pilgrims upon earth, who are not at home here, nor must be here long. Even David's palace is but the house of his pilgrimage. "Thy statutes have been my songs, with which I here entertain myself," as travellers are wont to divert the thoughts of their weariness, and take off something of the tediousness of their journey, by singing a pleasant song now and then. David was the sweet singer of Israel, and here we are told whence he fetched his songs; they were all borrowed from the word of God.

Verses 55–56

When others were sleeping David was remembering God's name, and, by repeating that lesson, increasing his acquaintance with it; in the night of affliction this he called to mind. I remembered thy name in the night, and therefore was careful to keep thy law all day. "I had the comfort of keeping thy law because I kept it." God's work is its own wages. A heart to obey the will of God is a most valuable reward of obedience.

8. CHETH

Verse 57

David can appeal to God in this matter: "Lord, thou knowest that I have chosen thee for my portion, and depend upon thee to make me happy." He makes the law of God his rule: I have said that I would keep thy words; and what I have said by thy grace I will do, and will abide by it to the end." Those that take God for their portion must take him for their prince.

Verse 58

David, having in the foregoing verse reflected upon his covenants with God, here reflects upon his prayers to God, and renews his petition. He prays, "Be merciful to me, in the forgiveness of what I have done amiss, and in giving me grace to do better for the future." He prayed—with his whole heart.

Verses 59–60

He thought on his ways. The word signifies a fixed abiding thought. Some make it an allusion to those who work embroidery, who are very exact and careful to cover the least flaw, or to those who cast up their accounts, who reckon with themselves, What do I owe? What am I worth? He turned his feet to God's testimonies. He determined to make the word of God his rule, and to walk by that rule. He did this immediately and without demur (v. 60): I made haste and delayed not. Now this account which David here gives of himself may refer either to his constant practice every day, or it may refer to his first acquaintance with God and religion, when he began to throw off the vanity of childhood and youth, and to remember his Creator.

Verse 61

David's enemies were wicked men, who hated him for his godliness and tried to take away his good name. But here are the testimonies of David's conscience for him that he had held fast his religion when he was stripped of everything else, as Job did when the bands of the Chaldeans and Sabeans had robbed him: But I have not forgotten thy law.

Verse 62

Though David is, in this psalm, much in prayer, yet he did not neglect the duty of thanksgiving; for those that pray much will have much to give thanks for. He does not say, "I will give thanks because of thy favours to me," but, "Because of thy righteous judgments, all the disposals of thy providence in wisdom and equity." David's heart was set upon his thanksgivings. He would rise at midnight to give thanks to God. Public worship will not excuse us from secret worship. He did not lie still and give thanks, but rose out of his bed, perhaps in the cold and in the dark, to do it the more solemnly.

Verse 63

David had often expressed the great love he had to God; here he expresses the great love he had to the people of God. He loved them; not so much because they were his best friends, and most forward to serve him, but because they were such as feared God and kept his precepts. He was a companion of them. He joined with them in holy ordinances in the courts of the Lord, where rich and poor, prince and peasant, meet together. He sympathized with them in their joys and sorrows (Heb. x. 33).

Verse 64

David pleads that God is good to all the creatures according to their necessities and capacities; as the heaven is full of God's glory, so the earth is full of his mercy. Not only the children of men upon the earth, but even the inferior creatures, taste of God's goodness. He therefore prays that God would be good to him according to his necessity and capacity.

9. TETH

Verses 65–66

David makes a thankful acknowledgment of God's gracious dealings with him all along: Thou hast dealt well with thy servant. However God has dealt with us, we must own he has dealt well with us, better than we deserve, and all in love and with design to work for our good. Upon these experiences he grounds a petition for divine instruction: "Teach me good judgment and knowledge." Teach me a good taste (so the word signifies), a good relish, to discern things that differ, to distinguish between truth and falsehood, good and evil; for the ear tries words, as the mouth tastes meat. Many have knowledge who have little judgment. Where God has given a good heart a good head too may in faith be prayed for.

Verse 67

David tells: 1. Of the temptations of a prosperous condition: "Before I was afflicted, while I lived in peace and plenty, and knew no sorrow, I went astray from God and my duty." Prosperity is the unhappy occasion of much iniquity; it makes people conceited of themselves, indulgent of the flesh, forgetful of God, in love with the world, and deaf to the reproofs of the word. See xxx. 6. 2. Of the benefit of an afflicted state: "Now have I kept thy word, and so have been recovered from my wanderings." God often makes use of afflictions as a means to reduce those to himself who have wandered from him. The prodigal's distress brought him to himself first and then to his father.

Verse 68

David praises God's goodness and gives him the glory of it: Thou art good and doest good. "Lord, thou doest good to all, art the bountiful benefactor of all the creatures; this is the good I beg thou wilt do to me,—Instruct me in my duty, incline me to it, and enable me to do it.

Verses 69–70

Those that were proud envied David's reputation, because it eclipsed them, and therefore did all they could to blemish him. They therefore persuaded themselves it was no sin to tell a deliberate lie if it might but expose him to contempt. David bore it patiently; he kept that precept which forbade him to render railing for railing. He did not envy their prosperity. Their heart is as fat as grease. The proud are at ease (cxxiii. 4); they are full of the world, and the wealth and pleasures of it; and this makes them secure, and stupid; they are past feeling. They roll themselves in the pleasures of sense. I would not change conditions with them. I delight in thy law; I build my security upon the promises of God's word. The children of God, who are acquainted with spiritual pleasures, need not envy the children of this world their carnal pleasures.

Verse 71

The proud and the wicked lived in pomp and pleasure, while David, though he kept close to God and his duty, was still in affliction. David could speak experimentally: It was good for me; many a good lesson he had learnt by his afflictions. The afflictions had contributed to the improvement of his knowledge and grace. He that chastened him taught him.

Verse 72

God's law, which he got acquaintance with by his affliction, was better to him than all the gold and silver which he lost by his affliction. David had but a little of the word of God in comparison with what we have, yet see how highly he valued it. We have both the Old and New Testament complete. He valued the law, because it is the law of God's mouth, the revelation of his will. His riches increased, and yet he did not set his heart upon them, but upon the word of God.

10. JOD

David adores God as the author of his being, Job x. 8. Every man is as truly the work of God's hands as the first man was, Ps. cxxxix. 15, 16. "Thy hands have not only made me, but fashioned me, and given me this being, this noble and excellent being, endued with these powers and faculties." He addresses himself to God as the God of grace, and begs he will be the author of his new and better being. "Lord, make me anew by thy grace, that I may answer the ends of my creation and live to some purpose: Give me understanding, that I may learn thy commandments."

Verse 74

The confidence of this good man in the hope of God's salvation: "I have hoped in thy word. It is a hope that maketh not ashamed; but is present satisfaction, and fruition at last." The comforts which some of God's children have in God, and the favours they have received from him, should be matter of joy to others of them.

Verse 75

Still David is in affliction, and owns his sin was justly corrected: I know, O Lord! that thy judgments are right, are righteousness itself. We know that God is holy in his nature and wise and just in all the acts of his government, and therefore we cannot but know, in the general, that his judgments are right, though, in some particular instances, there may be difficulties which we cannot easily resolve. Afflictions are in the covenant, and therefore they are not meant for our hurt, but are intended for our good.

Verses 76–77

An earnest petition to God for his favour. Those that own the justice of God in their afflictions (as David had done, v. 75) may, in faith, and with humble boldness, be earnest for the mercy of God, and the tokens and fruits of that mercy, in their affliction. He prays for God's merciful kindness (v. 76), his tender mercies, v. 77. "Let these come to me," that is, "the evidence of them and the effects of them; let them work my relief and deliverance. That will comfort me when nothing else will; that will comfort me whatever grieves me."

Verses 78–79

There were those that dealt perversely with him and misconstrued all he said and did, but David regarded it not. He knew it was without cause. The causeless reproach, like the curse causeless, does not hurt us, and therefore should not move us. He could pray, in faith: "Let them be ashamed, that is, let them be brought either to repentance or to ruin." He valued the goodwill of saints. Let those that fear thee turn to me. Good men desire the friendship and society of those that are good. Some think it intimates that when David had been guilty of that foul sin in the murder of Uriah, those that feared God turned from him, for they were ashamed of him; this troubled him, and therefore he prays, Lord, let them turn to me again.

Verse 80

David's prayer for sincerity. His dread of the consequences of hypocrisy: "Let my heart be sound, that I may come boldly to the throne of grace, and may lift up my face without spot at the great day."

11. CAPH

Verses 81–82

He longs for the salvation of the Lord and for his word, that is, salvation according to the word. He is eager for the objects of faith, salvation from the present calamities and doubts and fears. It may be understood of the coming of the Messiah; the souls of the faithful even fainted to see that salvation of which the prophets testified. (1 Pet. i. 10); their eyes failed for it. Abraham saw it at a distance, and so did others, but at such a distance that they could not steadfastly see it. David cried out, "When wilt thou comfort me?" When the eyes fail yet the faith must not; for the vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak and shall not lie.

Verse 83

David begs God would make haste to comfort him, for I have become like a bottle in the smoke, a leathern bottle, which, if it hung any while in the smoke, was not only blackened with soot, but dried, and parched, and shrivelled up. David was thus wasted by age, and sickness, and sorrow. David had been of a ruddy countenance, but now he is withered, his colour is gone, his cheeks are furrowed. A bottle, when it is thus wrinkled with the smoke, is thrown by, and there is no more use of it. Thus was David, in his low estate, looked upon as a despised broken vessel. Though his affliction was great, yet it had not driven him from his duty, and therefore he was within the reach of God's promise: Yet do I not forget thy statutes.

Verse 84

David prays against the instruments of his troubles. He prays not for power to avenge himself (he bore no malice to any), but that God would take to himself the vengeance that belonged to him. "The days of my affliction are many; thou seest, Lord, how many they be; when wilt thou return in mercy to me? O let the days of my trouble be shortened."

Verses 85–87

David's state was herein a type and figure of the state both of Christ and Christians grievously persecuted. His persecutors were proud. They were unjust. They dug pits for him, which intimates that they were deliberate in their designs against him. They herein showed their enmity to God himself. The pits they dug for him were not after God's law; he means they were very much against his law, which forbids to devise evil to our neighbour. The law appointed that, if a man dug a pit which occasioned any mischief, he should answer for the mischief (Exod. xxi. 33, 34), much more when it was dug with a mischievous design. He begs that God would stand by him, and succour him: "They persecute me; help thou me; help me under my troubles, that I may bear them patiently, and in due time help me out of my troubles." God help me is an excellent comprehensive prayer; it is a pity that it should ever be used lightly and as a by-word.

Verse 88

David at prayer for divine grace: "Quicken me after thy lovingkindness, so shall I keep thy testimonies." He had prayed before, Quicken me in thy righteousness (v. 40); but here, Quicken me after thy lovingkindness. The surest token of God's goodwill toward us is his good work in us.

12. LAMED

Verses 89–91

The psalmist acknowledges the unchangeableness of the word of God and of all his counsels: "For ever, O Lord! thy word is settled. Thou art for ever thyself (so some read it); thou art the same, and with thee there is no variableness and this is a proof of it. Thy word, by which the heavens were made, is settled there in the abiding products of it." Thy faithfulness is unto all generations. He produces, for proof of it, the constancy of the course of nature: Thou hast established the earth for ever and it abides. It is by virtue of God's promise to Noah (Gen. viii. 22) that day and night, summer and winter, observe a steady course. All the creatures are, in their places, and according to their capacities, serviceable to their Creator, and answer the ends of their creation; and shall man be the only rebel, the only revolter from his allegiance, and the only unprofitable burden of the earth?

Verse 92

David was in affliction, and ready to perish in his affliction, not likely to die, so much as likely to despair; he therefore admires the goodness of God to him, that he had kept the possession of his own soul, was enabled to keep close to his God and was not driven from his religion. God's law was his delight in his affliction; it afforded him abundant matter of comfort. His meditations on it, were his delightful entertainment in solitude and sorrow. A Bible is a pleasant companion at any time.

Verse 93

The best evidence of our love to the word of God is never to forget it. See here what is the best help for bad memories, namely, good affections.

Verse 94

David claims relation to God: "I am thine, devoted to thee and owned by thee, thine in covenant." He proves his claim: "I have sought thy precepts." This will be the best evidence that we belong to God.

Verse 95

David complains of the malice of his enemies. He comforts himself in the word of God as his protection: "While they are contriving my destruction, I consider thy testimonies, which secure to me my salvation."

Verse 96

David's testimony: I have seen an end of all perfection. Poor perfection which one sees an end of! Yet such are all those things in this world which pass for perfections. David, in his time, had seen Goliath, the strongest, overcome, Asahel, the swiftest, overtaken, Ahithophel, the wisest, befooled, Absalom, the fairest, deformed; and, in short, he had seen an end of perfection, of all perfection. The glory of man is but as the flower of the grass. But thy commandment is broad, exceedingly broad. The word of God reaches to all cases, to all times.

13. MEM

Verse 97

David's inexpressible love to the word of God: O how love I thy law! He not only loved the promises, but loved the law, and delighted in it after the inner man. What we love we love to think of; by this it appeared that David loved the word of God that it was his meditation.

Verses 98–100

An account of David's learning. In his youth he minded business in the country as a shepherd; from his youth he minded business in the court and camp. Which way then could he get any great stock of learning? He had it from God as the author: Thou hast made me wise. He had it by the word of God as the means, by his commandments and his testimonies. A good man, wherever he goes, carries his Bible along with him, if not in his hands, yet in his head and in his heart. The best way to improve in knowledge is to abide and abound in all the instances of serious godliness; for, if any man do his will, he shall know of the doctrine of Christ, shall know more and more of it, John vii. 17. The love of the truth prepares for the light of it; the pure in heart shall see God here. He outwitted his enemies; God, by these means, made him wiser to baffle and defeat their designs. He outstripped his teachers, and had more understanding than all of them. He may mean those who had been his teachers when he was young; he built so well upon the foundation which they had laid that, with the help of his Bible, he became able to teach them. It is no reflection upon our teachers, but rather an honour to them, to improve so as to excel them. He outdid the ancients, either those of his day or those of former days. In short, the written word is a surer guide to heaven than all the doctors and fathers, the teachers and ancients, of the church; and the sacred writings kept, and kept to, will teach us more wisdom than all their writings.

Verse 101

David's care to avoid the ways of sin: "I have refrained my feet from the evil ways they were ready to step aside into. I checked myself and drew back as soon as I was aware that I was entering into temptation." His abstaining from sin was evidence that he did conscientiously aim to keep God's word and had made that his rule.

Verse 102

David's constancy in his religion. He had not departed from God's judgments; he had not chosen any other rule than the word of God, nor had he wilfully deviated from that rule. "It was divine grace in my heart that enabled me to receive those instructions."

Verses 103–104

The pleasure and delight which David took in the word of God; it was sweet to his taste, sweeter than honey. There is such a thing as a spiritual taste, an inward savour and relish of divine things. The word of God helped him to a good head: "Through thy precepts I get understanding to discern between truth and falsehood, good, and evil, so as not to mistake either in the conduct of my own life or in advising others." It helped him to a good heart: "Therefore, because I have got understanding of the truth, I hate every false way, and am steadfastly resolved not to turn aside into it."

14. Nun

Verse 105

The nature of the word of God, and the great intention of giving it to the world; it is a lamp and a light. It discovers to us, concerning God and ourselves, that which otherwise we could not have known. The commandment is a lamp kept burning with the oil of the Spirit; it is like the lamps in the sanctuary, and the pillar of fire to Israel. It must be not only a light to our eyes, to gratify them, but a light to our feet and to our path, to direct us in the choice of our way in general and in the particular steps we take in that way.

Verse 106

The notion David had of religion; it is keeping God's righteous judgments. God's commands are his judgments. It is good for us to bind ourselves with a solemn oath to be religious. We must swear to the Lord as subjects swear allegiance to their sovereign, promising fealty, appealing to God concerning our sincerity in this promise.

Verse 107

David laboured under many discouragements. The recourse he has to God in this condition; he prays for his grace: "Quicken me, O Lord! make me lively, make me cheerful; quicken me by afflictions to greater diligence in my work."

Verse 108

What David here earnestly prays for are the acceptance of the free-will-offerings, not of his purse, but of his mouth, his prayers and praises. They must be free-will-offerings, for we must offer them abundantly and cheerfully, and it is this willing mind that is accepted.

Verses 109–110

David in danger of losing his life. There is but a step between him and death, for the wicked have laid a snare for him; Saul did so many a time, because he hated him for his piety. What they could not effect by open force they hoped to compass by treachery, which made him say, My soul is continually in my hand. In the multitude of his cares for his own safety he finds room in his head and heart for the word of God, and has that in his mind as fresh as ever; and where that dwells richly it will be a well of living water.

Verses 111–112

The psalmist resolves to stick to the word of God and to live and die by it. "Thy testimonies (the truths, the promises, of thy word) have I taken as a heritage for ever, for they are the rejoicing of my heart." He expected an eternal happiness in God's testimonies. The covenant God had made with him was an everlasting covenant, and therefore he took it as a heritage for ever. He resolves to govern himself by it: I have inclined my heart to do thy statutes. Those that would have the blessings of God's testimonies must come under the bonds of his statutes.

15. Samech

David's dread of the risings of sin, and the first beginnings of it: I hate vain thoughts. Though David could not say that he was free from vain thoughts, yet he could say that he hated them; he did not countenance them, nor give them any entertainment, but did what he could to keep them out, at least to keep them under. But thy law do I love, which forbids those vain thoughts, and threatens them. The more we love the law of God the more we shall get the mastery of our vain thoughts, the more hateful they will be to us.

Verse 114

David, when Saul pursued him, often betook himself to close places for shelter; in war he guarded himself with his shield. Now God was both these to him, a hiding-place to preserve him from danger and a shield to preserve him in danger, his life from death and his soul from sin.

Verse 115

I will keep the commandments of my God. Bravely resolved! like a saint, like a soldier; for true courage consists in a steady resolution against all sin and for all duty. Those that resolve to keep the commandments of God must have no society with evil-doers; for bad company is a great hindrance to a holy life.

We must not choose wicked people for our companions, Ps. i. 1; Eph. v. 11.

Verses 116–117

David prays for sustaining grace; for this grace sufficient he besought the Lord twice: Uphold me; and again, Hold thou me up. He sees himself not only unable to go on in his duty by any strength of his own, but in danger of falling into sin unless he was prevented by divine grace. We stand no longer than God holds us and go no further than he carries us. Those that hope in God's word may be sure that the word will not fail them, and therefore their hope will not make them ashamed.

Verses 118–120

God's judgment on wicked people, on those that wander from his statutes, that will not have God to reign over them. Now see how God deals with them, that you may neither fear them nor envy them. He puts them all away like dross. Wicked people are as dross, which, though it be mingled with the good metal in the ore, and seems to be of the same substance with it, must be separated from it. God casts them off because they err from his statutes and because their deceit is falsehood, that is, because they deceive themselves by setting up false rules, in opposition to God's statutes, and because they go about to deceive others with their hypocritical pretences. David's fear of the wrath of God: My flesh trembles for fear of thee. Instead of insulting over those who fell under God's displeasure, he humbled himself.

16. AIN

David had not done wrong; he could truly say, "I have done judgment and justice, I have made conscience of rendering to all their due, and have not by force or fraud hindered any of their right." He is sensible that he cannot make his part good himself, and therefore begs that God would appear for him. Christ is our surety with God; and, if he be so, Providence shall be our surety against all the world.

Verse 123

David, being oppressed, is here waiting and wishing for the salvation of the Lord. He cannot but think that it comes slowly. He was sometimes ready to despair and to think that, because the salvation did not come when he looked for it, it would never come. Though our eyes fail, yet God's word does not, and therefore those that build upon it, though now discouraged, shall in due time see his salvation.

Verses 124–125

David's petition for divine instruction: "Teach me thy statutes; give me to know all my duty." In difficult times we should desire more to be told what we must do than what we may expect, and should pray more to be led into the knowledge of scripture-precepts than of scripture-prophecies. He pleads his relation to God: "I am thy servant, and have work to do for thee; therefore teach me to do it and to do it well."

Verse 126

A complaint of the daring impiety of the wicked. A desire that God would appear, for the vindication of his own honour: "It is time for thee, Lord, to work, to do something for the effectual confutation of atheists and infidels, and the silencing of those that set their mouth against the heavens." Some read it, and the original will bear it, It is time to work for thee, O Lord! it is time for everyone in his place to appear on the Lord's side—against the threatening growth of profaneness and immorality.

Verses 127–128

David here, as often in this psalm, professes the great love he had to the word and law of God. David saw that the word of God answers all purposes better than money does, for it enriches the soul towards God; and therefore he loved it better than gold, for it had done that for him which gold could not do, and would stand him in stead when the wealth of the world would fail him.

17. PE

The word of God gives us admirable discoveries of God, and Christ, and another world; admirable proofs of divine love and grace. The majesty of the style, the purity of the matter, the harmony of the parts, are all wonderful. Its effects upon the consciences of men, both for conviction and comfort, are wonderful.

Verse 130

The great use for which the word of God was intended, to give light, that is, to give understanding. Even the entrance of God's word gives light. If we begin at the beginning, and take it before us, we shall find that the very first verses of the Bible give us surprising and yet satisfying discoveries of the origin of the universe. We find we begin to see when we begin to study the word of God. Some understand it of the New Testament, which is the opening or unfolding of the Old, which would give light concerning life and immortality. It shows us a way to heaven so plain that the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein.

Verse 131

When Christ is formed in the soul there are gracious longings. I opened my mouth and panted, as one overcome with heat, or almost stifled, pants for a mouthful of fresh air.

Verse 132

David's request for God's favour to himself: "Look graciously upon me; and be merciful to me." How humble his petition is! He asks not for the operations of God's hand, only for the smiles of his face; and for that he does not plead merit, but implores mercy. "Lord, I am one of those that love thy name, love thee and thy word, and thou usest to be kind to those that do so." The dealings of God with those that love him are such that a man needs not desire to be any better dealt with, 1 Cor. x. 13.

Verse 133

David is, in this verse, as earnest for the good work of God in him, as in the verse before, for the goodwill of God towards him. "Order my steps in thy word; having led me into the right way, let every step I take in that way be under the guidance of thy grace." "Let no iniquity have dominion over me that I should be led captive by it."

Verse 134

David prays that he might live a quiet and peaceable life, and might not be harassed and discomposed by those that studied to be vexatious. "Let me be delivered out of the hands of my enemies, so shall I keep thy precepts more cheerfully."

Verse 135

David here, as often elsewhere, writes himself God's servant, a title he gloried in, though he was a king. He is very ambitious of his Master's favour, accounting that his happiness and chief good. "Make thy face to shine upon thy servant; let me be accepted of thee, and let me know that I am so. If the world frown upon me, yet do thou smile."

Verse 136

David in sorrow, to such a degree that he weeps rivers of tears. David had prayed for comfort in God's favour (v. 135); now he pleads that he was qualified for that comfort, and had need of it, for he was one of those that mourned in Zion, Isa. lxi. 3. He wept not for his troubles, though they were many, but for the dishonour done to God: Because they keep not thy law, that is, those about me, v. 139.

18. TZADDI

Verses 137–138

The righteousness of God. He rules the world by his providence, according to the principles of justice and never did, nor ever can do, any wrong to any of his creatures. As he acts like himself, so his law requires that we act like ourselves and like him, that we be just to ourselves and to all we deal with, true to all the engagements we lay ourselves under both to God and man.

Verse 139

The great contempt which wicked men put upon religion: My enemies have forgotten thy words. David reckoned those his enemies who forgot the words of God because they were enemies to religion, therefore his zeal consumed him, when he observed their impieties. Zeal against sin should constrain us to do what we can against it in our places, at least to do so much the more in religion ourselves.

Verse 140

Every good man, being a servant of God, loves the word of God, because it lets him know his Master's will and directs him in his Master's work.

Verse 141

God has chosen the foolish things of the world, and it has been the common lot of his people to be a despised people. David poor and yet pious, would not throw off his religion, though it exposed him to contempt, for he knew that was designed to try his constancy.

Verse 142

God's word is a law, and that law is truth. We are reasonable creatures, and as such we must be ruled by truth. If the principles be true, the practices must be agreeable to them, else we do not act rationally. We are creatures, and therefore subjects, and must be ruled by our Creator; and whatever he commands we are bound to obey as a law. Here is truth brought to the understanding, there to sit chief, and direct the motions of the whole man; but, lest the authority of that should become weak through the flesh, here is a law to bind the will and bring that into subjection.

Verses 143–144

David finds himself not only mean, but miserable, as far as this world could make him so: Trouble and anguish have taken hold on me—trouble without, anguish within. Yet thy commandments are my delights. There are delights, variety of delights, in the word of God, which the saints have often the sweetest enjoyment of when they are in trouble and anguish, 2 Cor. i. 5. He does not say, "Give me a further revelation," but, Give me a further understanding.

19. KOPH

David's good prayers. He cried with his whole heart; we are likely to speed when we thus strive and wrestle in prayer. He cried unto God. Whither should the child go but to his father when anything ails him? The great thing he prayed for was salvation: Save me. We need desire no more than God's salvation (l. 23) and the things that accompany it, Heb. vi. 9.

Verses 147–148

Hope in God's word encouraged him to continue instant in prayer, though the answer did not come immediately: "I hoped in thy word, which I knew would not fail me." The more intimately we converse with the word of God, and the more we dwell upon it in our thoughts, the better able we shall be to speak to God. Reading the word will not serve, but we must meditate in it. David began the day with God. The first thing he did in the morning, before he admitted any business, was to pray. If our first thoughts in the morning be of God they will help to keep us in his fear all the day long. Even in the night-watches, when he awaked from his first sleep, he would rather meditate and pray than turn himself and go to sleep again.

Verse 149

David applies to God for grace and comfort with much solemnity. "Lord, quicken me; stir me up to that which is good, and make me vigorous, and lively, and cheerful in it. Let habits of grace be drawn out into act."

Verses 150–151

David was in danger from his enemies. They followed him closely and he was just ready to fall into their hands: They draw nigh. They were at his heels. God sometimes suffers persecutors to prevail very far against his people, so that, as David said (1 Sam. xx. 3), There is but a step between them and death. It is the happiness of the saints that, when trouble is near, God is near, and no trouble can separate between them and him. He is never far to seek, but he is within our call, Deut. iv. 7.

Verse 152

This confirms the foregoing verse, All thy commandments are truth; he means the covenant, the word which God has commanded to a thousand generations. The promises are founded for ever, so that when heaven and earth shall have passed away every iota and tittle of the promise shall stand firm, 2 Cor. i. 20. David knew of old, from the days of his youth, ever since he began to look towards God, that the word of God is what one may venture one's all upon.

20. RESH

David has an eye to God's pity, and prays, "Consider my affliction." He has an eye to God's power and prays, "Deliver me;" and again, "Deliver me." He has an eye to God's righteousness, and prays, "Plead my cause; and take me for thy client." He has an eye to God's grace, and prays, "Quicken me. Lord, Revive and comfort me, till the deliverance is wrought!"

Verse 155

How can those expect to seek God's favour with success, when they are in adversity, who never sought his statutes when they were in prosperity? But eternal salvation is certainly far from them. They thrust it from them by thrusting the Saviour from them; it is so far from them that they cannot reach it, and the longer they persist in sin the further it is.

Verse 156

David had spoken of the misery of the wicked (v. 155); but God is good notwithstanding; there were tender mercies sufficient in God to have saved them, if they had not despised the riches of those mercies.

Verse 157
David, being a public person, had many enemies, but withal he had many friends, who loved him and wished him well; let him set the one over-against the other. In this David was a type both of Christ and his church. The enemies, the persecutors, of both, are many. A man who is steady in the way of his duty, though he may have many enemies, needs fear none.

Verse 158
David beheld the transgressors, and it grieved him to see them dishonour God, serve Satan, debauch the world, and ruin their own souls.

Verse 159
David does not say, "Consider how I fulfil thy precepts"; he was conscious to himself that in many things he came short; but, "Consider how I love them." Our obedience is pleasing to God, and pleasant to ourselves, only when it comes from a principle of love.

Verse 160
David here comforts himself with the faithfulness of God's word. It is true from the beginning. Ever since God began to reveal himself to the children of men all he said was true and to be trusted. The church, from its beginning, was built upon this rock. It has not gained its validity by lapse of time. But the beginning of God's word was true (so some read it); his government was laid on a sure foundation. It will be found faithful to the end.

21. SCHIN

It has been the common lot of the best men to be persecuted; and the case is the worse if princes be the persecutors, for they have not only the sword in their hand, but they have the law on their side, and can do it with reputation and a colour of justice. It is sad that the power which magistrates have from God, and should use for him, should ever be employed against him. David never gave them provocation. "They would make me stand in awe of them and their word, and do as they bid me; but my heart stands in awe of thy word, and I am resolved to please God, and keep in with him, whoever is displeased and falls out with me."

Verse 162
He had just now said that his heart stood in awe of his word, and yet here he declares that he rejoiced in it. The more reverence we have for the word of God the more joy we shall find in it.

Verse 163
Love and hatred are the leading affections of the soul; if those be fixed aright, the rest move accordingly. Here we have them fixed aright in David. 1. He had a rooted antipathy to sin; he could not endure to think of it: I hate and abhor lying, which may be taken for all sin. Hypocrisy is lying; false doctrine is lying; breach of faith is lying. Lying, in commerce or conversation, is a sin which every good man hates. 2. He had a rooted affection to the word of God: Thy law do I love. And the reason why he loved the law of God was because of the truth of it.

Verse 164
Many think that once a week will serve, or once or twice a day, but David would praise God seven times a day at least. We must praise God at every meal, in everything give thanks. We must praise God for his precepts, for his promises, even for our afflictions, if through grace we get good by them.

Verse 165
Good men, who are governed by a principle of love to the word of God are easy, and have a holy serenity; none enjoy themselves more than they do. They may be in great troubles without and yet enjoy great peace within, sat lucis intus—abundance of internal light. They will make the best of that which is, and not quarrel with anything that God does.

Verse 166
Here is the whole duty of man; to keep our eye upon God's favour as our end: "Lord, I have hoped for thy salvation." To keep our eye upon God's word as our rule: I have done thy commandments. God has joined these two together, and let no man put them asunder. We cannot, upon good grounds, hope for God's salvation, unless we set ourselves to do his commandments, Rev. xxii. 14.

Verses 167–168
Our love to the word of God must be a superlative love, and it must be a victorious love, such as will subdue and mortify our lusts. Bodily exercise profits little in religion; we must make heart-work of it or we make nothing of it.

22. TAU

We must come to God as beggars come to our doors for an alms. He is concerned that his prayer might come before God, might come near before him, that is, that he might have grace and strength by faith and fervency to lift up his prayers, that no guilt might interpose to shut out his prayers and to separate between him and God, and that God would graciously receive his prayers and take notice of them.

Verse 171
A great favour which David expects from God, that he will teach him his statutes. This he had often prayed for in this psalm, and now that he is drawing towards the close of the psalm he speaks of it as taken for granted. My lips shall utter praise when thou hast taught me. Then he shall have cause to praise God. Then he shall know how to praise God, and have a heart to do it.

Verse 172
The more we see of God's commandments the more industrious we should be to bring others acquainted with them. We should always make the word of God the governor of our discourse, so as never to transgress it by sinful speaking or sinful silence; and we should often make it the subject-matter of our discourse, that it may feed many and minister grace to the hearers.

Verses 173–174
David prays that divine grace would work for him: Let thy hand help me. He looks up to God in hopes that the hand that had made him would help him; for, if the Lord do not help us, whence can any creature help us? Three things he pleads:—(1) That he had made religion his serious and deliberate choice: "I have chosen thy precepts." (2) That his heart was upon heaven: "I have longed for thy salvation." (3) That he took pleasure in doing his duty: "Thy law is my delight."

Verse 175
"Let me live that, in doing this, I may praise God here in this world of conflict and opposition." Let my soul live, that is, let me be sanctified and comforted, for sanctification and comfort are the life of the soul, and then it shall praise thee.

As unconverted sinners are like lost sheep (Luke xv. 4), so weak unsteady saints are like lost sheep, Matt. xviii. 12, 13. We are apt to wander like the sheep, and very unapt, when we have gone astray, to find the way again. "Lord, seek me, as I used to seek my sheep when they went astray"; for David had been himself a tender shepherd. "Lord, own me for one of thine; for, though I am a stray sheep, I have thy mark." Thus he concludes the psalm with a penitent sense of his own sin and a believing dependence on God's grace.

PSALM CXX

This psalm is the first of those fifteen which are here put together under the title of "songs of degrees". Some think they were sung on the fifteen steps or stairs, by which they went up from the outward court of the temple to the inner, others at so many stages of the people's journey, when they returned out of captivity. This psalm is supposed to have been penned by David upon occasion of Doeg's accusing him and the priests to Saul, because it is like lii., which was penned on that occasion, and because the psalmist complains of his being driven out of the congregation of the Lord and his being forced among barbarous people. I. He prays to God to deliver him from the mischief designed him by false and malicious tongues, ver. 1, 2. II. He threatens the judgments of God against such, ver. 3, 4. III. He complains of his wicked neighbours that were quarrelsome and vexatious, ver. 5–7.

A song of degrees.

David brought into distress by lying lips and a deceitful tongue. There were those that sought his ruin, and had almost effected it. They flattered him that they might without suspicion carry on their designs against him. They smiled in his face and kissed him, even when they were aiming to smite him under the fifth rib. David was herein a type of Christ, who was distressed by lying lips and deceitful tongues. Having no fence against false tongues, he appealed to him who has all men's hearts in his hand, and can, when he pleases, bridle their tongues. His prayer was, "Deliver my soul, O Lord! from lying lips." He obtained a gracious answer to this prayer. Let liars consider what shall be given to them: God shall shoot at them with an arrow; suddenly shall they be wounded. They set God at a distance from them, but from afar his arrows can reach them. They will strike deep into the hardest heart. His wrath is compared to burning coals of juniper, which do not flame or crackle, like thorns under a pot, but have a vehement heat, and keep fire very long even when they seem to be gone out.

Verses 5–7

The psalmist here complains of the bad neighbourhood into which he was driven; and some apply the two foregoing verses to this: "What shall the deceitful tongue do to those that lie open to it? What shall a man get by living among such malicious deceitful men? Nothing but sharp arrows and coals of juniper." Woe is me, says David, that I sojourn in Mesech and Kedar. Not that David dwelt in the country of Mesech or Kedar; but he dwelt among rude and barbarous people, like the inhabitants of Mesech and Kedar. While he was in banishment, he looked upon himself as a sojourner, never at home. A good man cannot think himself at home while he is banished from God's ordinances. It is a great grief to all that love God to be without the means of grace and of communion with God. He dwelt in the tents of Kedar, where the shepherds were probably in an ill name for being litigious, like the herdsmen of Abraham and Lot. Those that David dwelt with were such as not only hated him, but hated peace. Perhaps Saul's court was the Mesech and Kedar in which David dwelt, and Saul was the man he meant that hated peace. I peace (so it is in the original); "I love peace and pursue peace; I am for peace, and have made it to appear that I am so."

PSALM CXXI

Some call this the soldier's psalm, and think it was penned in the camp, when David was hazarding his life in the high places of the field. Others call it the traveller's psalm (for there is nothing in it of military dangers) and think David penned it for a good man's convoy and companion in a journey or voyage. But wherever we are, at home or abroad, we are exposed to danger more than we are aware of: and this psalm directs and encourages us to repose ourselves and our confidence in God.

A song of degrees.

Verses 1–8

This psalm teaches us to stay ourselves upon God as a God all-sufficient for us. "Shall I lift up my eyes to the hills?"—so some read it. "Does my help come thence? Shall I depend upon the powers of the earth, upon the strength of princes, who hold up their heads towards heaven? No; I never expect help to come from them; my confidence is in God only." We must lift up our eyes above the hills (so some read it); we must look beyond instruments to God, who makes them that to us which they are. "My help comes from the Lord; in his own way and time." We must encourage our confidence in God with this that he made heaven and earth, and he who did that can do anything. God himself has undertaken to be our protector: The Lord is thy keeper, v. 5. The same that is the protector of the church in general is engaged for the preservation of every particular believer, the same wisdom, the same power, the same promises. He that keepeth Israel (v. 4) is thy keeper, v. 5. The shepherd of the flock is the shepherd of every sheep, and will take care that not one, even of the little ones, shall perish. He is a wakeful watchful keeper: "He that keepeth Israel, that keepeth thee, O Israelite! shall neither slumber nor sleep." He not only protects those whom he is the keeper of, but he refreshes them: He is their shade. He is always near to his people for their protection and refreshment, and never at a distance; he is their keeper and shade on their right hand; so that he is never far to seek. The right hand is the working hand; let them but turn themselves dexterously to their duty, and they shall find God ready to them, to assist them and give them success, Ps. xvi. 8. The sun shall not smite thee with his heat by day nor the moon with her cold and moisture by night. He will keep them night and day (Isa. xxvii. 3). It may be understood figuratively: "Thou shalt not be hurt either by the open assaults of thy enemies, which are as visible as the scorching beams of the sun, or by their secret treacherous attempts, which are like the insensible insinuations of the cold by night." "The Lord shall preserve thee from all evil, the evil of sin and the evil of trouble. Even that which kills shall not hurt." It is the spiritual life, especially, that God will take under his protection: He shall preserve thy soul. He will keep us in all our ways: "He shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in. Thou shalt be under his protection in all thy journeys and voyages, outward-bound or homeward-bound. He will keep thee in life and death, thy going out and going on while thou livest and thy coming in when thou diest, going out to thy labour in the morning of thy days and coming home to thy rest when the evening of old age calls thee in," civ. 23. He will continue his care over us from this time forth and even for evermore.

PSALM CXXII

This psalm seems to have been penned by David for the use of the people of Israel, when they came up to Jerusalem to worship at the three solemn feasts. It was in David's time that Jerusalem was first chosen to be the city where God would record his name. I. The joy with which they were to go up to Jerusalem, ver. 1, 2. II. The great esteem they were to have of Jerusalem, ver. 3–5. III. The great concern they were to have for Jerusalem, and the prayers they were to put up for its welfare, ver. 6–9.

A song of degrees of David.

Verses 1–5

We ought to worship God in our own houses, but that is not enough; we must go into the house of the Lord, to pay our homage to him there, and not forsake the assembling of ourselves together. Those that rejoice in God will rejoice in calls and opportunities to wait upon him. We should desire our Christian friends, when they have any good work in hand, to call for us and take us along with them. Those that came out of the country, when they found the journey tedious, comforted themselves with this, that they should be in Jerusalem shortly, and that would make amends for all the fatigues of their journey. It is the beautiful city, not only for situation, but for building. It is built uniform, compact together, the houses strengthening and supporting one another. It was a type of the gospel-church, which is compact together in holy love and Christian communion, so that it is all as one city. It is the holy city, v. 4, the place where all Israel meet one another: Thither the tribes go up, from all parts of the country, to their general rendezvous; and they come together to hear what God has to say to them. It is the royal city (v. 5): There are set thrones of judgment. Therefore the people had reason to be in love with Jerusalem, because justice was administered there by a man after God's own heart.

Verses 6–9

David calls upon others to wish well to Jerusalem, v. 6, 7. Pray for the peace of Jerusalem, for the welfare of it, for all good to it, particularly for the uniting of the inhabitants among themselves. The peace and welfare of the gospel church, particularly in our land, is to be earnestly desired and prayed for by every one of us. Words are put into our mouths (v. 7): Peace be within thy walls, for all the inhabitants in general, all within the walls, from the least to the greatest. Peace be in thy fortifications; let them never be attacked, or, if they be, let them never be taken, but be an effectual security to the city. Let prosperity be in the palaces of the great men that sit at the helm and have the direction of public affairs. He resolved that whatever others do he will say, Peace be within thee. He did not say, "Let others pray for the public peace, the priests and the prophets, whose business it is, and the people, that have nothing else to do, and I will fight for it and rule for it." No; " I will pray for it too." It is for my brethren and companions' sakes, that is, for the sake of all true-hearted Israelites, whom I look upon as my brethren (so he calls them, 1 Chron. xxviii. 2) and who have often been my companions in the worship of God, which has knit my heart to them. Our concern for the public welfare is right when it is the effect of a sincere love to God's institutions and his faithful worshippers.

PSALM CXXIII

This psalm was penned at a time when the church of God was brought low; some think it was when the Jews were captives in Babylon. The psalmist begins as if he spoke for himself only (ver. 1), but presently speaks in the name of the church. I. Their expectation of mercy from God, ver. 1, 2. II. Their plea for mercy with God, ver. 3, 4.

A song of degrees.

Verses 1–4

The title here given to God: O thou that dwellest in the heavens. Our Lord Jesus has taught us, in prayer, to have an eye to God as our Father in heaven. Heaven is a place of prospect and a place of power; he that dwells there beholds thence all the calamities of his people and thence can send to save them. In every prayer we lift up our soul, the eye of our soul, to God, especially in trouble, which was the case here. Our eyes must wait upon God as the Lord, and our God, until that he have mercy upon us. This is illustrated (v. 2) by a similitude: Our eyes are to God as the eyes of a servant, and handmaid, to the hand of their master and mistress. The eyes of a servant are to his master's directing hand, expecting that he will appoint him his work. Servants look to their master, or their mistress, for their portion of meat in due season, Prov. xxxi. 15. And to God must we look for daily bread, for grace sufficient. If the servant meet with opposition in his work, if he be questioned for what he does, who should bear him out and right him, but his master that set him on work? The people of God, when they are persecuted, may appeal to their Master, We are thine; save us. The people of God were now under his rebukes; and whither should they turn but to him that smote them? Isa. ix. 13. They submit themselves to and humble themselves under God's mighty hand. The servant expects his wages, his well-done, from his master. Hypocrites have their eye to the world's hand; thence they have their reward (Matt. vi. 2); but true Christians have their eye to God as their rewarder. The humble address which God's people present to him in their calamitous condition (v. 3, 4): Have mercy upon us, O Lord! have mercy upon us. They set forth their grievances: We are exceedingly filled with contempt. Reproach is the wound. Some translate the words which we render, those that are at ease, and the proud, so as to signify the persons that are scorned and contemned. "Our soul is troubled to see how those that are at peace, and the excellent ones, are scorned and despised." Taking the words as we read them, they were the epicures who lived at ease, carnal sensual people, Job xii. 5. They trampled on God's people, thinking they magnified themselves by vilifying them.

PSALM CXXIV

David penned this psalm (we suppose) upon occasion of some great deliverance which God wrought for him and his people. Whatever it was he seems to have been himself much affected, and very desirous to affect others, with the goodness of God, in making a way for them to escape. I. He here magnifies the greatness of the danger they were in, ver. 1–5. II. He gives God the glory of their escape, ver. 6, 7, compared with ver. 1, 2. III. He takes encouragement thence to trust in God, ver. 8.

A song of degrees of David.

Verses 1–5

The people of God were reduced to the very brink of ruin. The more desperate the disease appears to have been the more does the skill of the Physician appear in the cure. Men rose up against us, creatures of our own kind, and yet bent upon our ruin. No less would serve than the destruction of those they had conceived a displeasure against. "God was on our side; he took our part, espoused our cause, and appeared for us. That God was Jehovah; there the emphasis lies. If it had not been Jehovah himself, a God of infinite power and perfection, that had undertaken our deliverance, our enemies would have overpowered us." Happy the people, therefore, whose God is all-sufficient.

Verses 6–8

The psalmist further magnifies the great deliverance God had lately wrought for them. They were delivered like a lamb out of the very jaws of a beast of prey. They were rescued like a bird, a little bird (the word signifies a sparrow), out of the snare of the fowler. God's people are taken in the snare, and are as unable to help themselves out as any weak and silly bird is; and then God breaks the snare, and turns the counsel of the enemies into foolishness. Our help is in the name of the Lord. David had directed us (cxxi. 2) to depend upon God for help as to our personal concerns—here as to the concerns of the public. It is a comfort that Israel's God is the same that made the world, and therefore will have a church in the world, and can secure that church in times of the greatest danger and distress.

PSALM CXXV

This short psalm may be summed up in those words of the prophet (Isa. iii. 10, 11), "Say you to the righteous, It shall be well with him. Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with him." I. It is certainly well with the people of God; for, 1. They have the promises of a good God that they shall be fixed (ver. 1), and safe (ver. 2), and not always under the hatches, ver. 3. 2. They have the prayers of a good man, which shall be heard for them, ver. 4. II. It is certainly ill with the wicked, and particularly with the apostates, ver. 5.

A song of degrees.

Three very precious promises made to the people of God.

I. The character of God's people, to whom these promises belong. 1. Who are righteous (v. 3), righteous before God, righteous to God, and righteous to all men. 2. Who trust in the Lord, who depend upon his care and devote themselves to his honour. The closer our expectations are confined to God the higher our expectations may be raised from him.

II. The promises themselves.

1. That their hearts shall be established by faith: those minds shall be truly stayed that are stayed on God. Their faith shall be their fixation, Isa. vii. 9. They shall be as Mount Zion, which is firm as it is a mountain supported by providence, much more as a holy mountain supported by promise.

2. That, committing themselves to God, they shall be safe, under his protection, from all the insults of their enemies, as Jerusalem had a natural fastness and fortification in the mountains that were round about it, v. 2.

3. That their troubles shall last no longer than their strength will serve to bear them up under them, v. 3. It is promised that, though it may come upon their lot, it shall not rest there; it shall not continue so long as the enemies design, and as the people of God fear, but God will cut the work short in righteousness, so short that even with the temptation he will make a way for them to escape.

Verses 4–5

The prayer the psalmist puts up for the happiness of those that are sincere and constant (v. 4): Do good, O Lord! unto those that are good. He does not say, Do good, O Lord! to those that are perfect, that are sinless and spotless, but to those that are sincere and honest. God's promises should quicken our prayers. The prospect he has of the ruin of hypocrites and deserters; he does not pray for it but he predicts it. The last words, Peace upon Israel, may be taken as a prayer: "God preserve his Israel in peace, when his judgments are abroad reckoning with evil-doers." We read them as a promise: Peace shall be upon Israel.

PSALM CXXVI

It was with reference to some great and surprising deliverance of the people of God out of bondage and distress that this psalm was penned, most likely their return out of Babylon in Ezra's time. Though Babylon be not mentioned here (as it is, Ps. cxxxvii.) yet their captivity was most remarkable both in itself and as their return was typical of our redemption by Christ. Probably this psalm was penned by Ezra, or some of the prophets that came up with the first. I. Those that had returned out of captivity are here called upon to be thankful, ver. 1–3. II. Those that were yet remaining in captivity are here prayed for (ver. 4) and encouraged, ver. 5, 6.

A song of degrees.

While the people of Israel were captives in Babylon their harps were hung upon the willow-trees, but now that their captivity is turned they resume their harps; Providence pipes to them, and they dance. The long want of mercies greatly sweetens their return. Cyrus, for reasons of state, proclaimed liberty to God's captives, and yet it was the Lord's doing, according to his word many years before. God sent them into captivity, not as dross is put into the fire to be consumed, but as gold to be refined. It came so suddenly that at first they were in confusion, not knowing what to make of it, nor what it was tending to: "We thought ourselves like men that dream; we thought it too good news to be true." The surprise of it put them into such an ecstasy and transport of joy that they could scarcely contain themselves within the bounds of decency in the expressions of it: Our mouth was filled with laughter and our tongue with singing. The notice which their neighbours took: They said among the heathen, Jehovah, the God of Israel, has done great things for that people, such as our gods cannot do for us. The heathen were but spectators, and spoke of it only as matter of news; they had no part nor lot in the matter; but the people of God spoke of it as sharers in it. Thus it is comfortable speaking of the redemption Christ has wrought out as wrought out for us. Who loved me, and gave himself for me.

Verses 4–6

These verses look forward to the mercies that were yet wanted. Those that had come out of captivity were still in distress, even in their own land (Neh. i. 3) and many yet remained in Babylon. "Turn again our captivity. Let those that have returned to their own land be eased of the burdens which they are yet groaning under. Let those that remain in Babylon have their hearts stirred up, as ours were, to take the benefit of the liberty granted." The beginnings of mercy are encouragements to us to pray for the completing of it. All the saints may comfort themselves with this confidence, that their tears will certainly end in a harvest of joy at last, v. 5, 6. Weeping must not hinder sowing; when we suffer ill we must be doing well. Yea, as the ground is by the rain prepared for the seed. There are tears which are themselves the seed that we must sow, tears of sorrow for sin, our own and others, tears of sympathy with the afflicted church, and tears of tenderness in prayer and under the word. Job, and Joseph, and David, and many others, had harvests of joy after sorrow. Those that sow in the tears of godly sorrow shall reap in the joy of a sealed pardon and a settled peace.

PSALM CXXVII

This is a family-psalm, as divers before were state-poems and church-poems. It is entitled (as we read it) "for Solomon", dedicated to him by his father. He having a house to build, a city to keep, and seed to raise up to his father, David directs him to look up to God, and to depend upon his providence, without which all his wisdom, care, and industry, would not serve. Some take it to have been penned by Solomon himself, and they compare it with the Ecclesiastes, the scope of both being the same, to show the vanity of worldly care and how necessary it is that we keep in favour with God. On him we must depend, I. For wealth, ver. 1, 2. II. For heirs to leave it to, ver. 3–5.

A song of degrees for Solomon.

Solomon would be apt to lean to his own understanding and forecast, and therefore his father teaches him to look higher, and to take God along with him in his undertakings. We must depend upon God's blessing and not our own contrivance, 1. For the raising of a family: Except the Lord build the house, by his providence and blessing, those labour in vain, though ever so ingenious, that build it. We may understand it of the material house: except the Lord bless the building it is to no purpose for men to build. If the model and design be laid in pride and vanity, or if the foundations be laid in oppression and injustice (Hab. ii. 11, 12), God certainly does not build there; nay, if God be not acknowledged, we have no reason to expect his blessing, and without his blessing all is nothing. Or it is to be understood of the making of a family considerable that was mean: men labour to do this by advantageous matches, offices, employments, purchases; but all in vain, unless God build up the family. If the guards of the city cannot secure it without God, much less can the good man of the house save his house from being broken up. 2. For the enriching of a family; this is a work of time and thought, but cannot be effected without the favour of Providence. "It is vain for you to rise up early and sit up late, and so to deny yourselves your bodily refreshments, in the eager pursuit of the wealth of the world." All this is to get money, and all in vain except God prosper them, for riches are not always to men of understanding, Eccles. ix. 11. Those that love God, and are beloved of him, have their minds easy and live very comfortably without this ado. God gives us sleep as he gives it to his beloved when with it he gives us grace to lie down in his fear (our souls returning to him and reposing in him as our rest), and when we awake to be still with him and to use the refreshment we have by sleep in his service. He gives his beloved sleep, that is, quietness and contentment of mind, a comfortable enjoyment of what is present and a comfortable expectation of what is to come. Children are God's gift, v. 3, and they are to us what he makes them, comforts or crosses. Children are a heritage, and a reward, and are so to be accounted, blessings and not burdens; for he that sends mouths will send meat if we trust in him. Children are a heritage for the Lord, as well as from him. The family that has a large stock of children is like a quiver full of arrows, of different sizes we may suppose, but all of use one time or other; children of different capacities and inclinations.

PSALM CXXVIII

This, as the former, is a psalm for families. In that we were taught that the prosperity of our families depends upon the blessing of God; in this we are taught that the only way to obtain that blessing which will make our families comfortable is to live in the fear of God and in obedience to him. Those that do so, in general, shall be blessed, ver. 1, 2, 4. In particular, I. They shall be prosperous and successful in their employments, ver. 2. II. Their relations shall be agreeable, ver. 3. III. They shall live to see their families brought up, ver. 6. IV. They shall have the satisfaction of seeing the church of God in a flourishing condition, ver. 5, 6.

A song of degrees.

Godliness has the promise of the life that now is and of that which is to come. In every nation he that fears God and works righteousness is accepted of him, and therefore is blessed whether he be high or low, rich or poor, in the world; if religion rule him, it will protect and enrich him. "Happy shalt thou be; if thou fear God and walk in his ways. It shall be well with thee; whatever befalls thee, good shall be brought out of it; it shall be well with thee while thou livest, better when thou diest, and best of all to eternity." Thou shalt eat the labour of thy hands. Here is a double promise, (1) That they shall have something to do (for an idle life is a miserable uncomfortable life) and shall have capacity to do it, and shall not be forced to be beholden to others for necessary food, and to live upon the labours of other people. (2) That they shall succeed in their employments, and they and theirs shall enjoy what they get. As the sleep, so the food, of a labouring man is sweet. They shall have comfort in their family-relations. As a wife and children are very much a man's care, so, if by the grace of God they are such as they should be, they are very much a man's delight. The wife shall be as a vine by the sides of the house, not only as a spreading vine which serves for an ornament, but as a fruitful vine, and with the fruit whereof both God and man are honoured, Judges ix. 13. The vine is a weak and tender plant, and needs to be supported and cherished, but it is a very valuable plant. The wife's place is the husband's house; there her business lies, and that is her castle. Where is Sarah thy wife? Behold, in the tent; where should she be else? Her place is by the sides of the house, not under-foot to be trampled on, nor yet upon the house-top to domineer. The children shall be as olive plants, likely in time to be olive-trees. It is pleasant to parents who have a table spread, though but with ordinary fare, to see their children round about it, and not scattered, or the parents forced from them. Parents love to have their children at table, to keep up the pleasantness of the table-talk, to have them in health, craving food and not physic, to have them like olive-plants, straight and green, sucking in the sap of their good education. "Thy family shall be built up and continued, and thou shalt have the pleasure of seeing it." Children's children, if they be good children, are the crown of old men (Prov. xvii. 6), who are apt to be fond of their grandchildren. "Thou shalt see the good of Jerusalem as long as thou shalt live, though thou shouldest live long, and shalt not have thy private comforts allayed and embittered by public troubles."

PSALM CXXIX

This psalm relates to the public concerns of God's Israel. It was penned, probably when they were in captivity in Babylon, or about the time of their return. I. They look back with thankfulness for the former deliverances, ver. 1–4. II. They look forward with a believing prayer for the destruction of all the enemies of Zion, ver. 5–8.

A song of degrees.

Verses 1–4

The church of God here speaks, as one single person, now old and grey-headed, but calling to remembrance the former days. 1. The church has been often greatly distressed by its enemies on earth. God's people have always had many enemies, and the state of the church, from its infancy, has frequently been an afflicted state. The ploughers ploughed upon my back, v. 3. The enemies of God's people have all along used them very barbarously. They tore them, as the husbandman tears the ground with his ploughshare. When God permitted them to plough thus he intended it for his people's good, that, their fallow ground being thus broken up, he might sow the seeds of his grace upon them, and reap a harvest of good fruit from them: howbeit, the enemies meant not so; they made long their furrows, never knew when to have done, aiming at the destruction of the church. Many by the furrows they made on the backs of God's people understand the stripes they gave them. The cutters cut upon my back, so they read it. The saints have often had trials of cruel scourgings, and so it was fulfilled in Christ, who gave his back to the smiters, Isa. l. 6. 2. The church has been always graciously delivered by her friend in heaven. The enemies' projects have been defeated. Christ has built his church upon a rock, and the gates of hell have not prevailed against it, nor ever shall. God has cut asunder the cords of the wicked, has cut their gears, their traces, and so spoiled their ploughing, has cut their scourges, and so spoiled their lashing, has cut the bands of captivity in which they held God's people.

Verses 5–8

The psalmist concludes his psalm as Deborah did her song, So let all thy enemies perish, O Lord! Judges v. 31. The confusion predicted is illustrated by a similitude; while God's people shall flourish as the loaded palm-tree, or the green and fruitful olive, their enemies shall wither as the grass upon the house-top. As they are enemies to Zion they are so certainly marked for ruin that they may be looked upon as the grass on the house-tops, which is little, and short, and sour, and good for nothing. It withers before it grows up to any maturity, having no root; and the higher its place is, which perhaps is its pride, the more it is exposed to the scorching heat of the sun, and consequently the sooner does it wither. Mowing the grass on the house-top would be a jest, and therefore those that have a reverence for the name of God will not prostitute to it the usual forms of salutation, which savoured of devotion.

PSALM CXXX

This psalm is wholly taken up with the affairs of the soul. It is reckoned one of the seven penitential psalms, which have sometimes been made use of by penitents, upon their admission into the church; and, in singing it, we are all concerned to apply it to ourselves. The psalmist here expresses, I. His desire towards God, ver. 1, 2. II. His repentance before God, ver. 3, 4. III. His attendance upon God, ver. 5, 6. IV. His expectation from God, ver. 7, 8.

A song of degrees.

Verses 1–4

The best men may sometimes be in the depths, in great trouble and affliction. But, in the greatest depths, it is our privilege that we may cry unto God and be heard. To cry unto God is the likeliest way both to prevent our sinking lower and to recover us out of the horrible pit and miry clay, xl. 1, 2. If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, O Lord! who shall stand? His calling God Lord twice, in so few words, Jah and Adonai, is very emphatic, and intimates a very awful sense of God's glorious majesty and a dread of his wrath. We cannot justify ourselves before God, or plead Not guilty. If God deal with us in strict justice, we are undone. It is of his mercy that we are not consumed by his wrath. It is our unspeakable comfort, in all our approaches to God, that there is forgiveness with him, for that is what we need. He has promised to forgive the sins of those that do repent. There is a propitiation with thee, so some read it. Jesus Christ is the great propitiation, and through him we hope to obtain forgiveness. But this encourages us to come into his service that we shall not be turned off for every misdemeanour; no, nor for any, if we truly repent.

Verses 5–8

"I wait for the Lord; from him I expect relief and comfort, believing it will come, longing till it does come, but patiently bearing the delay of it, and resolving to look for it from no other hand. My soul doth wait. In his word do I hope." We must hope for that only which he has promised in his word, and not for the creatures of our own fancy and imagination. "Well-assured that the morning will come; so am I that God will return in mercy to me, for God's covenant is more firm than the ordinances of day and night, for they shall come to an end, but that is everlasting." Those that watch with sick people, and travellers that are abroad upon their journey, long before day wish to see the dawning of the day; but more earnestly does this good man long for the tokens of God's favour and the visits of his grace. Mercy is with him in all his works, in all his counsels. Jesus Christ saves his people from their sins (Matt. i. 21), redeems them from all iniquity (Tit. ii. 14), and turns away ungodliness from Jacob, Rom. xi. 26. Redemption from sin includes redemption from all other evils, and therefore is a plenteous redemption.

PSALM CXXXI

This psalm is David's profession of humility, with thankfulness to God for his grace. It is probable enough that David made this protestation in answer to Saul who represented David as an ambitious aspiring man, who, under pretence of a divine appointment, sought the kingdom, in the pride of his heart. But he appeals to God, that, on the contrary, I. He aimed at nothing high nor great, ver. 1. II. He was very easy in every condition which God allotted him (ver. 2); and therefore, III. He encourages all good people to trust in God as he did, ver. 3.

A song of degrees of David.

This was David's rejoicing, that his heart could witness for him that he had walked humbly with his God. He aimed not at a high condition, but, if God had so ordered, could have been well content to spend all his days in the sheepfolds. His own brother, in a passion, charged him with pride (1 Sam. xvii. 28), but the charge was groundless and unjust. He had neither a scornful nor an aspiring look: "My eyes are not lofty, either to look with envy upon those that are above me or to look with disdain upon those that are below me." As he had not proudly aimed at the kingdom, so, since God had appointed him to it, he had been as humble as a little child. Our Saviour has taught us humility by this comparison (Matt. xviii. 3); we must become as little children. Our hearts are naturally as desirous of worldly things as the babe of the breast. But, by the grace of God, a soul that is sanctified, is weaned from those things. Thus does a gracious soul quiet itself under the loss of that which it loved, and lives comfortably, upon God and the covenant-grace.

PSALM CXXXII

It is probable that this psalm was penned by Solomon, to be sung at the dedication of the temple which he built according to the charge his father gave him, 1 Chron. xxviii. 2, &c. Having fulfilled his trust, he begs of God to own what he had done. I. He had built this house for the honour and service of God; and when he brings the ark into it, the token of God's presence, he desires that God himself would come and take possession of it, ver. 8–10. With these words Solomon concluded his prayer, 2 Chron. vi. 41, 42. II. 1. He pleads David's piety towards God, ver. 1–7. 2. He pleads God's promise to David, ver. 11–18.

A song of degrees.

Solomon's address to God for his favour to him, and his acceptance of his building a house to God's name. What he had done was in pursuance of the pious vow which his father David had made to build a house for God. Solomon pleads not any merit of his own: "I am not worthy, for whom thou shouldst do this; but, Lord, remember David, with whom thou madest the covenant." He especially pleads the solemn vow that David had made as soon as ever he was settled in his government, and before he was well settled in a house of his own, that he would build a house for God. He had observed in the law frequent mention of the place that God would choose to put his name there, to which all the tribes should resort. When he came to the crown there was no such place; Shiloh was deserted, and no other place was pitched upon, for want of which the feasts of the Lord were not kept with due solemnity. "Well," says David, "I will find out such a place for the general rendezvous of all the tribes, a place of habitation for the Mighty One of Jacob, a place for the ark, where there shall be room both for the priests and people to attend upon it." The thing had been long talked of, and nothing done, till at last David when he went out one morning about public business, made a vow that before night he would determine the place either where the tent should be pitched for the reception of the ark, at the beginning of his reign, or rather where Solomon should build the temple, which was not fixed till the latter end of his reign. Then David said, This is the house of the Lord. It is good in the morning to cut out work for the day, binding ourselves that we will do it before we sleep, only with submission to Providence. The people of Israel, v. 6, 7, were inquisitive after the ark; for they lamented its obscurity, 1 Sam. vii. 2. They heard of it at Ephratah (that is, at Shiloh, in the tribe of Ephraim); there they were told it had been, but it was gone. They found it, at last, in the fields of the wood, that is, in Kirjath-jearim, which signifies the city of woods. Thence all Israel fetched it, with great solemnity, in the beginning of David's reign (1 Chron. xiii. 6), so that in building this house for the ark Solomon had gratified all Israel. They were resolved to attend it: "Let us but have a convenient place, and we will go into his tabernacle, to pay our homage there; we will worship at his footstool as subjects and suppliants, which we neglected to do, for want of such a place, in the days of Saul," 1 Chron. xiii. 3. He prays, v. 8–10. God would vouchsafe, not only to take possession of, but to take up his residence in, this temple which he had built. Let thy priests be clothed with righteousness. "They are thy priests, and will therefore discredit their relation to thee if they be not clothed with righteousness." Let the people of God have the comfort of the due administration of holy ordinances among them. "Turn not away the face of thy anointed, that is, deny me not the things I have asked of thee, send me not away ashamed."

Verses 11–18

These promises relate to the establishment both in church and state, both to the throne of the house of David and to the testimony of Israel fixed on Mount Zion. The promises concerning Zion's hill are as applicable to the gospel-church as these concerning David's seed are to Christ, and therefore both pleadable by us and very comfortable to us.

I. The choice God made of David's house and Zion hill. Both were of divine appointment.

1. God chose David's family for the royal family and confirmed his choice by an oath, v. 11, 12. A long succession of kings should descend from his loins: Of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne, which was fulfilled in Solomon; David himself lived to see it with great satisfaction, 1 Kings i. 48. The crown was also entailed conditionally upon his heirs for ever: If thy children, in following ages, will keep my covenant and my testimony that I shall teach them. The issue of this was that they did not keep God's covenant, and so the entail was at length cut off, and the sceptre departed from Judah by degrees. An everlasting successor, a king, should descend from his loins of the increase of whose government and peace there shall be no end. St. Peter applies this to Christ, nay, he tells us that David himself so understood it (Acts ii. 30).

2. God chose Zion hill for the holy hill, and confirmed his choice by the delight he took in it, v. 13, 14. God said, Here will I dwell, and therefore David said, Here will I dwell, for here he adhered to his principle, It is good for me to be near to God. Zion must be here looked upon as a type of the gospel-church, which is called Mount Zion (Heb. xii. 22), and in it what is here said of Zion has its full accomplishment. Zion was long since ploughed as a field, but the church of Christ is the house of the living God (1 Tim. iii. 15), and it is his rest for ever, and shall be blessed with his presence always, even to the end of the world.

II. The blessings God has in store for David's house and Zion hill. Whom God chooses he will bless.

1. The blessings of the life that now is; for godliness has the promise of them, v. 15. The earth shall yield her increase; where religion is set up there shall be provision. God's people have a special blessing upon common enjoyments, and that blessing puts a peculiar sweetness into them. The promise goes further: I will satisfy her poor with bread. They shall have provision enough. If there be scarcity, the poor are the first that feel it, so that it is a sure sign of plenty if they have sufficient. And this may be understood spiritually of the provision that is made for the soul in the word and ordinances; God will abundantly bless that for the nourishment of the new man, and satisfy the poor in spirit with the bread of life. The blessings of the life that is to come, things pertaining to godliness (v. 16), which is an answer to the prayer, v. 9. It was desired that the priests might be clothed with righteousness; it is here promised that God will clothe them with salvation. They shall both save themselves and those that hear them, and add those to the church that shall be saved.

2. God, having chosen David's family, here promises to bless that also with suitable blessings. There, in Zion, will I make the horn of David to bud, v. 17. The royal dignity shall increase more and more, and constant additions be made to the lustre of it. Christ is the horn of salvation which God has raised up, and made to bud, in the house of his servant David. I have ordained a lamp for my anointed. Thou wilt light my candle, xviii. 28. That lamp is likely to burn brightly which God ordains. A lamp is a successor, for, when a lamp is almost out, another may be lighted by it; it is a succession, for by this means David shall not want a man to stand before God. Christ is the lamp and the light of the world. "His enemies, who have formed designs against him, will I clothe with shame, when they shall see their designs baffled." Upon himself shall his crown flourish, that is, his government shall be more and more his honour. The crowns of earthly princes endure not to all generations (Prov. xxvii. 24), but Christ's crown shall endure to all eternity and the crowns reserved for his faithful subjects are such as fade not away.

PSALM CXXXIII

This psalm is a brief encomium on unity and brotherly love. Some conjecture that David penned this psalm upon occasion of the union between the tribes when they all met unanimously to make him king. I. The doctrine laid down of the happiness of brotherly love, ver. 1. II. The illustration of that doctrine, in two similitudes, ver. 2. 3. III. The proof of it, in a good reason given for it (ver. 3).

A song of degrees of David.

Sometimes it is chosen, as the best expedient for preserving peace, that brethren should live asunder and at a distance from each other; that indeed may prevent enmity and strife (Gen. xiii. 9), but the goodness and pleasantness are for brethren to dwell together and so to dwell in unity, to dwell even as one (so some read it), as having one heart, one soul, one interest.

The tribes of Israel had long had separate interests during the government of the Judges; but now they were united under one common head, now the ark was fixed, and with it the place of their rendezvous for public worship and the centre of their unity. Now let them live in love. It is a rare thing, and therefore admirable. It is fragrant as the holy anointing oil, which was strongly perfumed, and diffused its odours, when it was poured upon the head of Aaron, or his successor the high priest, so plentifully that it ran down the face, even to the collar or binding of the garment, v. 2. So must our brotherly love be, with a pure heart, devoted to God. Holy love, is in the sight of God, of great price. Christ's love to mankind was part of that oil of gladness with which he was anointed above his fellows. Aaron and his sons were not admitted to minister unto the Lord till they were anointed with this ointment, nor are our services acceptable to God without this holy love; if we have it not we are nothing, 1 Cor. xiii. 1, 2. It is profitable as well as pleasing; it is as the dew; it brings abundance of blessings along with it, as numerous as the drops of dew. It cools the scorching heat of men's passions, as the evening dews cool the air and refresh the earth. It moistens the heart, and makes it tender and fit to receive the good seed of the word. It is as the dew of Hermon, a common hill (for brotherly love is the beauty and benefit of civil societies), and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion, a holy hill, for it contributes greatly to the fruitfulness of sacred societies. Loving people are blessed people. They are blessed of God, and therefore blessed indeed. The blessing which God commands on those that dwell in love is life for evermore; that is the blessing of blessings. Those that dwell in love not only dwell in God, but do already dwell in heaven.

PSALM CXXXIV

This is the last of the fifteen songs of degrees; and, if they were at any time sung all together in the temple-service, it is fitly made the conclusion of them, for the design of it is to stir up the ministers to go on with their work in the night, when the solemnities of the day were over. Some make this psalm to be a dialogue. I. In the first two verses, the priests or Levites who sat up all night to keep the watch of the house of the Lord are called upon to spend their time while they were upon the guard, not in idle talk, but in the acts of devotion. II. In the last verse those who were thus called upon to praise God pray for him that gave them the exhortation, either the high priest or the captain of the guard.

A song of degrees.

I. Our blessing God, that is, speaking well of him, which here we are taught to do, v. 1, 2. 1. It is a call to the Levites to do it. Some of them did by night stand in the house of the Lord, to guard the holy things of the temple, that they might not be profaned, and the rich things of the temple, that they might not be plundered. While the ark was in curtains there was the more need of guards upon it. They attended likewise to see that neither the fire on the altar nor the lamps in the candlestick went out. Probably it was usual for some devout and pious Israelites to sit up with them; we read of one that departed not from the temple night or day, Luke ii. 37. Now these are here called upon to bless the Lord. 2. It is a call to us to do it, who, as Christians, are made priests to our God, and Levites, Isa. lxvi. 21. We are the servants of the Lord; we have a place and a name in his house, in his sanctuary; we stand before him to minister to him. Let us therefore bless the Lord. Let us lift up our hands in prayer, in praise, in vows; let us do our work with diligence and cheerfulness, and an elevation of mind.

II. God's blessing us, and that is doing well for us, which we are here taught to desire, v. 3. We need desire no more to make us happy than to be blessed of the Lord, for those whom he blesses are blessed indeed.

PSALM CXXXV

This is one of the Hallelujah-psalms; that is the title of it, and that is the Amen of it, both its Alpha and its Omega. I. It begins with a call to praise God, ver. 1–3. II. It goes on to furnish us with matter for praise. God is to be praised, 1. As the God of Jacob, ver. 4. 2. As the God of gods, ver. 5. 3. As the God of the whole world, ver. 6, 7. 4. As a terrible God to the enemies of Israel, ver. 8–11. 5. As a gracious God to Israel, ver. 12–14, 6. As the only living God, all other gods being vanity and a lie. ver. 15–18. III. It concludes with another exhortation to all persons concerned to praise God, ver. 19–21.

Verses 1–4

I. The duty we are called to—to praise the Lord, to praise his name; praise him, and again praise him. We must not only thank him for what he has done for us, but praise him for what he is in himself and has done for others. 2. The persons that are called upon to do this—the servants of the Lord, the priests and Levites that stand in his house, and all the devout and pious Israelites that stand in the courts of his house to worship there, v. 2. Who should praise him if they do not? 3. The reasons why we should praise God. He is good to all. His goodness is his glory, and we must make mention of it to his glory. The work is its own wages.

Verses 5–14

The psalmist had suggested to us the goodness of God, as the proper nature of our cheerful praises; here he suggests to us the greatness of God as the proper matter of our praises.

I. He asserts the doctrine of God's greatness (v. 5): The Lord is great, great indeed, who knows no limits of time or place.

II. He proves him to be a great God by the greatness of his power, v. 6. He has an absolute power, and may do what he will. This absolute almighty power is of universal extent; he does what he will in heaven, in earth, in the seas, and in all the deep places that are in the bottom of the sea or the bowels of the earth.

III. He gives instances of his great power,

1. In the kingdom of nature, v. 7. All the powers of nature prove the greatness of the God of nature, from whom they are derived and on whom they depend. The chain of natural causes was not only framed by him at first, but is preserved by him. It is by his power that exhalations are drawn up from the terraqueous globe. The heat of the sun raises them, but it has that power from God. It is he who, out of those vapours so raised, forms the rain. They are returned with advantage in fruitful showers. He makes lightnings for the rain; by them he shakes the clouds, that they may water the earth. Here are fire and water thoroughly reconciled by divine omnipotence. Winds blow where they list, from what point of the compass they will, and we are so far from directing them that we cannot tell whence they come nor whither they go, but God brings them out of his treasuries with exactness and design.

2. In the kingdoms of men. Observe God's sovereign dominion and irresistible power, (1) In bringing Israel out of Egypt, humbling Pharaoh by many plagues, and so forcing him to let them go. (2) In destroying the kingdoms of Canaan before them, v. 10. No power of hell or earth can prevent the accomplishment of the promise of God when the time, the set time, for it has come. (3) In settling them in the land of promise. He that gives kingdoms to whomsoever he pleases gave Canaan to be a heritage to Israel his people.

IV. He triumphs in the perpetuity of God's glory and grace. Thy name, O God! endures for ever. This seems to refer to Exod. iii. 15, where, when God had called himself the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, he adds, This is my name for ever and this is my memorial unto all generations. He will be kind to his people. He will plead their cause against others that contend with them. He will judge his people, that is, he will judge for them, and will not suffer them to be run down.

These verses design:—

I. To arm the people of God against idolatry and all false worships, by showing what sort of gods they were that the heathen worshipped, as we had it before, cxv. 4, &c. They were gods of their own making; being so, they could have no power but what their makers gave them. They had the shape of animals, but could not perform the least act, no, not of the animal life. Their worshippers were therefore as stupid and senseless as they were, both those that made them to be worshipped and those that trusted in them when they were made, v. 18.

II. To stir up the people of God to true devotion in the worship of the true God, v. 19–21. In the parallel place (cxv. 9–11), by way of inference from the impotency of idols, the duty thus pressed upon us is to trust in the Lord; here to bless him; by putting our trust in God we give glory to him.

PSALM CXXXVI

The scope of this psalm is the same with that of the foregoing psalm, but the latter half of each verse is the same, repeated throughout the psalm, "for his mercy endureth for ever". It is allowed that such burdens, or "keepings", as we call them, add very much to the beauty of a song, and help to make it moving and affecting. The repetition of it here twenty-six times intimates, 1. That God's mercies to his people are thus repeated and drawn, as it were, with a continuando from the beginning to the end. 2. That in every particular favour we ought to take notice of the mercy of God. 3. That the everlasting continuance of the mercy of God is very much his honour. This most excellent sentence that God's mercy endureth for ever, is magnified above all the truths concerning God, not only by the repetition of it here, but by the signal tokens of divine acceptance with which God owned the singing of it (2 Chron. v. 13; xx. 21, 22). We must praise God, I. As great and good in himself, ver. 1–3. II. As the Creator of the world, ver. 5–9. III. As Israel's God and Saviour, ver. 10–22. IV. As our Redeemer, ver. 23, 24. V. As the great benefactor of the whole creation, and God over all, blessed for evermore, ver. 25, 26.

Verses 1–9

The duty we are here again and again called to is to give thanks, to offer the sacrifice of praise continually, not the fruits of our ground or cattle, but the fruits of our lips, giving thanks to his name, Heb. xiii. 15. We must give thanks to the Lord, Jehovah, Israel's God (v. 1), the God of gods, the God whom angels adore, from whom magistrates derive their power (v. 2), to the Lord of lords, the Sovereign of all sovereigns, v. 3. We must give thanks to God for his goodness and mercy (v. 1): Give thanks to the Lord, not only because he does good, but because he is good. Not only for that mercy which is now handed out to us here on earth, but for that which shall endure for ever in the glories and joys of heaven. We must give God thanks for the instances of his power and wisdom. He made the heavens, and stretched them out, and in them we not only see his wisdom and power, but we taste his mercy in their benign influences; as long as the heavens endure the mercy of God endures in them, v. 5. The earth hath he given to the children of men, and all its products. The sun, moon, and stars, he placed in the firmament of heaven, to shed their light and influences upon this earth, v. 7–9.

Verses 10–22

The great things God did for Israel, when he formed them into a people, and set up his kingdom among them, are here mentioned, as often elsewhere in the psalms, as instances both of the power of God and of the particular kindness he had for Israel. He brought them out of Egypt, v. 10–12. He forced them a way through the Red Sea, which obstructed them at their first setting out. He not only divided the sea, but gave his people courage to go through it when it was divided, which was an instance of God's power over men's hearts, as the former of his power over the waters. He conducted them through a vast howling wilderness (v. 16); there he led them and fed them. He destroyed kings before them, to make room for them (v. 17, 18). It is good to enter into the detail of God's favours and not to view them in the gross, and in each instance to observe, and own, that God's mercy endureth for ever. He put them in possession of a good land, v. 21, 22. As he said to the Egyptians, Let my people go, so to the Canaanites, Let my people in, that they may serve me. In this God's mercy to them endureth for ever, because it was a figure of the heavenly Canaan, the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.

Verses 23–26

God's everlasting mercy is here celebrated in the redemption of his church, v. 23, 24. In the many redemptions wrought for the Jewish church out of the hands of their oppressors (when, in the years of their servitude, their estate was very low, God remembered them, and raised them up saviours, the judges, and David), but especially in the great redemption of the universal church, of which these were types, we have a great deal of reason to say, "He remembered us in our low estate, in our lost estate, for his mercy endureth for ever; he sent his Son to redeem us from sin, and death, and hell, and all our spiritual enemies, for his mercy endureth for ever." It is an instance of the mercy of God's providence that wherever he has given life he gives food agreeable and sufficient; and he is a good housekeeper that provides for so large a family. In all his glories, and all his gifts (v. 26): Give thanks to the God of heaven. This and that particular mercy may perhaps endure but a while, but the mercy that is in God endures for ever; it is an inexhaustible fountain.

PSALM CXXXVII

There are divers psalms which are thought to have been penned in the latter days of the Jewish church, when prophecy was near expiring and the canon of the Old Testament ready to be closed up, but none of them appears so plainly to be of a late date as this, which was penned when the people of God were captives in Babylon; probably it was towards the latter end of their captivity; for now they saw the destruction of Babylon hastening on apace (ver. 8), which would be their discharge. It is a mournful psalm, a lamentation. I. The melancholy captives cannot enjoy themselves, ver. 1, 2. II. They cannot humour their proud oppressors, ver. 3, 4. III. They cannot forget Jerusalem, ver. 5, 6. IV. They cannot forgive Edom and Babylon, ver. 7–9.

Verses 1–6

I. The people of God in tears, but sowing in tears. They were posted by the rivers of Babylon, in a strange land, a great way from their own country, whence they were brought as prisoners of war. The land of Babylon was now a house of bondage to that people, as Egypt had been in their beginning. Their conquerors quartered them by the rivers, with design to employ them there. We find some of them by the river Chebar (Ezek. i. 3). There they sat down to indulge their grief by poring on their miseries. Thoughts of Zion drew tears from their eyes; but they were deliberate tears (we sat down and wept), tears with consideration—we wept when we remembered Zion, the holy hill on which the temple was built. Their affection to God's house swallowed up their concern for their own houses. They laid by their instruments of music (v. 2): We hung our harps upon the willows. They did not hide their harps in the bushes, or the hollows of the rocks; but hung them up in view, that the sight of them might affect them with this deplorable change. Yet perhaps they were faulty in doing this; for praising God is never out of season.

II. The abuses which their enemies put upon them when they were in this melancholy condition, v. 3. They had carried them away captive from their own land and then wasted them in the land of their captivity. To complete their woes they insulted over them: They required of us mirth and a song. It argues a base and sordid spirit to upbraid those that are in distress either with their former joys or with their present griefs, or to challenge those to be merry who, we know, are out of tune for it. No songs would serve them but the songs of Zion, with which God had been honoured; so that in this demand they reflected upon God himself as Belshazzar, when he drank wine in temple-bowls.

III. The patience wherewith they bore these abuses, v. 4. They had laid by their harps, and would not resume them. Profane scoffers are not to be humoured. The reason they gave is very mild and pious: How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land? "It is the Lord's song; it is a sacred thing; it is peculiar to the temple-service, and therefore we dare not sing it in the land of a stranger, among idolaters."

IV. The constant affection they retained for Jerusalem, the city of their solemnities, even now that they were in Babylon. It was always in their minds; they remembered it; many of them had never seen it. In their daily prayers they opened their windows towards Jerusalem; and how then could they forget it. "Let my right hand forget her art" (which the hand of an expert musician never can, unless it be withered), "nay, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I have not a good word to say for Jerusalem wherever I am."

Verses 7–9

The pious Jews in Babylon, having afflicted themselves with the thoughts of the ruins of Jerusalem, here please themselves with the prospect of the ruin of her impenitent implacable enemies; but this not from a spirit of revenge, but from a holy zeal for the glory of God and the honour of his kingdom. And all this was a fruit of the old enmity of Esau against Jacob, because he got the birthright and the blessing. Lord, remember them, says the psalmist, which is an appeal to his justice against them. Far be it from us to avenge ourselves, if ever it should be in our power, but we will leave it to him who has said, Vengeance is mine. O daughter of Babylon! proud and secure as thou art, we know well thou art to be destroyed, or (as Dr. Hammond reads it) who art the destroyer. The destroyers shall be destroyed. "Thou shalt be served as thou hast served us, as barbarously used by the destroyers as we have been by thee." Let not those expect to find mercy who, when they had power, did not show mercy. None escape if the little ones perish. Those are the seed of another generation; so that, if they be cut off, the ruin will be not only total, as Jerusalem's was, but final.

PSALM CXXXVIII

It does not appear upon what occasion David penned this psalm; but in it, I. He looks back with thankfulness upon the experiences he had had of God's goodness to him, ver. 1–3. II. He looks forward with comfort, in hopes, 1. That others would go on to praise God like him, ver. 4, 5. 2. That God would go on to do good to him, ver. 6–8.

A psalm of David.

I. He would praise God with sincerity and zeal—"With my heart, with my whole heart, with that which is within me and with all that is within me, inward impressions agreeing with outward expressions." Before the gods will I sing praise unto thee, before the princes, and judges, and great men. I will worship towards thy holy temple. The priests alone went into the temple; the people, at the nearest, did but worship towards it, and that they might do at a distance. Christ is our temple, and towards him we must look as Mediator between us and God, in all our praises of him. Heaven is God's holy temple, and thitherward we must lift up our eyes in all our addresses to God. Our Father in heaven.

II. He would praise God for the fountain of his comforts—for thy lovingkindness and for thy truth. For thou hast magnified thy word (thy promise, which is truth) above all thy name. God has made himself known to us in many ways in creation and providence, but most clearly by his word. Some good interpreters understand it of Christ, the essential Word, and of his gospel, which are magnified above all the discoveries God had before made of himself to the fathers. He had been in affliction, and he remembers. Thou strengthenedst me with strength in my soul. If God give us strength in our souls to bear the burdens, resist the temptations, and do the duties of an afflicted state, if he strengthen us to keep hold of himself by faith, to maintain the peace of our own minds and to wait with patience for the issue, we must own that he has answered us, and we are bound to be thankful.

III. David was himself a king, and therefore he hoped that kings would be wrought upon by his experiences, and his example, to embrace religion. This may have reference to the kings that were neighbours to David, as Hiram and others. "They shall all praise thee." When they visited David, and, after his death, Solomon (as all the kings of the earth are expressly said to have done, 2 Chron. ix. 23), they readily joined in the worship of the God of Israel. It may look further, to the calling of the Gentiles and the disciplining of all nations by the gospel of Christ, of whom it is said that all kings shall fall down before him, Ps. lxxii. 11. They shall sing in the ways of the Lord, in the ways of his providence and grace towards them.

Verses 6–8

David here comforts himself with three things:—

I. The favour God bears to his humble people (v. 6): Though the Lord be high, yet has he respect unto the lowly, smiles upon them as well pleased with them, and, sooner or later, he will put honour upon them, while he knows the proud afar off, knows them, but disowns them.

II. The care God takes of his afflicted oppressed people, v. 7. David, though a great and good man, expects to walk in the midst of trouble, but encourages himself with hope. "When my spirit is ready to sink and fail, thou shalt revive me, and make me easy and cheerful under my troubles." He would protect him: "Thou shalt stretch forth thy hand, though not against my enemies to destroy them, yet against the wrath of my enemies, to restrain that and set bounds to it." He would in due time work deliverance for him: Thy right hand shall save me. Christ is the right hand of the Lord, that shall save all those who serve him.

III. Whatever good work God has begun for his people he will perform it (v. 8): The Lord will perfect that which concerns me, which is most needful for me. Every good man is most concerned about his duty to God and his happiness in God, that the former may be faithfully done and the latter effectually secured; and if indeed these are the things that our hearts are most upon, there is a good work begun in us, and he that has begun it will perfect it, Phil. i. 6. Our hopes that we shall persevere must be founded, not upon our own strength, for that will fail us, but upon the mercy of God, for that will not fail. It is well pleaded, "Lord, thy mercy endures for ever; let me be for ever a monument of it." He turns his expectation into a petition: "Forsake not, do not let go, the work of thy own hands. Lord, I am the work of thy own hands, my soul is so, do not forsake me."

PSALM CXXXIX

Some of the Jewish doctors are of opinion that this is the most excellent of all the psalms of David; and a very pious devout meditation it is upon the doctrine of God's omniscience. I. This doctrine is here asserted, ver. 1–6. II. It is confirmed by two arguments:—1. God is everywhere present; therefore he knows all, ver. 7–12. 2. He made us, therefore he knows us, ver. 13–16. III. Some inferences are drawn from this doctrine. 1. It may fill us with pleasing admiration of God, ver. 17, 18. 2. With a holy detestation of sin and sinners, ver. 19–22. 3. With a holy satisfaction in our own integrity, ver. 23, 24.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

Verses 1–6

God with whom we have to do has a perfect knowledge of us, and all the motions and actions both of our inward and of our outward man are open before him.

I. David lays down this doctrine of address to God; acknowledging it to him, and giving him the glory. When we speak to God of himself we shall find ourselves concerned to speak with the utmost degree both of sincerity and reverence.

II. He lays it down in a way of application to himself, not "Thou hast known all," but, "Thou hast known me." So here, "Thou hast searched me, and known me." David was a king, and the hearts of kings are unsearchable to their subjects (Prov. xxv. 3), but they are not so to their Sovereign.

III. He descends to particulars: "Thou knowest me wherever I am and whatever I am doing, me and all that belongs to me. Thou knowest me and all my motions, my down-sitting to rest, my up-rising to work. Thou knowest me when I come home, how I walk before my house, and when I go abroad, on what errands I go. Thou knowest all my imaginations. It is often unobserved by ourselves, and yet thou understandest my thoughts afar off." Or, "Thou understandest them afar off, even before I think them, and long after I have thought them and have myself forgotten them." Or "Thou understandest them from afar; from the height of heaven thou seest into the depths of the heart," xxxiii. 14. "Thou compassest every particular path, so as thoroughly to distinguish between the good and evil of what I do. "Thou knowest me in all my retirements; thou knowest my lying down; when I am reflecting upon what has passed all day, thou knowest what I have in my heart and with what thoughts I go to bed." There is not a word in my tongue, not a vain word, nor a good word, but thou knowest it altogether. When there is not a word in my tongue, O Lord! thou knowest all (so some read it); for thoughts are words to God. Thou hast beset me behind and before. Wherever we are we are under the eye and hand of God. God knows us as we know not only what we see, but what we feel.

IV. He speaks of it with admiration (v. 6): It is too wonderful for me; it is high. We cannot by searching find out how God searches and finds out us; nor do we know how we are known.

David is sure that God perfectly knows him and all his ways,

I. Because he is always under his eye. If God is omnipresent, he must needs be omniscient. Heaven and earth include the whole creation, and the Creator fills both (Jer. xxiii. 24); he not only knows both, and governs both, but he fills both. Every part of the creation is under God's influence. No flight can remove us out of God's presence: "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit, from thy presence, that is, from thy spiritual presence, from thyself, who art a Spirit?" God is a Spirit, and therefore it is folly to think that because we cannot see him he cannot see us: Whither shall I flee from thy presence? (Quocunque te flexeris, ibi Deum videbis occurrentem tibi—Whithersoever thou turnest thyself, thou wilt see God meeting thee, said Seneca.) David specifies the most remote and distant places, and counts upon meeting God in them. (1) In heaven: "If I ascend thither, as I hope to do shortly, thou art there, and it will be my eternal bliss to be with thee there." (2) In hell—in Sheol, which may be understood of the depth of the earth, the very centre of it. Should we dig as deep as we can underground, and think to hide ourselves there, we should be mistaken. Or it may be understood of the state of the dead. When we are removed out of the sight of all living, we are not out of sight of the living God; from his eye we cannot hide ourselves. Or it may be understood of the place of the damned: If I make my bed in hell (an uncomfortable place to make a bed in) behold, thou art there, in thy power and justice. In the remotest corners of this world: "If I take the wings of the morning, the rays of the morning-light (called the wings of the sun, Mal. iv. 2), than which nothing more swift, and flee upon them to the uttermost parts of the sea, or of the earth, should I flee to the most distant and obscure islands (the ultima Thule, the Terra incognita), I should find thee there; there shall thy hand lead me, as far as I go, and thy right hand shall hold me, that I can go no further, that I cannot go out of thy reach."

2. No veil can hide us from God's eye, v. 11, 12. "If I say, Yet the darkness shall cover me, when nothing else will, I find myself deceived; the curtains of the evening will stand me in no more stead than the wings of the morning; even the night shall be light about me." No hypocritical mask or disguise, how specious soever, can save any person or action from appearing in a true light before God.

II. Because he is the work of his hands. He that framed the engine knows all the motions of it. God made us, and therefore he knows us. "Thou hast possessed my reins. The possession thou hast of my reins is a rightful possession, for thou coveredst me in my mother's womb, that is, thou madest me (Job x. 11), thou madest me in secret." The soul is concealed from all about us. It was God himself that thus covered us, and therefore he can, when he pleases, discover us. "I will praise thee, the author of my being; my parents were only the instruments of it." We were his work, according to the divine model: In thy book all my members were written. Eternal wisdom formed the plan. We are fearfully and wonderfully made; we may justly be astonished at these living temples, the composition of every part, and the harmony of all together. As a great mercy all our members in continuance were fashioned, according as they were written in the book of God's wise counsel, when as yet there was none of them.

Here the psalmist makes application of the doctrine of God's omniscience,

I. He acknowledges, with wonder and thankfulness, the care God had taken of him all his days, v. 17, 18. God, who knew him, thought of him, and his thoughts towards him were thoughts of love. God's omniscience has watched over us to do us good, Jer. xxxi. 28. Providence has had a vast reach in its dispensations concerning us, and has brought things about for our good quite beyond our contrivance and foresight. We cannot conceive the multitude of God's compassions, which are all new every morning. "When I awake, every morning, I am still with thee, under thy eye and care, safe and easy under thy protection."

II. He concludes from this doctrine that ruin will certainly be the end of sinners. God knows all the wickedness of the wicked, and therefore he will reckon for it. God will punish them, because they set him at defiance (v. 20): They speak against thee wickedly. They are his enemies, and declare their enmity by taking his name in vain. Some make it to be a description of hypocrites: "They speak of thee for mischief; they talk of God, pretending to piety, and, being enemies to God, while they pretend friendship, they take his name in vain; they swear falsely." 1. He defies them: "Depart from me, you bloody men; you shall not debauch me, for I will not admit your friendship nor have fellowship with you; and you cannot destroy me. David detests them v. 21, 22: "Lord, thou knowest the heart, and canst witness for me; do not I hate those that hate thee, because they hate thee? I hate them because I love thee, and hate to see such indignities put upon thy blessed name. Am not I grieved with those that rise up against thee, grieved to see their rebellion and to foresee their ruin, which it will certainly end in?" Sin is hatred, and sinners are lamented, by all that fear God. "I hate them" (that is, I hate the work of them that turn aside, ci. 3).

III. He appeals to God concerning his sincerity, v. 23, 24. "Lord, I hope I am not in a wicked way, but see if there be any wicked way in me, any corrupt inclination remaining; let me see it; and root it out of me, for I do not allow it." Lead me in the way everlasting.

PSALM CXL

This and the four following psalms are much of a piece, and the scope of them the same with many that we met with in the beginning and middle of the book of Psalms. They were penned by David (as it should seem) when he was persecuted by Saul. In this psalm, I. David complains of the malice of his enemies, and prays to God to preserve him from them, ver. 1–5. II. He encourages himself in God as his God, ver. 6, 7. III. He prays for, and prophesies, the destruction of his persecutors, ver. 8–11. IV. He assures all God's afflicted people that their troubles would in due time end well (ver. 12, 13).

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

Verses 1–7

In this, as in other things, David was a type of Christ, that he suffered before he reigned, was humbled before he was exalted, and that as there were many who loved and valued him, and sought to do him honour, so there were many who hated and envied him, and sought to do him mischief.

I. He gives a character of his enemies. There was one that seems to have been the ring-leader of them, whom he calls the evil man and the man of violences (v. 1, 4), probably he means Saul. But there were many besides this one who were confederate against David. They are very subtle (v. 2), have laid the scheme with all the cunning imaginable. They have, like mighty hunters, hidden a snare, and spread a net, and set gins (v. 5), that he might fall into their hands ere he was aware. Great persecutors have often been great politicians, which has indeed made them the more formidable; but the Lord preserves the simple. They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent, that infuses his venom with his tongue; and there is so much malignity in all they say that one would think there was nothing under their lips but adders' poison, v. 3. They are all gathered together against me for war, v. 2. Those who can agree in nothing else can agree to persecute a good man. Herod and Pilate will unite in this, and in this they resemble Satan, who is not divided against himself, all the devils agreeing in Beelzebub. The pride of persecutors may be the encouragement of the persecuted, for the more haughty they are the faster are they ripening for ruin.

II. He prays: "Lord, deliver me, preserve me, keep me (v. 1, 4); let them not prevail to take away my life, my reputation, my interest, my comfort, and to prevent my coming to the throne. Keep me from doing as they do, or as they promise themselves I shall do."

III. He triumphs in God, and thereby, in effect, he triumphs over his persecutors, v. 6, 7. "I said, Thou art my God; and, if my God, then my shield and mighty protector." In his access to God, it comforted him, that he was not only taken into covenant with God, but into communion with him. He had help from God and happiness in him: "O God the Lord—Jehovah Adonai! as Jehovah thou art self-existent and self-sufficient, an infinitely perfect being; as Adonai thou art my stay and support, my ruler and governor, and therefore the strength of my salvation, my strong Saviour. Thou hast covered my head in the day of battle."

David prays: "Grant not, O Lord! the desires of the wicked, but frustrate them; hear the voice of my supplications." He prays: "O further not his wicked device; let not Providence favour any of his designs, but cross them; suffer not his wicked device to proceed, but chain his wheels, and stop him in the career of his pursuits." He foretells the ruin of his enemies: "The mischief of their own lips shall cover their heads (v. 9); the evil they have wished to me shall come upon themselves, their curses shall be blown back into their own faces, and the very designs which they have laid against me shall turn to their own ruin," vii. 15, 16. The judgments of God shall fall upon them, compared here to burning coals, in allusion to the destruction of Sodom. Evil speakers must expect to be shaken, for they shall never be established in the earth. What is got by fraud and falsehood, by calumny and unjust accusation, will not prosper. "I know that the Lord will maintain the just and injured cause of his afflicted people, and will not suffer might always to prevail against right, though it be but the right of the poor." The closing words, The upright shall dwell in thy presence, denote both God's favour to them ("Thou shalt admit them to dwell in thy presence in grace here, in glory hereafter, and it shall be their safety and happiness") and their duty to God.

PSALM CXLI

David was in distress when he penned this psalm. I. He prays for God's favourable acceptance, ver. 1, 2. II. For his powerful assistance, ver. 3, 4. III. That others might be instrumental of good to his soul, as he hoped to be to the souls of others, ver. 5, 6 IV. That he and his friends being now brought to the last extremity God would graciously appear for their relief and rescue, ver. 7–10.

A psalm of David.

I. David loved prayer, and he begs of God that his prayers might be heard and answered, v. 1, 2. David cried unto God. His crying denotes fervency in prayer. "Give ear to my voice; let me have a gracious audience." Those that cry in prayer may hope to be heard in prayer, not for their loudness, but their liveliness. Make haste unto me. He that believes does not make haste, but he that prays may be earnest with God to make haste. His praying and the lifting up of his hands in prayer denotes both the elevation of his desire and the out-goings of his hope and expectation, the lifting up of the hand signifying the lifting up of the heart, and being used instead of lifting up the sacrifices which were heaved and waved before the Lord. Prayer is a spiritual sacrifice; it is the offering up of the soul, and its best affections, to God. Prayer is of a sweet-smelling savour to God, as incense, which yet has no savour without fire; nor has prayer without the fire of holy love and fervour.

II. David begs that he might be kept from sin, knowing that his prayers would not be accepted unless he took care to watch against sin. We must be as earnest for God's grace in us as for his favour towards us. "Set a watch, O Lord! before my mouth, and, nature having made my lips to be a door to my words, let grace keep that door, that no word may be suffered to go out which may in any way tend to the dishonour of God or the hurt of others. Incline not my heart to any evil thing; whatever inclination there is in me to sin, let it be not only restrained, but mortified, by divine grace." While we live in such an evil world, and carry about with us such evil hearts, we have need to pray that we may neither be drawn in by any allurement nor driven on by any provocation. "Let me not eat of their dainties. Let me not join with them, lest thereby I be inveigled into their sins." Good men will pray even against the sweets of sin.

Verses 5–10

I. David desires to be told of his faults. Let the righteous smite me; it shall be a kindness. We are here taught how to receive the reproofs of the righteous and wise. If my own heart does not smite me, as it ought, let my friend do it; let me never fall under that dreadful judgment of being let alone in sin. We must account it a piece of friendship. We must not only bear it patiently, but take it as a kindness. Though reproofs cut, it is in order to a cure, and therefore they are much more desirable than the kisses of an enemy (Prov. xxvii. 6) or the song of fools, Eccles. vii. 5. It shall be as an excellent oil to a wound, to mollify it and close it up; it shall not break my head, as some reckon it to do, who could as well bear to have their heads broken as to be told of their faults; but, says David, "I am not of that mind; it is my sin that has broken my head, that has broken my bones, Ps. li. 8. The reproof is an excellent oil, to cure the bruises sin has given me. It shall not break my head, if it may but help to break my heart."

II. David hopes his persecutors will, some time or other, bear to be told of their faults, as he was willing to be told of his (v. 6). Some think this refers to the relentings that were in Saul's breast when he said, with tears, Is this thy voice, my son David? 1 Sam. xxiv. 16; xxvi. 21.

III. David complains of the great extremity to which he and his friends were reduced (v. 7): Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, out of which they are thrown up, so long have we been dead; and they are as little regarded as chips among the hewers of wood, which are thrown in neglected heaps.

IV. David casts himself upon God, and depends upon him for deliverance: "But my eyes are unto thee (v. 8). From thee I expect relief, bad as things are, and in thee is my trust."

PSALM CXLII

This psalm is a prayer, the substance of which David offered up to God when he was forced by Saul to take shelter in a cave, and which he afterwards penned in this form. Here is, I. The complaint he makes to God (ver. 1, 2) of the subtlety, strength, and malice, of his enemies (ver. 3, 6), and the coldness and indifference of his friends, ver. 4. II. The comfort he takes in God that he knew his case (ver. 3) and was his refuge, ver. 5. III. His expectation from God that he would hear and deliver him, ver. 6, 7. IV. His expectation from the righteous that they would join with him in praises, ver. 7.

Maschil of David. A prayer when he was in the cave.

Whether it was in the cave of Adullam, or that of Engedi, that David prayed this prayer, is not material; it is plain that he was in distress. When he durst not stretch forth his hands against his prince, he lifted them up to his God. There is no cave so deep, so dark, but we may out of it send up our souls in prayer, to God. He calls this prayer Maschil—a psalm of instruction, because of the good lessons he had himself learnt in the cave on his knees.

I. How David complained to God, v. 1, 2. When the danger was over he was not ashamed to own (as great spirits sometimes are) the fright he had been in. Let not men think it any disparagement to them, when they are in affliction, to cry to God, and to cry like children to their parents when anything frightens them. He cried unto the Lord with his voice, with the voice of his mind (so some think), for, being hidden in the cave, he durst not speak with an audible voice, lest that should betray him; but mental prayer is vocal to God, and he hears the groanings which cannot, or dare not, be uttered, Rom. viii. 26. I showed before him my trouble. As one that put a confidence in God he unbosomed himself to him and then cheerfully left it with him. We are apt to show our trouble too much to ourselves, aggravating it, and poring upon it, whereas by showing it to God we might cast the care upon him who careth for us.

II. What he complained of: "In the way wherein I walked, suspecting no danger, have they privily laid a snare for me, to entrap me." Saul gave Michal his daughter to David on purpose that she might be a snare to him, 1 Sam. xviii. 21.

III. What comforted him in the midst of these complaints (v. 3): "When my spirit was overwhelmed within me, and ready to sink under the burden of grief and fear, then thou knewest my path, that is, then it was a pleasure to me to think that thou knewest it. Thou knewest it, that is, thou didst protect, preserve, and secure it," Ps. xxi. 7; Deut. ii. 7.

Verses 4–7

He was disowned and deserted by his friends, v. 4. When he was made an outlaw, then no man would know him, but everybody was shy of him. He looked on his right hand for an advocate (cix. 31), but, since Jonathan's appearing for him had like to have cost him his life, nobody was willing to venture in defence of his innocency. How many good men have been deceived by such swallow-friends, who are gone when winter comes! Herein he was a type of Christ, who was forsaken of all men, even of his own disciples, and trod the wine-press alone. David tells us what he said to God in the cave: "Thou art my refuge and my portion in the land of the living. The cave I am in is but a poor refuge. Lord, thy name is the strong tower that I run into. Thou art my refuge, in whom alone I shall think myself safe." Those who in sincerity take the Lord for their God shall find him all-sufficient and they may humbly claim their interest: "Lord, thou art my refuge in the land of the living, that is, while I live and have my being, whether in this world or in a better." He addressed himself to God (v. 6, 7): "Lord, deliver me from my persecutors, either tie their hands or turn their hearts, break their power or blast their projects, restrain them or rescue me, for they are stronger than I. Lord, bring my soul out of prison, not only bring me safe out of this cave, but bring me out of all my perplexities."

PSALM CXLIII

This psalm, as those before, is a prayer of David, and full of complaints of the great distress and danger he was in. In this psalm, I. He complains of his troubles (ver. 3) and the weakness of his spirit, ver. 4, 5. II. He prays, and prays earnestly (ver. 6), 1. That God would hear him, ver. 1–7. 2. That he would not deal with him according to his sins, ver. 2. 3. That he would not hide his face from him (ver. 7), but manifest his favour to him, ver. 8. 4. That he would guide and direct him in the way of his duty (ver. 8, 10) and quicken him in it, ver. 11. 5. That he would deliver him out of his troubles, ver. 9, 11. 6. That he would in due time reckon with his persecutors, ver. 12.

A psalm of David.

I. David is a suppliant to his God, an appellant against his persecutors, and he begs that God will give judgment upon it, in his faithfulness as the Judge of right and wrong. We have no righteousness of our own to plead, and therefore must plead God's righteousness, the word of promise which he has freely given us and caused us to hope in.

II. He humbly begs not to be proceeded against in strict justice, v. 2. He seems here, if not to correct, yet to explain, his plea (v. 1), Deliver me in thy righteousness; "I mean," he says, "the righteous promises of the gospel, not the righteous threatenings of the law." His petition is, "Enter not into judgment with thy servant; do not deal with me in strict justice, as I deserve to be dealt with." David, before he prays for the removal of his trouble, prays for the pardon of his sin, and depends upon mere mercy for it.

III. He complains of his enemies (v. 3): "Saul, that great enemy, has persecuted my soul, sought my life, with a restless malice. He has forced me to dwell in darkness, not only in dark caves, but in dark thoughts and apprehensions, in the clouds of melancholy, as helpless, and hopeless as those that have been long dead. Lord, let me find mercy with thee, for I find no mercy with men."

IV. He bemoans the oppression of his mind, occasioned by his outward troubles (v. 4): Therefore is my spirit overpowered and overwhelmed within me.

V. He applies himself to the use of proper means for the relief of his troubled spirit. If he can keep possession of nothing else, he will do what he can to keep possession of his own soul and to preserve his inward peace. He looks back, and remembers the days of old (v. 5), God's former appearances for his afflicted people and for him in particular. He looks round, and takes notice of the works of God in the visible creation, and the providential government of the world: I meditate on all thy works. I muse on, or (as some read it) I discourse of, the operation of thy hands, how great, how good, it is! The more we consider the power of God the less we shall fear the face or force of man, Isa. li, 12, 13. He looks up with earnest desires towards God and his favour (v. 6): I stretch forth my hands unto thee. My soul thirsteth after thee; it is to thee (so the word is), entire for thee, intent on thee; it is as a thirsty land, which, being parched with excessive heat, gapes for rain.

Verses 7–12

Three things David here prays for:—

I. The manifestations of God's favour towards him. He dreads God's frowns: "Lord, hide not thy face from me." Disconsolate saints have sometimes cried out of the wrath of God, as if they had been damned sinners, Job vi. 4; Ps. lxxxviii. 6. He entreats God's favour (v. 8): Cause me to hear thy lovingkindness in the morning. God speaks to us by his word and by his providence, and in both we should desire and endeavour to hear his lovingkindness (cvii. 43).

II. The operations of God's grace in him. Cause me to know the way wherein I should walk. A good man does not ask what is the way in which he must walk, or in which is the most pleasant walking, but what is the right way, the way in which he should walk. He pleads, "I lift up my soul unto thee, to be moulded and fashioned according to thy will." "Teach me to do thy will, not only show me what thy will is, but teach me how to do it." Lead me into the land of uprightness, into a settled course of holy living, which will lead to heaven. We cannot find the way that will bring us to that land unless God show us, nor go in that way unless he take us by the hand and lead us, as we lead those that are weak, or lame, or timorous, or dim-sighted. The plea is, "Thy Spirit is good, and able to make me good," good and willing to help those that are at a loss. Let thy good Spirit lead me, so some read it. He prays that he might be enlivened to do his will (v. 11): "Quicken me, O Lord! quicken my graces, that they may be active—quicken my devotions, that they may be lively."

III. The appearance of God's providence for him (v. 9): "Deliver me, O Lord! from my enemies, that they may not have their will against me; for I flee unto thee to hide me." He prays: "Deliver me from my outward trouble, from the trouble of my soul, the trouble that threatens to overwhelm my spirit."

PSALM CXLIV

The four preceding psalms seem to have been penned by David before his accession to the crown, when he was persecuted by Saul; this seems to have been penned afterwards. In this psalm, I. He acknowledges with triumph and thankfulness, the great goodness of God to him in advancing him to the government, ver. 1–4. II. He prays to God to help him against the enemies who threatened him, ver. 5–8, and again, ver. 11. III. He rejoices in the assurance of victory over them, ver. 9, 10. IV. He prays for the prosperity of his own kingdom, ver. 12–15.

A psalm of David.

I. David acknowledges his dependence upon God and his obligations to him, v. 1, 2. Blessed be the Lord my rock (v. 1), my goodness my fortress. He multiplies words to express the satisfaction he had in God. "He is my strength, on whom I stay. My goodness, not only good to me, but the author of all the goodness that is in me, and from whom comes every good and perfect gift." David had formerly sheltered himself in strongholds at En-gedi (1 Sam. xxiii. 29), which perhaps were natural fastnesses. He had lately made himself master of the stronghold of Zion, which was fortified by art, and he dwelt in the fort (2 Sam. v. 7, 9), but he depends not on these. "Lord," says he, "thou art my fortress and my high tower. My shield, not only my fortress at home, but my shield abroad in the field of battle." Wherever a believer goes he carries his protection along with him. He was bred a shepherd, and seems not to have been designed by his parents or himself for anything more. But God had made him a soldier. His hands had been used to the crook and his fingers to the harp, but God taught his hands to war and his fingers to fight, because he designed him for Israel's champion. God had made him a sovereign prince, had taught him to wield the sceptre as well as the sword. He subdueth my people under me.

II. He admires God's condescension to man and to himself in particular (v. 3, 4): "Lord, what is man, what a poor little thing is he, that thou takest knowledge of him, that thou makest account of him." The meanness and mortality of man, notwithstanding the dignity put upon him (v. 4): Man is like to vanity; so frail is he, so weak, so helpless, compassed about with so many infirmities, and his continuance here so very short and uncertain, that he is as like as may be to vanity itself.

III. He begs of God to give him success against the enemies that invaded him, v. 5–8. He does not specify who they were that he was in fear of, but says, Scatter them, destroy them. But afterwards he describes them (v. 7, 8): "They are strange children, Philistines, bad neighbours to Israel. One cannot take their word, for their mouth speaketh vanity; nay, if they give their hand upon it, or offer their hand to help you, there is no trusting them; for their right hand is a right hand of falsehood." David prays that God would appear. "Bow thy heavens, O Lord! and make it evident that they are indeed thine, and that thou art the Lord of them, Isa. lxiv. 1. Touch the mountains, our strong and stately enemies, and let them smoke. Show thyself as thou didst upon Mount Sinai."

In this latter part of the psalm as in the former; David first gives glory to God and then begs mercy from him.

I. He praises God for the experiences he had had of his goodness to him, v. 9, 10. In the midst of his complaints concerning the power and treachery of his enemies, here is a holy exultation in his God: I will sing a new song to thee, O God! a song of praise for new mercies. He tells us what this new song shall be (v. 10): It is he that giveth salvation unto kings. Kings are the protectors of their people, but it is God that is their protector. How much service do they owe him then with their power who gives them all their salvations! He has engaged to give salvation to those kings that are his subjects and rule for him; witness the great things he had done for David his servant. This may refer to Christ the Son of David, and then it is a new song indeed, a New Testament song.

II. He prays for the continuance of God's favour.

1. That he might be delivered from the public enemies, v. 11. Here he repeats his prayer and plea, v. 7, 8.

2. That he might see the public peace and prosperity: "Lord, let us have victory, that we may have quietness, which we shall never have while our enemies have it in their power to do us mischief." David desired for his people (v. 12): "That our sons and our daughters may be in all respects such as we could wish." It is desirable to see our daughters as cornerstones, or corner-pillars, polished after the similitude of a palace, or temple. By daughters families are united and connected, to their mutual strength, as the parts of a building are by the cornerstones; and when they are graceful and beautiful both in body and mind they are then polished after the similitude of a nice structure. When we see our daughters well-established and stayed with wisdom and discretion—when we see them by faith united to Christ—when we see them purified and consecrated to God as living temples, we think ourselves happy in them. He prays for a growing estate with a growing family. First, That their storehouses might be well-replenished with the fruits and products of the earth: that, having abundance, we may be thankful to God, generous to our friends, and charitable to the poor. Secondly, That their flocks might greatly increase: That our sheep may bring forth thousands, and ten thousands, in our folds. Much of the wealth of their country consisted in their flocks. Thirdly, That their beasts designed for service might be fit for it: That our oxen may be strong to labour in the plough. "Let not our enemies break in upon us; let us not have occasion to march out against them." War brings with it abundance of mischiefs, whether it be offensive or defensive. Let there be no oppression nor faction—no complaining in our streets, that the people may have no cause to complain either of their government or of one another. It is desirable thus to dwell in quiet habitations. His reflection upon this description of the prosperity of the nation, which he so much desired (v. 15): Happy are the people that are in such a case (but it is seldom so, and never long so), yea, happy are the people whose God is the Lord.

PSALM CXLV

The five foregoing psalms were all of a piece, all full of prayers; this, and the five that follow it to the end of the book, are all of a piece too, all full of praises. And it is observable, 1. That after five psalms of prayer follow six psalms of praise; for those that are much in prayer shall not want matter for praise, and those that have sped in prayer must abound in praise. Our thanksgivings for mercy, when we have received it, should even exceed our supplications for it when we were in pursuit of it. 2. That the book of Psalms concludes with psalms of praise, all praise, for praise is the conclusion of the whole matter; it is that in which all the psalms centre. And it intimates that God's people, towards the end of their life, should abound much in praise, and the rather because, at the end of their life, they hope to remove to the world of everlasting praise, and the nearer they come to heaven the more they should accustom themselves to the work of heaven. This is one of those psalms which are composed alphabetically (as Ps. xxv and xxxiv, &c), that it might be the more easily committed to memory, and kept in mind. The Jewish writers justly extol this psalm as a star of the first magnitude in this bright constellation; and some of them have an extravagant saying concerning it, not much unlike some of the popish superstitions, That whosoever will sing this psalm constantly three times a day shall certainly be happy in the world to come. In this psalm, I. David engages himself and others to praise God, ver. 1, 2, 4–7, 10–12. II. He fastens upon those things that are proper matter for praise, God's greatness (ver. 3), his goodness (ver. 8, 9), the proofs of both in the administration of his kingdom (ver. 13), the kingdom of providence (ver. 14–16), the kingdom of grace (ver. 17–20), and then he concludes with a resolution to continue praising God (ver. 21).

David's psalm of praise.

Verses 1–9

The entitling of this David's psalm of praise may intimate that he took a particular pleasure in it and sung it often; it was his companion wherever he went. In this former part of the psalm God's glorious attributes are praised, as, in the latter part of the psalm, his kingdom and the administration of it.

I. Who shall be employed in giving glory to God. Whatever others do, the psalmist will himself be much in praising God. It was his duty; it was his delight. He would give glory to God, not only in his solemn devotions, but in his common conversation. He will be constant to this work: Every day will I bless thee. No day must pass, though ever so busy a day, though ever so sorrowful a day, without praising God. God is every day blessing us, doing well for us; there is therefore reason that we should be every day blessing him, speaking well of him. He doubts not but others also would be forward to this work. David's zeal would provoke many, and it has done so. They shall keep it up in an uninterrupted succession (v. 4): "One generation shall praise thy works to another."

II. What we must give to God the glory of: his greatness and his great works. We must declare, Great is the Lord, and, if great, then greatly to be praised, with all that is within us, to the utmost of our power. His greatness indeed cannot be comprehended. When we cannot, by searching, find the bottom, we must sit down at the brink, and adore the depth, Rom. xi. 33. We must see God acting and working in all the affairs of this lower world.

His goodness is his glory, Exod. xxxiii. 19. They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness, v. 7. It can never be exhausted, for he ever will be as rich in mercy as he ever was. But, whenever we utter God's great goodness, we must not forget, at the same time, to sing of his righteousness; for, as he is gracious in rewarding those that serve him faithfully, so he is righteous in punishing those that rebel against him. There is a fountain of goodness in God's nature (v. 8): The Lord is gracious to those that serve him; he is full of compassion to those that need him, slow to anger to those that have offended him, and of great mercy to all that seek him and sue to him. He is ready to give, and ready to forgive.

Verse 10–21

The greatness and goodness of God were celebrated in the former part of the psalm; in these verses we are taught to give him the glory of his kingdom, in the administration of which his greatness and goodness shine so clearly, so very brightly. Praise is expected (v. 10): All God's works shall praise him. All God's works do praise him, as the beautiful building praises the builder or the well-drawn picture praises the painter; but the saints bless him as the children of prudent tender parents rise up and call them blessed.

They shall speak of thy kingdom. His kingdom is great indeed, for all the kings and kingdoms of the earth are under his control. The courts of Solomon and Ahasuerus were magnificent; but, compared with the glorious majesty of God's kingdom, they were but as glow-worms to the sun. When they speak of the glory of God's kingdom they must talk of his power (v. 11); and, as a proof of it, let them make known his mighty acts (v. 12). Note the perpetuity of it, v. 13. The thrones of princes totter, and the flowers of their crowns wither, monarchies come to an end; but, Lord, thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom. His royal style and title are, The Lord God, gracious and merciful; and his government answers to his title. The goodness of God appears in what he does, for all the creatures in general (v. 15, 16): He provides food for all flesh. All the creatures live upon God, and, as they had their being from him at first, so on him they depend for the continuance of it. The inferior creatures indeed have not the knowledge of God, nor are capable of it, and yet they are said to wait upon God, because they seek their food according to the instinct which the God of nature has put into them. Thou givest them their meat in due season. The children of men, in particular, he governs as reasonable creatures. In all the acts of government he is just, injurious to none, but administering justice to all. The ways of the Lord are equal, though ours are unequal. He supports those that are sinking, and it is his honour to help the weak, v. 14. He upholds all that fall, in that, though they fall, they are not utterly cast down. If those who were bowed down by oppression and affliction are raised up, it was God that raised them. And, with respect to all those that are heavy-laden under the burden of sin, if they come to Christ by faith, he will ease them, he will raise them. He is very ready to hear and answer the prayers of his people, v. 18, 19. In this appears the grace of his kingdom, that his subjects have not only liberty, of petitioning but all the encouragement that can be to petition. It was said (v. 16) that he satisfies the desire of every living thing, much more will he fulfil the desire of those that fear him; for he that feeds his birds will not starve his babes. He will hear their call and will save them; that is hearing them to purpose, as he heard David (that is, saved him) from the horn of the unicorn, xxii. 21. He will hear and help us if we worship and serve him with a holy awe of him. In all devotions inward impressions must be answerable to the outward expressions, else they are not performed in truth. He takes those under his special protection who have confidence in him (v. 20): The Lord preserves all those that love him. The psalmist concludes (v. 21): My mouth shall speak the praise of the Lord. When we have said what we can, in praising God, still there is more to be said. As the end of one mercy is the beginning of another, so should the end of one thanksgiving be. While I have breath to draw, my mouth shall still speak God's praises. Let all flesh, all mankind, bless his holy name for ever and ever.

PSALM CXLVI

This and the rest of the psalms that follow begin and end with Hallelujah, a word which puts much of God's praise into a little compass; in it we praise him by his name Jah, the contraction of Jehovah. I. The psalmist engages himself to praise God, ver. 1, 2. II. He engages others to trust in him, which is one way of praising him. 1. He shows why we should not trust in men, ver. 3, 4. 2. Why we should trust in God (ver. 5), because of his power in the kingdom of nature (ver. 6), his dominion in the kingdom of providence (ver. 7), and his grace in the kingdom of the Messiah (ver. 8, 9), that everlasting kingdom (ver. 10), to which many of the Jewish writers refer this psalm.

Verses 1–4

David, himself a prince, considered his dignity as so far from excusing him from praise that it rather obliged him to lead in it; therefore he stirred up himself to it: Praise the Lord, O my soul! and he resolved to abide by it: "I will praise him with my heart, I will sing praises to him as the Lord, infinitely blessed and glorious in himself, and as my God, in covenant with me." It might be thought that he himself, having been so great a blessing to his country, should be adored, according to the usage of the heathen nations, who deified their heroes, that they should all come and trust in his shadow. "No," says David, "Put not your trust in princes (v. 3), not in me, not in any other; do not repose your confidence in them. Be not too sure of their constancy and fidelity; it is possible they may both change their minds and break their words." We cannot be sure of their continuance. Suppose he has it in his power to help us while he lives, yet he may be suddenly taken off when we expect most from him (v. 4). Princes are mortal, as well as other men, and therefore we cannot have that assurance of help from them which we may have from that Potentate who hath immortality.

Verses 5–10

The psalmist encourages us to put our confidence in God: Happy is he that has the God of Jacob for his help, whose hope is in the Lord his God. Those shall have God for their help who take him for their God, and serve and worship him, have their hope in him, and live a life of dependence upon him. Every believer may look upon him as the God of Jacob, of the church in general, and therefore may expect relief from him, in reference to public distresses, and as his God in particular, and therefore may depend upon him in all personal wants and straits. Dr. Hammond quotes one of the rabbis, who says of v. 10 that it belongs to the days of the Messiah. And that it does so he thinks will appear by comparing v. 7, 8, with the characters Christ gives of the Messiah (Matt. xi. 5, 6), The blind receive their sight, the lame walk; and the closing words there, Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me, he thinks may very well be supposed to refer to v. 5. The Lord our God is the Maker of the world, and therefore has all power in himself, and the command of the powers of all the creatures (v. 6). It is very applicable to Christ, by whom God made the world, and without whom was not anything made that was made. It is a great support to faith that the Redeemer of the world is the same that was the Creator of it, and therefore has a goodwill to it. He is a God of inviolable fidelity. Our Lord Jesus is the Amen, the faithful witness, as well as the beginning, the author and principle, of the creation of God, Rev. iii. 14. He is the patron of injured innocency: He pleads the cause of the oppressed, and (as we read it) he executes judgment for them. The Messiah came to rescue the children of men out of the hands of Satan the great oppressor, and, all judgment being committed to him, the executing of judgment upon persecutors is so among the rest, Jude 15. He is a bountiful benefactor to the necessitous: He gives food to the hungry; so God does in an ordinary way for the answering of the cravings of nature; so he has done sometimes in an extraordinary way, as when ravens fed Elijah; so Christ did more than once when he fed thousands miraculously. This encourages us to hope in him as the nourisher of our souls with the bread of life. He is the author of liberty to those that were bound: The Lord looseth the prisoners. He brought Israel out of the house of bondage in Egypt and afterwards in Babylon. The miracles Christ wrought, in making the dumb to speak and the deaf to hear with that one word, Ephphatha—Be opened, his cleansing lepers, and so discharging them from their confinement, and his raising the dead out of their graves, may all be included in this one of loosing the prisoners; and we may take encouragement from those to hope in him for that spiritual liberty which he came to proclaim, Isa. lxi. 1, 2. He gives sight to those that have been long deprived of it: The Lord can open the eyes of the blind, and has often given to his afflicted people to see that comfort which before they were not aware of; witness Gen. xxi. 19, and the prophet's servant, 2 Kings vi. 17. But this has special reference to Christ; for since the world began was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind till Christ did it (John ix. 32) and thereby encouraged us to hope in him for spiritual illumination. He raises those that are bowed down by supporting them under their burdens, and, in due time, removing their burdens. This was literally performed by Christ when he made a poor woman straight that had been bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself (Luke xiii. 12); and he still does it by his grace, giving rest to those that were weary and heavily laden, and raising up with his comforts those that were humbled and cast down. The Lord loveth the righteous. He has a tender concern for those that stand in special need of his care: The Lord preserves the strangers. It is the glory of the Messiah that he will subvert all the counsels of hell and earth that militate against his church. His kingdom shall continue through all the revolutions of time, to the utmost ages of eternity, v. 10. Let this encourage us to trust in God at all times that the Lord shall reign for ever, in spite of all the malignity of the powers of darkness, even thy God, O Zion! unto all generations.

PSALM CXLVII

This is another psalm of praise. Some think it was penned after the return of the Jews from their captivity; but what is said ver. 2, 13, may well enough be applied to the first building and fortifying of Jerusalem, and the gathering in of those that had been outcasts in Saul's time. The Septuagint divides it into two; but both of the same import. I. We are called upon to praise God, ver. 1, 7, 12. II. We are furnished with matter for praise, for God is to be glorified, 1. As the God of nature, ver. 4, 5, 8, 9, 15–18. 2. As the God of grace, ver. 3, 6, 10, 11. 3. As the God of Israel, Jerusalem, and Zion, settling their civil state (ver. 2, 13, 14), and especially settling religion among them, ver. 19, 20.

Verses 1–11

I. The duty of praise is recommended to us. We are called to it again and again: Praise you the Lord (v. 1), and again (v. 7), Sing unto the Lord with thanksgiving, sing praise upon the harp to our God (let all our praises be directed to him and centre in him), for it is good to do so; it is our duty, and therefore good in itself. In giving honour to God we really do ourselves a great deal of honour.

II. God is the proper object of our praises. Is Jerusalem to be raised out of small beginnings? Is it to be recovered out of its ruins? In both cases, The Lord builds up Jerusalem. The gospel-church, the Jerusalem that is from above, is of his building. Are any of his people outcasts? Have they made themselves so by their own folly? He gathers them by giving them repentance and bringing them again into the communion of saints. They are broken in heart, humbled, and troubled, for sin, inwardly pained at the remembrance of it. Their very hearts are rent, under the sense of the dishonour they have done to God and the injury they have done to themselves by sin. To those whom God heals with the consolations of his Spirit he speaks peace. The stars are innumerable, but he calleth them all by their names. They are his servants, he musters them; they come and go at his bidding, and all their motions are under his direction. He mentions this as one instance of many, to show that great is our Lord and of great power (he can do what he pleases), and of his understanding there is no computation. Man's knowledge is soon drained. But God's knowledge is a depth that can never be fathomed. The Lord lifts up the meek, who abase themselves before him, and whom men trample on; but the wicked, who conduct themselves insolently towards God and scornfully towards all mankind, who lift themselves in pride and folly, he casteth down to the ground. Though he is so great as to command the stars, he is so good as not to forget even the fowls v. 8, 9. He covereth the heaven with clouds. Clouds look melancholy, and yet without them we could have no rain and consequently no fruit. Thus afflictions, for the present, look black, and dark, and unpleasant, but from these clouds of affliction come those showers that make the harvest to yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness (Heb. xii. 11). By the rain which distils on the earth he makes grass to grow upon the mountains, even the high mountains, which man neither takes care of nor reaps the benefit of. This grass he gives to the beast for his food, the beast of the mountains which runs wild, which man makes no provision for. And even the young ravens, which, being forsaken by their old ones, cry, are heard by him, and ways are found to feed them. God will delight to honour, not the strength of armies, but the strength of grace. He delighteth not in the strength of the horse, the warhorse, nor in infantry, for he taketh no pleasure in the legs of a man. If one king, making war with another king, goes to God to pray for success, it will not avail him to plead, "Lord, I have a gallant army, the horse and foot in good order." But God is pleased to own the strength of grace. The Lord accepts and takes pleasure in those that fear him and that hope in his mercy. Our fear must save our hope from swelling into presumption, and our hope must save our fear from sinking into despair.

Jerusalem, and Zion, the holy city, the holy hill, are here called upon to praise God, v. 12. Jerusalem and Zion must praise God, 1. For their common safety. They had gates, and kept their gates barred in times of danger; but that would not have been an effectual security to them if God had not strengthened the bars of their gates and fortified their fortifications. 2. For the increase of their people. This strengthens the bars of the gates as much as anything. 3. For the public tranquillity, that they were delivered from the terrors and desolations of war: He makes peace in thy borders, by putting an end to the wars that were, and preventing the wars that were threatened and feared. 4. For great plenty, the common effect of peace: He filleth thee with the finest of the wheat. Canaan abounded with the best wheat (Deut. xxxii. 14) and exported it to the countries abroad, as appears, Ezek. xxvii. 17. The land of Israel was not enriched with precious stones nor spices, but with the finest of the wheat, with bread, which strengthens man's heart. He that protects Zion and Jerusalem is that God of power from whom all the powers of nature are derived and on whom they depend. As the world was at first made, so it is still upheld and governed, by a word of almighty power. God speaks and it is done. With him are the treasures of the snow and the hail (Job xxxviii. 22, 23), and out of these treasures he draws as he pleases. It falls silently, and makes no more noise than the fall of a lock of wool; it covers the earth, and keeps it warm like a fleece of wool, and so promotes its fruitfulness. God can work by contraries, and bring meat out of the eater, can warm the earth with cold snow. When he pleases (v. 18) he sends out his word and melts them; the frost, the snow, the ice, are all dissolved quickly, in order to which he causes the wind, the south wind, to blow, and the waters, which were frozen, flow again as they did before. This thawing word may represent the gospel of Christ, and this thawing wind the Spirit of Christ (for the Spirit is compared to the wind, John iii. 8); both are sent for the melting of frozen souls. Converting grace, like the thaw, softens the heart that was hard, moistens

it, and melts it into tears of repentance; it warms good affections, and makes them to flow, which, before, were chilled and stopped up. It is very evident, and yet how it is done is unaccountable: such is the change wrought in the conversion of a soul, when God's word and Spirit are sent to melt it and restore it to itself. Jacob and Israel had God's statutes and judgments among them. They were under his peculiar government; the municipal laws of their nation were of his framing and enacting, and their constitution was a theocracy. They had the benefit of divine revelation; the great things of God's law were written to them. They did not find out God's statutes and judgments of themselves, but God showed his word unto Jacob, and by that word he made known to them his statutes and judgments. Other nations had plenty of outward good things; some nations were very rich, others had pompous powerful princes and polite literature, but none were blessed with God's statutes and judgments as Israel were. Let Israel therefore praise the Lord in the observance of these statutes.

PSALM CXLVIII

This psalm is a most solemn and earnest call to all creatures, according to their capacity, to praise their Creator, and to show forth his eternal power and Godhead, the invisible things of which are manifested in the things that are seen. Thereby the psalmist is very desirous that he may be more praised, and therefore does all he can to engage all about him, and all who shall come after him, whose hearts must be very dead and cold if they be not raised, in praising God, by the lofty flights of divine poetry which we find in this psalm. I. He calls upon the creatures that are placed in the upper world, to praise the Lord, both those that are intellectual beings, and are capable of doing it actively (ver. 1, 2), and those that are not, and are therefore capable of doing it only objectively, ver. 3–6. II. He calls upon the creatures of this lower world, both those that can only minister matter of praise (ver. 7–10), and those that, being endued with reason, are capable of offering up this sacrifice (ver. 11–13), especially his own people, who have more cause to do it than any other, ver. 14.

We, in this dark and depressed world, know but little of the world of light and exaltation. But this we know,

I. That there is above us a world of blessed angels by whom God is praised, an innumerable company of them. The psalmist has an eye here, v. 1, 2, to the heavens, to the heights. The heavens are the heights, and therefore we must lift up our souls above the world unto God in the heavens, and on things above we must set our affections. It is his delight to think that God is praised in the heights. When, in singing this psalm, we call upon the angels to praise God (as we did, ciii. 20), we mean that we desire God may be praised by the ablest hands and in the best manner, that we have a spiritual communion with those that dwell in his house above, and that we have come by faith, and hope, and holy love, to the innumerable company of angels, Heb. xii. 22.

II. That there is above us not only an assembly of blessed spirits, but a system of vast bodies too, and those bright ones, in which God is praised. There are the sun, moon, and stars, which continually, either day or night, present themselves to our view, as looking-glasses, in which we may see a faint shadow (for so I must call it, not a resemblance) of the glory of him that is the Father of lights, v. 3. The heavens of heavens are the Lord's (cxv. 16) and yet they cannot contain him, 1 Kings viii. 27. The Chaldee paraphrase reads it, Praise him, you heavens of heavens, and you waters that depend on the word of him who is above the heavens.[n] Let them praise the name of the Lord, that is, let us praise the name of the Lord for them, and observe what constant and fresh matter for praise may be fetched from them. He commanded them (great as they are) out of nothing, and they were created at a word's speaking. He still upholds and preserves them (v. 6): He hath established them for ever and ever, that is, to the end of time, a short ever, but it is their ever; they shall last as long as there is occasion for them.

Even in this world God is praised: Praise you the Lord from the earth, v. 7.

I. Even those creatures that are not dignified with the powers of reason are summoned into this concert, because God may be glorified in them, v. 7–10. Let the dragons or whales, that sport themselves in the mighty waters (civ. 26), dance before the Lord, to his glory. All deeps, and their inhabitants, praise God. Out of the depths God may be praised. There are fiery meteors; lightning is fire. There are watery meteors, hail, and snow, and the vapours of which they are gendered. There are stormy winds; be they ever so strong, so stormy, they fulfil God's word; and by this Christ showed himself to have a divine power, that he commanded even the winds and the seas, and they obeyed him. There are mountains and all hills, from which we may fetch matter for praise; there are plants, some exalted by their usefulness, as the fruitful trees, for the fruits of which God is to be praised, others by their stateliness, as all cedars, those trees of the Lord, civ. 16. In the animal kingdom we find God glorified, even by the beasts that run wild, and all cattle that are tame and in the service of man, v. 10. Even the creeping things have not sunk so low, nor do the flying fowl soar so high, as not to be called upon to praise the Lord. Much of the wisdom, power, and goodness of the Creator appears in the several capacities and instincts of the creatures, in the provision made for them and the use made of them. Surely we cannot but acknowledge God with wonder and thankfulness.

II. Much more those creatures that are dignified with the powers of reason ought to employ them in praising God: Kings of the earth and all people, v. 11, 12. God is to be praised in the order and constitution of kingdoms, the pars imperans—the part that commands, and the pars subdita—the part that is subject: Kings of the earth and all people. God is to be praised also in the constitution of families, for he is the founder of them; and for all the comfort of relations, the comfort that parents and children, brothers and sisters, have in each other, God is to be praised. Let all manner of persons praise God. Those on whom God has put honour must honour him with it, and the power they are entrusted with puts them in a capacity of bringing more glory to God and doing him more service than others. Yet the praises of the people are expected also. Christ despised not the hosannas of the multitude. Young men and maidens, let them turn their mirth into this channel. Old men must not think that either the gravity or the infirmity of their age will excuse them from it; and children too must begin betimes to praise God. His glory is above both the earth and the heaven, and let all the inhabitants both of earth and heaven praise him and yet acknowledge his name to be exalted far above all blessing and praise.

III. Most of all his own people, who are dignified with peculiar privileges, must in a peculiar manner give glory to him, v. 14. They had him nigh to them in all that which they called upon him for. This blessing has now come upon the Gentiles, through Christ, for those that were afar off are by his blood made nigh, Eph. ii. 13. Let those whom God honours honour him.

PSALM CXLIX

The foregoing psalm was a hymn of praise to the Creator; this is a hymn of praise to the Redeemer. It is a psalm of triumph in the God of Israel, and over the enemies of Israel. Some conjecture that it was penned when David had taken the stronghold of Zion, and settled his government there. But it looks further, to the kingdom of the Messiah, who goes forth conquering and to conquer. I. Abundance of joy to all the people of God, ver. 1–5. II. Abundance of terror to the proudest of their enemies, ver. 6–9.

I. The calls given to God's Israel to praise. All his works were, in the foregoing psalm, excited to praise him; but here his saints in a particular manner are required to bless him. Israel in general, the body of the church (v. 2), the children of Zion particularly, the inhabitants of that holy hill, who are nearer to God than other Israelites; those that have the word and ordinances of God near to them, are justly expected to do more in praising God than others. All true Christians may call themselves the children of Zion, for in faith and hope we have come unto Mount Zion, Heb. xii. 22. Let Israel rejoice, and the children of Zion be joyful, and the saints be joyful in glory. Much of the power of godliness in the heart consists in making God our chief joy and solacing ourselves in him; and ourfaith in Christ is described by our rejoicing in him. We must sing a new song, sing with new affections, which make the song new, though the words have been used before. The gospel-canon for psalmody is to sing with the spirit and with the understanding. We must praise God in public, in the solemn assembly (v. 1), in the congregation of saints. Thus God's name must be owned before the world. We must praise him in private. Let the saints be so transported with their joy in God as to sing aloud upon their beds, when they awake in the night, full of the praises of God, as David, cxix. 62.

II. The cause given to God's Israel for praise. He gave us our being as men, and we have reason to praise him for that, for it is a noble and excellent being. He gave Israel their being as a people, as a church. If he made them, he is their King; he that gave being no doubt may give law. He is a king that rules by love, and therefore to be praised; for the Lord takes pleasure in his people, in their services, in their prosperity, in communion with them, and in the communications of his favour to them. He has prepared for their future glory: He will beautify the meek, the lowly, and contrite in heart, that are patient under their afflictions and show all meekness towards all men. They shall appear comely, before all the world, with the comeliness that he puts upon them. The righteous shall be beautified in that day when they shine forth as the sun. In the hopes of this, let them now, in the darkest day, sing a new song.

Verses 6–9

The Israel of God are here represented triumphing over their enemies, which is both the matter of their praise (let them give to God the glory of those triumphs) and the recompence of their praise; those that are truly thankful to God for their tranquillity shall be blessed with victory. The many victories over the nations of Canaan and other nations that were devoted to destruction began in Moses and Joshua, who, when they taught Israel the high praises of the Lord, did withal put a two-edged sword in their hand; David did so too, for he was the captain of their hosts, and taught the children of Judah the use of the bow (2 Sam. i. 18). They executed vengeance upon the heathen (the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, and others, 2 Sam. viii. 1, &c.) and punishments upon the people, for all the wrong they had done to God's people, v. 7. Their kings and nobles were taken prisoners (v. 8). Some apply it to the time of the Maccabees, when the Jews sometimes gained great advantages against their oppressors. And if it seem strange that the meek should, notwithstanding that character, be thus severe, they do not do it from any personal malice and revenge, or any bloody politics that they govern themselves by, but by commission from God, according to his direction, and in obedience to his command. But, since now no such special commissions can be produced, this will by no means justify the violence either of subjects against their princes or of princes against their subjects, or both against their neighbours, under pretence of religion; for Christ never intended that his gospel should be propagated by fire and sword or his righteousness wrought by the wrath of man. When the high praises of God are in our mouth with them we should have an olive-branch of peace in our hands. Christ's victories are by the power of his gospel and grace over spiritual enemies, in which all believers are more than conquerors. The word of God is the two-edged sword (Heb. iv. 12), the sword of the Spirit (Eph. vi. 17). With this two-edged sword the first preachers of the gospel obtained a glorious victory over the powers of darkness; vengeance was executed upon the gods of the heathen, by the conviction and conversion of those that had been long their worshippers. The strongholds of Satan were cast down (2 Cor. x. 4, 5); great men were made to tremble at the word, as Felix; Satan, the god of this world, was cast out, according to the judgment given against him. With this two-edged sword believers fight against their own corruptions, and, through the grace of God, subdue and mortify them; self, that once sat king, is bound with chains and brought into subjection to the yoke of Christ. This honour have all the saints.

PSALM CL

The first and last of the psalms are both short, and very memorable. But the scope of them is very different. the first psalm is an elaborate instruction in our duty, to prepare us for the comforts of our devotion; this is all rapture and transport, and perhaps was penned on purpose to be the conclusion of these sacred songs. The psalmist had been himself full of the praises of God, and here he would fain fill all the world with them again and again he calls, "Praise the Lord, praise him, praise him," no less than thirteen times in these six short verses. He shows, I. For what God is to be praised, ver. 1, 2. II. How God is to be praised, ver. 3–5. III Who must praise the Lord; it is everyone's business, ver 6.

Verses 1–6

If, as some suppose, this psalm was primarily intended for the Levites, to stir them up in the house of the Lord, as singers and players on instruments, yet we must take it as speaking to us, who are made to our God spiritual priests.

I. This tribute of praise comes, 1. From his sanctuary; praise him there. Let his priests, let his people, attend there with their praises. Where should he be praised, but there where he does, in a special manner, both manifest his glory and communicate his grace? 2. From the firmament of his power. Praise him because of his power and glory which appear in the firmament, its vastness, its brightness, and because of the powerful influences it has upon this earth.

II. Upon what account this tribute of praise is due, 1. The works of his power (v. 2): Praise him for his mighty acts; for his mightinesses (so the word is), for all the instances of his might, the power of his providence, the power of his grace, what he has done in the creation, government, and redemption of the world, for the children of men in general, for his own church and children in particular. 2. The glory and majesty of his being: Praise him according to his excellent greatness. Not that our praises can bear any proportion to God's greatness, for it is infinite. Be not afraid of saying too much in the praises of God, all the danger is of saying too little.

III. In what manner this tribute must be paid, with all the kinds of musical instruments that were then used in the temple-service, v. 3–5. In serving God we should spare no cost nor pains. The best music in God's ears is devout and pious affections, not a melodious string, but a melodious heart. Praise God with a strong faith; praise him with holy love and delight; praise him with an entire confidence in Christ; praise him with a believing triumph over the powers of darkness; praise him by a universal respect to all his commands; praise him by promoting the interests of the kingdom of his grace; praise him by a lively hope and expectation of the kingdom of his glory. Various instruments being used in praising God, it should yet be done with perfect harmony; they must not hinder, but help one another. The New Testament concert, is with one mind and one mouth to glorify God, Rom. xv. 6.

IV. Who must pay this tribute (v. 6): Let everything that has breath praise the Lord. He began with a call to those that had a place in his sanctuary and were employed in the temple-service; but he concludes with a call to all the children of men, in prospect of the time when the Gentiles should be taken into the church, and in every place, as acceptably as at Jerusalem, this incense should be offered, Mal. i. 11. The singing of birds is a sort of praising God. The brutes do in effect say to man, "We would praise God if we could; do you do it for us." Now that the gospel is ordered to be preached to every creature, to every human creature, it is required that every human creature praise the Lord. Prayers are called our breathings, Lam. iii. 56. Let everyone that breathes towards God in prayer, breathe forth his praises too. While we have breath let us praise the Lord, and when death runs us out of breath, we shall remove to a better state to breathe God's praises in a freer better air.

The first three of the five books of psalms (according to the Hebrew division) concluded with Amen and Amen, the fourth with Amen, Hallelujah, but the last, and in it the whole book, concludes with only Hallelujah, because the last six psalms are wholly taken up in praising God and there is not a word of complaint or petition in them. Let us often take a pleasure in thinking what glorified saints are doing in heaven, what those are doing whom we have been acquainted with on earth, but who have gone before us thither; and let it quicken us to do this part of the will of God on earth as those do it that are in heaven. Hallelujah is the word there; let us echo to it now, Hallelujah, praise you the Lord.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE PROVERBS

I. A new author, made use of by the Holy Ghost for making known the mind of God to us, is Solomon; through his hand came this book of Scripture and the two that follow it, Ecclesiastes and Canticles, a sermon and a song. Some think he wrote Canticles when he was very young, Proverbs in the midst of his days, and Ecclesiastes when he was old. 1. He was a king, and a king's son. The penman of scripture, hitherto, were most of them men of rank in the world, as Moses and Joshua, Samuel and David, and now Solomon; but, after him, the inspired writers were generally poor prophets, men of no figure in the world, because that dispensation was approaching in which God would choose the weak and foolish things of the world to confound the wise and mighty and the poor should be employed to evangelize. Solomon was a very rich king, and his dominions were very large, and yet he was a prophet and a prophet's son. 2. He was one whom God endued with extraordinary measures of wisdom and knowledge, in answer to his prayers at his accession to the throne. His prayer was exemplary: Give me a wise and an understanding heart; the answer to it was encouraging: he had what he desires and all other things were added to him. 3. He was one who had his faults, and in his latter end turned aside from those good ways of God. But let those who are most eminently useful take warning by this not to be proud or secure; and let us all learn not to think the worse of good instructions though we have them from those who do not themselves altogether live up to them.

II. A new way of writing, in which divine wisdom is taught us by Proverbs, or short sentences, which contain their whole design within themselves and are not connected with one another. We have had divine laws, histories, and songs, and now divine proverbs; such various methods has Infinite Wisdom used for our instruction. Teaching by proverbs was, 1. An ancient way of teaching. It was the most ancient way among the Greeks; each of the seven wise men of Greece had some one saying that he valued himself upon, and that made him famous. These sentences were inscribed on pillars, and had in great veneration. 2. It was a plain and easy way of teaching. A proverb, which carries both its sense and its evidence in a little compass, is quickly apprehended and easily retained. 3. It was a very profitable way of teaching, and served admirably well to answer the end. The world is governed by proverbs. As saith the proverb of the ancients (1 Sam. xxiv. 13), or (as we commonly express it), As the old saying is, goes very far with most men in forming their notions and fixing their resolves. Some think we may judge of the temper and character of a nation by the complexion of its vulgar proverbs. Yet there are many corrupt proverbs, which tend to debauch men's minds and harden them in sin. The devil has his proverbs, and the world and the flesh have their proverbs, which reflect reproach on God and religion (as Ezek. xii. 22; xviii. 2). These proverbs of Solomon were not merely a collection of the wise sayings that had been formerly delivered, as some have imagined, but were the dictates of the Spirit of God in Solomon. The very first of them (ch. i. 7) agrees with what God said to man in the beginning (Job xxviii. 28, Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom); so that though Solomon was great, and his name may serve as much as any man's to recommend his writings, yet, behold, a greater than Solomon is here. It is God, by Solomon, that here speaks to us. The first nine chapters of this book are reckoned as a preface, by way of exhortation to the study and practice of wisdom's rules. We have then the first volume of Solomon's proverbs (ch. x—xxiv); after that a second volume (ch. xxv—xxix); and then Agur's prophecy (ch. xxx) and Lemuel's, ch. xxxi.

CHAP. I

Those who read David's psalms, especially those towards the latter end, would be tempted to think that religion is all rapture and consists in nothing but the ecstasies and transports of devotion; and doubtless there is a time for them; but, while we are on earth we have a life to live in the flesh, must have a conversation in the world, and into that we must now be taught to carry our religion, which is a rational thing, and very serviceable to the government of human life, to make the face shine before men, in a prudent, honest, useful conversation, and to make the heart burn towards God in holy and pious affections. In this chapter we have, I. The title of the book, showing the general scope and design of it, ver. 1–6. II. The first principle of it recommended to our serious consideration, ver. 7–9. III. A necessary caution against bad company, ver. 10–19. IV. A faithful and lively representation of wisdom's reasonings with the children of men, and the certain ruin of those who turn a deaf ear to those reasonings, ver. 20–33.

Verses 1–6

An introduction to this book, which some think was prefixed by the collector Ezra; but it is rather supposed to have been penned by Solomon himself, who, in the beginning of his book, proposes his end in writing it.

I. Who wrote these wise sayings, v. 1. They are the proverbs of Solomon. His name signifies peaceable, and the character both of his spirit and of his reign were peaceable. David, whose life was full of troubles, wrote a book of devotion; for is any afflicted? let him pray. Solomon, who lived quietly, wrote a book of instruction; for when the churches had rest they were edified. In times of peace we should learn ourselves, and teach others, that which in troublous times we must practise. He was the son of David. He had been blessed with a good education, and many a prayer had been put up for him (Ps. lxxii. 1), the effect of both appeared in his wisdom and usefulness. He was king of Israel. All the earth sought to Solomon to hear his wisdom (1 Kings iv. 30; x. 24). His servants had collected 3000 proverbs of his, but these, of his own writing, do not amount to a thousand. In these he was divinely inspired.

II. They were written (v. 2–4) for the use and benefit of all. This book will help us, 1. To form right notions of things, and to possess our minds with clear and distinct ideas, that we may know both how to speak and act wisely. 2. To distinguish between truth and falsehood, good and evil—to perceive the words of understanding. 3. To order our conversation aright, v. 3. This book will give that knowledge which will dispose us to render to all their due, to God the things that are God's, in all the exercises of religion, and to all men what is due to them.

III. They are of use to all, but are designed especially, 1. For the simple, to give subtlety to them. The instructions here given are plain, and those are likely to receive benefit by them who are sensible of their own ignorance and their need to be taught, and those who receive these instructions, though they be simple, will hereby be made subtle, to know the sin they should avoid and the duty they should do. 2. For young people, to give them knowledge and discretion. Youth is the learning age, receives impressions, and retains what is then received. Youth is rash, and heady, and inconsiderate; man is born like the wild ass's colt, and therefore needs to be broken by the restraints and managed by the rules we find here. Solomon had an eye to posterity in writing this book, hoping by it to season the minds of the rising generation with the generous principles of wisdom and virtue. Those who are young and simple may by them be made wise, and are not excluded from Solomon's school, as they were from Plato's, v. 5, 6. Even wise men must hear, and not think themselves too wise to learn. A wise man, by increasing in learning, is profitable to others, 1. As a counsellor. A man of understanding in these precepts of wisdom, shall by degrees attain unto wise counsels; he shall come to sit at the helm, so the word signifies. Those whom God has blessed with wisdom must study to do good with it. It is more dignity indeed to be counsellor to the prince, but it is more charity to be counsellor to the poor. 2. As an interpreter (v. 6)—to understand a proverb. Solomon was himself famous for expounding riddles and resolving hard questions, which was of old the celebrated entertainment of the eastern princes. Here he undertakes to furnish his readers with that talent. "They shall understand a proverb, even the interpretation, without which the proverb is a nut uncracked; when they hear a wise saying, though it be figurative, they shall take the sense of it, and know how to make use of it."

Verses 7–9

Solomon, having undertaken to teach a young man knowledge and discretion, here lays down two general rules, to fear God and honour his parents.

I. Let them have regard to God as their supreme.

1. He lays down this truth, that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge (v. 7); it is the principal part of knowledge (so the margin). We are not qualified to profit by the instructions that are given us unless our minds be possessed with a holy reverence of God, and every thought within us be brought into obedience to him.

2. To confirm this truth, he observes, Fools (atheists, who have no regard to God) despise wisdom and instruction. Those are fools who do not fear God and value the scriptures; and though they may pretend to be admirers of wit they are really strangers and enemies to wisdom.

II. Let them have regard to their parents (v. 8, 9): My son, hear the instruction of thy father. He means, not only that he would have his own children to be observant of him, nor only that he would have his pupils to look upon him as their father and attend to his precepts, but that he would have all children to be dutiful and respectful to their parents.

1. He takes it for granted that parents will, with all the wisdom they have, instruct their children, and, with all the authority they have, give law to them for their good. They are reasonable creatures, and when we tell them what they must do we must tell them why. But they are wilful, and therefore with the instruction there is need of a law.

2. He charges children both to receive and to retain the good lessons and laws their parents give them. "Hear the instruction of thy father, and be thankful for it, and subscribe to it. Forsake not their law; think not that when thou art grown up, and no longer under tutors and governors, thou mayest live at large; no, the law of thy mother was according to the law of thy God, and therefore it must never be forsaken." Some observe that whereas the laws of the Persians and Romans, provided only that children should pay respect to their father, the divine law secures the honour of the mother also. "The instructions and laws of thy parents, carefully observed, shall be an ornament of grace unto thy head (v. 9), and shall make thee look as those that wear gold chains about their necks."

Here Solomon gives another general rule to young people to take heed of the snare of bad company (v. 10): "My son, whom I love, and have a tender concern for, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not." Sinners love company in sin; the angels that fell were tempters almost as soon as they were sinners. They do not threaten or argue, but entice with flattery and fair speech. "Consent thou not; and then, though they entice thee, they cannot force thee. Have no fellowship with them." To enforce this caution,

I. He represents the fallacious reasonings which sinners use in their enticements, for the beguiling of unstable souls. He specifies highwaymen, who do what they can to draw others into their gang, v. 11–14. "Come with us (v. 11); let us have thy company." At first they pretend to ask no more; but the courtship rises higher (v. 14): "Cast in thy lot among us; let us resolve to live and die together: and let us all have one purse, that what we get together we may spend merrily together." They thirst after blood, and hate those that are innocent, because by their honesty and industry they shame and condemn them: "Let us therefore lay wait for their blood, and lurk privily for them; they travel unarmed; therefore we shall make easy prey of them. And, O how sweet it will be to swallow them up alive!" (v. 12). They hope to get a good booty by it (v. 13): "We shall find all precious substance by following this trade. What though we venture our necks by it? we shall fill our houses with spoil." They call it precious substance; whereas it is neither substance nor precious; it is a shadow; it is vanity, especially that which is got by robbery, Ps. lxii. 10.

II. He shows the perniciousness of these ways (v. 15): "My son, walk not thou in the way with them; refrain thy foot from their path; do not take example by them, nor do as they do." Consider their way (v. 16): Their feet run to evil, to that which is displeasing to God and hurtful to mankind, for they make haste to shed blood. The way of sin is down-hill; men not only cannot stop themselves, but, the longer they continue in it, the faster they run, and make haste in it. They are plainly told that this wicked way will certainly end in their own destruction, and yet they persist in it. They are like the silly bird, that sees the net spread to take her, and yet she is decoyed into it by the bait, and does not take the warning which her own eyes give her, v. 17. Their greediness of gain hurries them upon those practices which will not suffer them to live out half their days.

Now, though Solomon specifies only the temptation to rob on the highway, yet he intends hereby to warn us against all other evils which sinners entice men to. Such are the ways of the drunkards and unclean.

Verses 20–33

Solomon, having shown how dangerous it is to hearken to the temptations of Satan, here shows how dangerous it is not to hearken to the calls of God.

I. By whom God calls to us—by wisdom. It is wisdom that crieth without. The word is plural—wisdoms, for, as there is infinite wisdom in God, so there is the manifold wisdom of God, Eph. iii. 10. God speaks to the children of men by all the kinds of wisdom. 1. Human understanding is wisdom, the light and law of nature, the powers and faculties of reason, and the office of conscience, Job xxxviii. 36. 2. Civil government is wisdom; magistrates are his vicegerents. 3. Divine revelation is wisdom; all its dictates, all its laws, are wise as wisdom itself. God does, by the written word, by his servants the prophets, and all the ministers of this word, declare his mind to sinners. 4. Christ himself is Wisdom, is Wisdoms, for in him are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and he is the centre of all divine revelation, not only the essential Wisdom, but the eternal Word, by whom God speaks to us and to whom he has committed all judgment. He calls himself Wisdom, Luke vii. 35.

II. He calls to us, 1. Very publicly, that whosoever hath ears to hear may hear. The rules of wisdom are published without in the streets, not in the schools only, or in the palaces of princes, but among the common people that pass and repass in the opening of the gates and in the city. 2. Very pathetically; she cries, she utters her words with all possible clearness and affection. God is desirous to be heard and heeded.

III. What the call of God and Christ is.

1. He reproves sinners for their folly and their obstinately persisting in it, v. 22. In general, they are such as are simple. Simple ones love simplicity. They do foolishly, and are in their element, sporting themselves in their own deceivings and flattering themselves in their wickedness. Scorners delight in scorning, and make a jest of everything that comes in their way. Scoffers at religion are especially meant. Fools hate knowledge. Those are enemies to religion that do not understand it aright. And those are the worst of fools that hate to be instructed. The God of heaven desires the conversion and reformation of sinners and not their ruin, is much displeased with their dilatoriness, he waits to be gracious, and is willing to reason the case with them, v. 22.

2. He invites them to repent and become wise, v. 23. Turn you at my reproof, that is, return to your right mind, turn to God, turn to your duty, turn and live. Those that love simplicity find themselves under a moral impotency to change their own mind and way; they cannot turn by any power of their own. To this God answers, "Behold, I will pour out my Spirit unto you; set yourselves to do what you can, and the grace of God shall work in you both to will and to do that good which, without that grace, you could not do." I will pour out my Spirit unto you. The means of this grace is the word. It is therefore promised, "I will make known my words unto you, not only speak them to you, but give you to understand them."

3. He reads the doom of those that continue obstinate against all these means and methods of grace, v. 24-32. The crime is, in short, rejecting Christ and the offers of his grace, and refusing to submit to the terms of his gospel, which would have saved them both from the curse of the law of God and from the dominion of the law of sin. Christ stretched out his hand to offer them mercy, but they refused and no man regarded. Christ not only reproved them for what they did amiss, but counselled them to do better (those are reproofs of instruction and evidences of love and goodwill), but they set at nought all his counsel as not worth heeding, and would none of his reproof, v. 25. This is repeated (v. 30): "They would none of my counsel, but rejected it with disdain, they despised all my reproof, as if it were all a jest, and not worth taking notice of." They were exhorted to submit to the government of right reason and religion, but they rebelled against both. Reason should not rule them, for they hated knowledge (v. 29), because it discovered to them the evil of their deeds. Religion could not rule them, for they did not choose the fear of the Lord, but chose to walk in the way of their heart and in the sight of their eyes. They would not take the benefit of God's mercy when it was offered them, and therefore justly fall as victims to his justice, ch. xxix. 1. Their calamity will come (v. 26); troubles will come, in mind, in estate, which will convince them of their folly in setting God at a distance. Their fear shall come (the thing they were afraid of shall befall them); it shall come as desolation, as a mighty deluge bearing down all before it; and it shall come as a whirlwind, which suddenly and forcibly drives away all the chaff. Distress and anguish shall come upon them, for they shall see no way to escape, v. 27. Now God pities their folly, but he will then laugh at their calamity (v. 26). Those that ridicule religion will thereby but make themselves ridiculous before all the world. Now God is ready to hear their prayers and to meet them with mercy, if they would but seek to him for it; but then the door will be shut, and they shall cry in vain (v. 28): "Then shall they call upon me when it is too late, Lord, Lord, open to us, but I will not answer, because, when I called, they would not answer." But, ordinarily, while there is life there is room for prayer and hope of speeding, and therefore this must refer to the inexorable justice of the last judgment. They shall eat the fruit of their own way; their wages shall be according to their work. Now they value themselves upon their worldly prosperity; but then that shall help to aggravate their ruin, v. 32. They are now proud of their own security and sensuality; but the ease of the simple (so the margin reads it) shall slay them; the more secure they are the more certain and the more dreadful will their destruction be, and the prosperity of fools shall help to destroy them, by puffing them up with pride, glueing their hearts to the world, furnishing them with fuel for their lusts, and hardening their hearts in their evil ways.

4. He concludes with an assurance of safety and happiness to all those that submit to the instructions of wisdom (v. 33): "Whoso hearkeneth unto me, and will be ruled by me, he shall dwell under the special protection of Heaven, so that nothing shall do him any real hurt. He shall have no disquieting apprehensions of danger; he shall not only be safe from evil, but quiet from the fear of it."

CHAP. II

Solomon, in this chapter, applies himself to those who are willing to be taught; and, I. He shows them that, if they would use the means of knowledge and grace, they should obtain of God the knowledge and grace which they seek, ver. 1–9. II. He shows them what advantage it would be to them. 1. It would preserve them from the snares of evil men (ver. 10–15) and of evil women, ver. 16–19. 2. It would direct them into, and keep them in, the way of good men, ver. 20–22.

Verses 1–9

Solomon tells us where we may find wisdom, and how we may get it.

I. What means we must use that we may obtain wisdom.

1. We must closely attend to the word of God, for that is the word of wisdom, which is able to make us wise unto salvation, v. 1, 2. The words of God are the fountain and standard of wisdom and understanding. Many wise things may be found in human compositions, but divine revelation, and true religion built upon it, are all wisdom.

2. We must be much in prayer, v. 3. We must cry after knowledge. We must lift our voice for understanding, lift it up to heaven; thence these good and perfect gifts must be expected. We must give our voice to understanding (so the word is), speak for it, vote for it, submit the tongue to the command of wisdom.

3. We must be willing to take pains (v. 4); we must seek it as silver, preferring it far before all the wealth of this world, and labouring in search of it as those who dig in the mines.

II. What success we may hope for in the use of these means. Our labour shall not be in vain; for, "Thou shalt understand the fear of the Lord (v. 5), that is, thou shalt know how to worship him aright." Thou shalt find the knowledge of God, which is necessary to our fearing him aright. We shall know how to conduct ourselves aright towards all men (v. 9): "Thou shalt understand, by the word of God, righteousness, and judgment, and equity, shalt learn those principles of justice, and charity, and fair dealing, which shall make thee fit for every relation, and faithful to every trust. It shall give thee not only a right notion of justice, but a disposition to practise it, and to render to all their due."

III. What ground we have to hope for this success in our pursuits of wisdom; we must take our encouragement herein from God only, v. 6–8.

1. God has wisdom to bestow, v. 6. The Lord not only is wise himself, but he gives wisdom.

2. He has blessed the world with a revelation of his will. Out of his mouth, by the law and the prophets, by the written word and by his ministers, come knowledge and understanding, such a discovery of truth and good as will make us truly knowing and intelligent.

3. He has particularly provided that good men, who are sincerely disposed to do his will, shall have that knowledge and that understanding, v. 7, 8. The righteous, and those who walk uprightly, are his saints, devoted to his honour, and set apart for his service. The means of wisdom are given to all, but wisdom itself, sound wisdom, is laid up for the righteous, laid up in Christ their head. The same that is the Spirit of revelation in the word is a Spirit of wisdom in the souls of those that are sanctified. Some read it, He lays up substance for the righteous, not only substantial knowledge, but substantial happiness and comfort, Prov. viii. 21. Even those who walk uprightly may be brought into danger for the trial of their faith, but God is a buckler to them, so that nothing that happens to them shall do them any real hurt. If we depend upon God, and seek to him for wisdom, he will uphold us in our integrity, will enable us to keep the paths of judgment; for he preserves the way of his saints. Work out your salvation, for God works in you.

True wisdom will keep us from the paths of sin, and do us a greater kindness than if it enriched us with all the wealth of the world.

I. Our preservation from the evil of sin, and, consequently, from trouble that attends it. "When wisdom has entire possession of thee, it will keep thee." When it enters into the heart as the leaven into the dough, then it is likely to do us good. "When thou callest the practice of virtue, not a slavery and a task, but liberty and pleasure, then thou wilt find the benefit of it." More particularly, wisdom will preserve us from men of corrupt principles, atheistical profane men, who make it their business to debauch young men's judgments, and instil into their minds prejudices against religion and arguments for vice: "It will deliver thee from the way of the evil man (v. 12), from the way in which he walks, and in which he would persuade thee to walk." They speak froward things; they say all they can against religion. They leave the paths of uprightness, which they were trained up in, to walk in the ways of darkness, which hate the light, in which men are led blindfold by ignorance and error, and which lead men into utter darkness. They take a pleasure in sin, both in committing it themselves and in seeing others commit it (v. 14). They rejoice in an opportunity to do evil. It is sport to fools to do mischief; to see those that are hopeful drawn into the ways of sin, and then to see them hardened and confirmed in those ways. Their ways are crooked, a great many windings and turnings to escape the pursuit of their convictions. Women of corrupt practices lead to fleshly lusts, which defile the body, that living temple, but withal war against the soul. The adulteress is here called the strange woman, to be shunned by every Israelite as if she were a heathen, and a stranger to that sacred commonwealth. She is false to him whom she entices. She speaks fair, tells him how much she admires him above any man, but she flatters with her words; she has no true affection for him, nor any desire of his welfare, any more than Delilah had of Samson's. All she designs is to pick his pocket and gratify a base lust of her own. She is false to her husband, and violates the sacred obligation she lies under to him. She is false to God himself: She forgets the covenant of her God, the marriage-covenant (v. 17), to which God is not only a witness, but a party, for, he having instituted the ordinance, both sides vow to him to be true to each other. Take heed of the sin of whoredom. It is a sin that has a direct tendency to the killing of the soul, the extinguishing of all good affections and dispositions in it. Let discretion preserve every man, not only from the evil woman, but from the evil house, for the house inclines to death; and her paths unto Rephaim, to the giants (so some read it), the sinners of the old world, who, living in luxury and excess of riot, were cut down out of time, and their foundation was overthrown with a flood. None, or next to none, that go unto her, return again. It is very rare that any who are caught in this snare of the devil recover themselves, so much is the heart hardened, and the mind blinded, by the deceitfulness of this sin. Many interpreters think that this caution against the strange woman, besides the literal sense, is to be understood figuratively, as a caution against idolatry, which is spiritual whoredom. Wisdom will keep thee from all familiarity with the worshippers of images. Wisdom will keep thee from being captivated by the carnal mind, and from subjecting the spirit to the dominion of the flesh.

II. This wisdom will be of use to guide and direct us in that which is good (v. 20): That thou mayest walk in the way of good men. It will be our wisdom to walk in that way, to ask for the good old way and walk therein, Jer. vi. 16; Heb. vi. 12; xii. 1. The paths of the righteous are the paths of life. "That thou mayest imitate those excellent persons, the patriarchs and prophets, and be preserved in the paths of those righteous men who followed after them." The upright shall dwell in the land, peaceably and quietly, as long as they live.

CHAP. III

This chapter is one of the most excellent in all this book, both for argument to persuade us to be religious and for directions therein. I. We must be constant to our duty because that is the way to be happy, ver. 1–4. II. We must live a life of dependence upon God because that is the way to be safe, ver. 5. III. We must keep up the fear of God because that is the way to be healthful, ver. 7, 8. IV. We must serve God with our estates because that is the way to be rich, ver. 9, 10. V. We must bear afflictions well because that is the way to get good by them, ver. 11, 12. VI. We must take pains to obtain wisdom because that is the way to gain her, ver. 13–20. VII. We must govern ourselves by the rules of wisdom, of right reason and religion, because that is the way to be easy, ver. 21–26. VIII. We must do all the good we can, and no hurt, to our neighbours, ver. 27–35.

Verses 1–6

A life of communion with God will be of unspeakable advantage.

I. We must have a continual regard to God's precepts, v. 1, 2. Fix God's law, and his commandments, as our rule. Not only our heads, but our hearts, must keep God's commandments. To encourage us to submit ourselves to all the restraints and injunctions of the divine law, we are assured (v. 2) that it is the certain way to long life and prosperity. Even the days of old age shall not be evil days, but days in which thou shalt have pleasure: Peace shall they be continually adding to thee. Great and growing peace have those that love the law.

II. We must have a continual regard to God's promises, which go along with his precepts (v. 3): "Let not mercy and truth forsake thee, God's mercy in promising, and his truth in performing. Bind them about thy neck, as the most graceful ornament." It is the greatest honour we are capable of in this world to have an interest in the mercy and truth of God. "Write them upon the table of thy heart, as dear to thee; take a pleasure in applying them and thinking them over." To encourage us to do this we are assured (v. 4) that this is the way to recommend ourselves both to our Creator and fellow-creatures: So shalt thou find favour and good understanding. A good man seeks the favour of God in the first place. He shall be owned as one of Wisdom's children, and shall have praise with God. He wishes to have favour with men also, to be accepted of the multitude of his brethren (Esther x. 3); they shall understand him aright.

III. We must have a continual regard to God's providence, must depend upon it in all our affairs, both by faith and prayer. We must therefore trust in the Lord with all our hearts (v. 5); we must believe that he is able to do what he will, wise to do what is best, and good, according to his promise, to do what is best for us, if we love him, and serve him. By prayer (v. 6): In all thy ways acknowledge God. We must ask his leave, and not design anything but what we are sure is lawful. We must ask his advice and beg direction from him. We must ask success of him, as those who know the race is not to the swift. For our encouragement to do this, it is promised, "He shall direct thy paths, so that thy way shall be safe and good and the issue happy at last."

Three exhortations, each enforced with a good reason:—

I. We must live in a humble and dutiful subjection to God and his government (v. 7): "Fear the Lord, as your sovereign Lord and Master; be ruled in everything by your religion and subject to the divine will." Be not wise in thy own eyes. There is not a greater enemy to the power of religion, and the fear of God in the heart, than conceitedness of our own wisdom. Fear the Lord, and depart from evil; take heed of doing anything to offend him and to forfeit his care. For our encouragement thus to live in the fear of God it is here promised (v. 8) that it shall be as serviceable even to the outward man as our necessary food. It shall be health to thy navel. It will be strengthening: It shall be marrow to thy bones. The prudence, temperance, and sobriety, the calmness and composure of mind, and the good government of the appetites and passions, which religion teaches, tend very much not only to the health of the soul, but to a good habit of body.

II. We must make a good use of our estates, and that is the way to increase them, v. 9, 10. Honour the Lord with thy substance. Worldly wealth is but poor substance, yet, such as it is, we must honour God with it, and then, if ever, it becomes substantial. We must honour God with our increase. It is meant of the increase of the earth, for we live upon annual products, to keep us in constant dependence on God. God, who is the first and best, must have the first and best of everything. So shall thy barns be filled with plenty. "God shall bless thee with an increase of that which is for use, not for show or ornament—for spending and laying out, not for hoarding and laying up." What we gave we have.

III. We must conduct ourselves aright under our afflictions, v. 11, 12. We must not despise an affliction, be it ever so light and short, as if it were not worth taking notice of, or as if it were not sent on an errand and therefore required no answer. We must not be stocks, and stones, and stoics, under our afflictions, hardening ourselves under them, and concluding we can easily get through them without God. We must not be weary of an affliction, not be dispirited, dispossessed of our own souls, or driven to despair. A divine correction is the chastening of the Lord. It is from God, and therefore we must not be weary of it, for he knows our frame, both what we need and what we can bear. A fatherly correction comes not from his vindictive justice as a Judge, but his wise affection as a Father. The father corrects the son whom he loves, nay, and because he loves him and desires he may be wise and good.

Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, that true wisdom which consists in the knowledge and love of God, and an entire conformity to all his truths, providences, and laws.

I. What it is to find wisdom so as to be made happy by it. He is the happy man who, having found it, makes it his own, who draws out understanding (so the word is). Having it not in himself, he draws it with the bucket of prayer from the fountain of all wisdom, who gives liberally. He takes pains for it, as he does who draws ore out of the mine. That is well got, and to good purpose, that is thus used to good purpose. We read here of the merchandise of wisdom, which intimates, we must make it our business, and not a by-business, as the merchant bestows the main of his thoughts and time upon his merchandise. This is that pearl of great price which, when we have found it, we must willingly sell all for the purchase of, Matt. xiii. 45, 46. Buy the truth (Prov. xxiii. 23); he does not say at what rate, because we must buy it at any rate rather than miss it. It is not enough to lay hold of wisdom, but we must keep our hold, hold it fast, with a resolution never to let it go, but to persevere in the ways of wisdom to the end.

II. The happiness of those who find it is a transcendent happiness, more than can be found in the wealth of this world, if we had ever so much of it, v. 14, 15. All would not purchase heavenly wisdom; it cannot be gotten for gold, Job xxviii. 15, &c. All would not countervail the want of heavenly wisdom nor be the ransom of a soul lost by its own folly. All would not make a man half so happy as those are who have true wisdom, though they have none of all these things. True happiness is inclusive of all those things which are supposed to make men happy, v. 16, 17. Wisdom is here represented as a bright and bountiful queen, reaching forth gifts to her faithful and loving subjects. She offers life in her right hand. Religion puts us into the best methods of prolonging life, and, though our days on earth should be no more than our neighbour's, yet it will secure to us everlasting life in a better world. Riches and honour she reaches out with her left hand. True piety has in it the greatest true pleasure. Her ways are ways of pleasantness. All the enjoyments and entertainments of sense are not comparable to the pleasure which gracious souls have in communion with God and doing good. The way of religion, as it is the right way, so it is a pleasant way; it is smooth and clean, and strewed with roses: All her paths are peace. There is not only peace in the end, but peace in the way. It is the happiness of paradise (v. 18): She is a tree of life. True grace is that to the soul which the tree of life would have been, from which our first parents were shut out for eating of the forbidden tree. Those that feed on this heavenly wisdom shall find an antidote against age and death; they shall eat and live for ever. It is a participation of the happiness of God himself, for wisdom is his everlasting glory and blessedness, v. 19, 20. Happy is the man that finds wisdom, for he will thereby be thoroughly furnished for every good word and work. He has wherewithal to make good all the foregoing promises of long life, riches, and honour; for all the wealth of heaven, earth, and seas, is his.

I. The exhortation is, to have religion's rules always in view and always at heart, v. 21. "My son, let them not depart from thy eyes; let not thy eyes ever depart from them to wander after vanity. Have them always in mind, and as long as thou livest, keep up and cultivate thy acquaintance with them." Have them always at heart; for it is in that treasury, the hidden man of the heart, that we must keep sound wisdom and discretion.

II. The argument to enforce this exhortation is taken from the unspeakable advantage which wisdom, thus kept, will be of to us. "It will be life to thy soul (v. 22); it will quicken thee to thy duty; it will revive thee under thy troubles when thou beginnest to droop and despond. It will be thy spiritual life, an earnest of life eternal." It shall be grace to thy neck, as a chain of gold, or a jewel. Grace to thy jaws (so the word is), grateful to thy taste and relish (so some); it shall infuse grace into all thou sayest (so others), shall furnish thee with acceptable words, which shall gain thee credit. Good people are taken under God's special protection, and are safe and may be easy, v. 23. If our religion be our companion, it will be our convoy: "Then shalt thou walk in thy way safely. The natural life, and all that belongs to it, shall be under the protection of God's providence; the spiritual life, and all its interests, are under the protection of his grace; so that thou shalt be kept from falling into sin or trouble." The way of duty is the way of safety. "We are in danger of falling, but wisdom will keep thee, that thy foot shall not stumble at those things which overthrow many, but which thou shalt know how to get over." By night, v. 24, we lie exposed and are most subject to frights. "But keep up communion with God, and keep a good conscience, and then when thou liest down thou shalt not be afraid of fire, or thieves, or spectres, or any of the terrors of darkness, knowing that when we, and all our friends, are asleep, yet he that keeps Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps." The way to have a good night is to keep a good conscience; and the sleep, as of the labouring man, so of the wise and godly man, is sweet. Integrity and uprightness will preserve us, so that we need not be afraid of sudden fear, v. 25. But let not the wise and good man fear the desolation of the wicked, when it comes, that is, the desolation which the wicked ones make of religion and the religious.

Precepts of wisdom which relate to our neighbour.

I. We must render to all their due, both in justice and charity, and not delay to do it (v. 27, 28): "Withhold not good from those to whom it is due, when it is in the power of thy hand to do it, but it was thy great fault if thou didst, by thy extravagances, disable thyself to do justly and show mercy. If thou hast it by thee today, say not to thy neighbour, Go thy way for this time, and come at a more convenient season, and I will then see what will be done; tomorrow I will give; whereas thou art not sure that thou shalt live till tomorrow, or that tomorrow thou shalt have it by thee. Make not excuses to shift off a duty that must be done, nor delight to keep thy neighbour in pain and in suspense, nor to show the authority which the giver has over the beggar; but readily and cheerfully, and from a principle of conscience towards God, give good to those to whom it is due," to the lords and owners of it (so the word is), to those who upon any account are entitled to it. This requires us, 1. To pay our just debts without fraud or delay. 2. To give wages to those who have earned them. 3. To provide for our relations, and those that have dependence on us, for to them it is due. 4. To render dues both to church and state, magistrates and ministers. 5. To be ready to all acts of friendship and humanity, and in everything to be neighbourly; for these are things that are due by the law of doing as we would be done by. 6. To be charitable to the poor and necessitous.

II. We must never design any hurt or harm to anybody (v. 29): "Devise not evil against thy neighbour; and the rather because he dwells securely by thee, and entertains no jealousy or suspicion of thee, and therefore is off his guard."

III. We must not be quarrelsome and litigious (v. 30): "Do not strive with a man without cause; contend not for that which thou hast no title to; resent not that as a provocation which peradventure was but an oversight. Never trouble thy neighbour with frivolous complaints and accusations, or vexatious law-suits, when thou mightest right thyself in a friendly way." Law must be the last refuge.

IV. We must not envy the prosperity of evil-doers, v. 31. "Envy not the oppressor; though he be rich and great. Choose none of his ways; do not imitate him. Never think of doing as he does, though thou wert sure to get by it all that he has, for it would be dearly bought." Now, to show what little reason saints have to envy sinners, Solomon here, in the last four verses of the chapter, compares the condition of sinners and saints together. Saints are beloved, v. 32. The froward sinners, whose lives are a perverse contradiction to his will, are abomination to the Lord. He that hates nothing that he has made yet abhors those who have thus marred themselves. The righteous therefore have no reason to envy them, for he communicates to them the secret tokens of his love; they know his mind, and the meanings and intentions of his providence, better than others can. Saints are under his blessing, they and their habitation, v. 33. The just have a habitation, a poor cottage (the word is used for sheep-cotes), a very mean dwelling; but God blesses it from the beginning of the year to the end of it. Those who exalt themselves shall certainly be abased: Surely he scorns the scorners. Those who scorn to submit to the discipline of religion, who scoff at godliness and godly people, God will lay them open to scorn before all the world. Those who humble themselves shall be exalted, for he gives grace to the lowly; he works that in them which puts honour upon them and for which they are accepted of God and approved of men. The end of sinners will be everlasting shame, the end of saints endless honour, v. 35.

CHAP. IV

Solomon, in this chapter, with a great variety of expression, inculcates the same things that he had pressed upon us in the foregoing chapters. I. An earnest exhortation to the study of wisdom, that is, of true religion and godliness, borrowed from the good instructions which his father gave him, and enforced with many considerable arguments, ver. 1–13. II. A necessary caution against bad company, ver. 14–19. III. Particular directions for the attaining and preserving of wisdom, and bringing forth the fruits of it, ver. 20–27.

Verses 1–13

I. The invitation which Solomon gives to his children (v. 1, 2): Hear, you children, the instruction of a father. "Let my own children, in the first place, receive those instructions which I set down for the use of others also." Magistrates and ministers are concerned to take a more than ordinary care for the instruction of their own families. Let all young people, in the days of their childhood and youth, take pains to get knowledge and grace, for then their minds are formed and seasoned. He does not say, My children, but You children. Let all that would receive instruction come with the disposition of children, though they be grown persons. Let all prejudices be laid aside, and the mind be as white paper. Let them be dutiful, tractable, and self-diffident, and take the word as the word of a father, which comes both with authority and with affection. We must see it coming from God as our Father in heaven, to whom we pray, from whom we expect blessings, the Father of our spirits. We must look upon our teachers as our fathers, who love us and seek our welfare. We are told (v. 1), not only that it is the instruction of a father, but that it is understanding, and therefore should be welcome to intelligent creatures. Religion has reason on its side, and we are taught it by fair reasoning. It is a law indeed (v. 2), but that law is founded upon unquestionable principles of truth, upon good doctrine, which is worthy of all acceptation. If we admit the doctrine, we cannot but submit to the law.

II. The instructions he gives them. He had them from his parents, and teaches his children the same that they taught him, v. 3, 4. His parents loved him, and therefore taught him: I was my father's son. David had many sons, but Solomon was his son indeed, as Isaac is called (Gen. xvii. 19) and for the same reason, because on him the covenant was entailed. He was tender, and only beloved, in the sight of his mother. Though he was a prince, and heir-apparent to the crown, yet they did not let him live at large; they tutored him. And perhaps David was the more strict with Solomon in his education because he had seen the ill effects of undue indulgence in Adonijah, whom he had not crossed in anything (1 Kings i. 6). What his parents taught him he teaches others. When Solomon was grown up he not only remembered, but took a pleasure in repeating, the good lessons his parents taught him when he was a child. Though Solomon was a wise man himself, and divinely inspired, yet, when he was to teach wisdom, he did not think it below him to quote his father. Those that would teach well, in religion, must not look with contempt upon the knowledge of their predecessors; if we must keep to the good old way, why should we scorn the good old words? Jer. vi. 16. Solomon enforces his exhortations with the authority of his father David, a man famous in his generation. These instructions were, v. 4–13, precept and exhortation. David, in teaching his son, expressed himself with great warmth and importunity, and inculcated the same thing again and again. He recommends to him his Bible, his father's words (v. 4), the words of his mouth (v. 5), his sayings (v. 10), all the good lessons he had taught him; and perhaps he means particularly the book of Psalms, many of which were Maschils—psalms of instruction, and two of them are expressly said to be for Solomon. He must hear and receive them (v. 10). He must hold fast the form of sound words which his father gave him (v. 4): Let thy heart retain my words; and except the word be hid in the heart, lodged in the will and affections, it will not be retained. He must govern himself by them: Keep my commandments. He must stick to them and abide by them: "Decline not from the words of my mouth (v. 5), as fearing they will be too great a check upon thee, but take fast hold of instruction (v. 13), as being resolved to keep thy hold and never let it go." A principle of religion in the heart is the one thing needful; therefore, Get this wisdom, get this understanding, v. 5. And again, "Get wisdom, and, with all thy getting, get understanding, v. 7. Get wisdom by experience, get it above all thy getting; be more in care and take more pains to get this than to get the wealth of this world." True wisdom is God's gift. God gives it to those that labour for it. Forget her not (v. 5), forsake her not (v. 6), let her not go (v. 13) but keep her. Love her (v. 6), and embrace her (v. 8), as worldly men love their wealth and set their hearts upon it. If we cannot be great masters of wisdom, yet let us be true lovers of it; let us embrace it with a sincere affection, as those that admire its beauty. Exalt her, v. 8. Always keep up high thoughts of religion, and do all thou canst to maintain the credit of it among men. Let Wisdom's children not only justify her, but magnify her, honouring those that fear the Lord, though they are low in the world, and in regarding a poor wise man, we exalt wisdom. It is the main matter (v. 7): Wisdom is the principal thing; other things which are solicitous to get and keep are nothing to it. It is that which recommends us to God, which beautifies the soul, which enables us to live to some good purpose in the world, and to get to heaven at last; and therefore it is the principal thing. It has reason and equity on its side (v. 11): "I have taught thee in the way of wisdom, and so it will be found to be at last. I have led thee in right paths, agreeable to the eternal rules and reasons of good and evil." David not only taught his son by good instructions, but led him both by a good example and by applying general instructions to particular cases. Keep my commandments and live, v. 4. That of our Saviour agrees with this, If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments, Matt. xix. 17. "Receive wisdom's sayings, and the years of thy life shall be many (v. 10), as many in this world as Infinite Wisdom sees fit, and in the other world thou shalt live that life the years of which shall never be numbered. Keep her therefore, whatever it cost thee, for she is thy life," v. 13. "Love wisdom, and cleave to her, and she shall preserve thee, she shall keep thee (v. 6) from sin, the worst of evils; she shall keep thee from hurting thyself, and then none else can hurt thee." As we say, "Keep thy shop, and thy shop will keep thee"; so, "Keep thy wisdom, and thy wisdom will keep thee. It will be thy honour and reputation (v. 8): Exalt wisdom and though she needs not thy service she will abundantly recompence it, she shall promote thee, she shall bring thee to honour." This he insists on (v. 9): "She shall give to thy head an ornament of grace in this world, and in the other world a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee, a crown that shall never wither."

Some make David's instructions to Solomon, which began v. 4, to continue to the end of the chapter; but it is more probable that Solomon begins here again. In these verses he cautions us against the path of the wicked.

I. The caution itself, v. 14, 15. We must take heed of falling in with sin and sinners; Enter not into the paths of the wicked. "If, ere thou wast aware, thou didst enter in at the gate, because it was wide, go not on in the way of evil men. As soon as thou art made sensible of thy mistake, retire immediately, take not a step more, stay not a minute longer, in the way that certainly leads to destruction." It intimates likewise at what a distance we should keep from sin and sinners; he does not say, Keep at a due distance, but at a great distance, the further the better; never think you can get far enough from it.

II. The reasons to enforce this caution. "Consider the character of the men whose way thou art warned to shun." They are mischievous men (v. 16, 17). They are continually endeavouring to cause some to fall, to ruin them body and soul. Mischief is rest and sleep to them. Mischief is meat and drink to them; they feed and feast upon it. They eat the bread of wickedness and drink the wine of violence (v. 17). All they eat and drink is got by rapine and oppression. "Shun those that delight to do mischief, for whatever friendship they may pretend, they will do thee mischief; thou wilt ruin thyself if thou dost concur with them (ch. i. 18) and they will ruin thee if thou dost not." The way of righteousness is light (v. 18): The path of the just, which they have chosen, and in which they walk, is as light; the light shines on their ways (Job xxii. 28). Christ is their way and he is the light. They are guided by the word of God and that is a light to their feet; they themselves are light in the Lord and they walk in the light as he is in the light. It is as the morning-light, which shines out of obscurity (Isa. lviii. 8, 10) and puts an end to the works of darkness. It is a growing light; it shines more and more, not like the light of a meteor, which soon disappears, or that of a candle, which burns dim and burns down, but like that of the rising sun, which mounts upward shining. It will arrive, in the end, at the perfect day. The way of sin is as darkness, v. 19. The works he had cautioned us not to have fellowship with are works of darkness. What true pleasure and satisfaction can those have who know no pleasure and satisfaction but what they have in doing mischief? The way of the wicked is dark, and therefore dangerous; for they stumble, and yet know not at what they stumble.

Verses 20–27

Solomon, having warned us not to do evil, here teaches us how to do well.

I. We must have a continual regard to the word of God.

1. The sayings of wisdom must be our principles by which we must govern ourselves, our monitors to warn us of duty and danger; therefore, "Incline thy ear to them (v. 20); humbly bow to them; diligently listen to them." We must retain them carefully (v. 21); we must lay them before us as our rule: "Let them not depart from thy eyes; view them, review them, and in everything aim to conform to them." We must lodge them within us, as a commanding principle: "Keep them in the midst of thy heart, as things dear to thee, and which thou art afraid of losing."

2. The reason why we must thus make much of the words of wisdom is because they will be both food and physic to us, like the tree of life, Rev. xxii. 2. (1) Food: For they are life unto those that find them, v. 22. As the spiritual life was begun by the word, so by the same word it is still nourished and maintained. (2) Physic. They are health to all their flesh, to the whole man, both body and soul; they help to keep both in good plight. They are a medicine to all their flesh (so the word is), to all their corruptions, for they are called flesh. There is in the word of God a proper remedy for all our spiritual maladies.

II. We must keep a watchful eye and a strict hand upon all the motions of our inward man, v. 23. Keep thy heart with all diligence. God, who gave us these souls, gave us a strict charge with them. We must set a strict guard, accordingly, upon all the avenues of the soul; keep our hearts from doing hurt and getting hurt, from being defiled by sin and disturbed by trouble; keep out bad thoughts; keep up good thoughts; keep the affections upon right objects and in due bounds. Keep them with all keepings (so the word is); there are many ways of keeping things—by care, by strength, by calling in help, and we must use them all in keeping our hearts. A good reason is given for this care, because out of it are the issues of life. Out of a heart well kept will flow living issues, good products, to the glory of God and the edification of others.

III. We must set a watch before the door of our lips, that we offend not with our tongue (v. 24): Put away from thee a froward mouth and perverse lips. We must conceive a great detestation of all manner of evil words, cursing, swearing, lying, slandering, brawling, filthiness, and foolish talking, all which come from a froward mouth and perverse lips, that will not be governed either by reason or religion, but contradict both, and which are as unsightly and ill-favoured before God as a crooked distorted mouth drawn awry is before men.

IV. We must make a covenant with our eyes: "Let them look right on and straight before thee, (v. 25). Let the eye be fixed and not wandering; let it not rove after every thing that presents itself, for then it will be diverted from good and ensnared in evil. Let thy intentions be sincere and uniform, and look not asquint at any by-end." We must keep our eye upon our Master, and be careful to approve ourselves to him; keep our eye upon our rule, and conform to that; keep our eye upon our mark, the prize of the high calling, and direct all towards that. Oculum in metam—The eye upon the goal.

V. We must act considerately in all we do (v. 26): Ponder the path of thy feet, weigh it (so the word is); "put the word of God in one scale, and what thou hast done, or art about to do, in the other, and see how they agree. Do nothing rashly."

VI. We must act with steadiness, caution, and consistency: "Let all thy ways be established (v. 26) and be not unstable in them."

CHAP. V

The scope of this chapter is much the same with that of ch. ii. Here is, I. An exhortation to get acquaintance with and submit to the laws of wisdom in general, ver. 2. II. A particular caution against the sin of whoredom, ver. 3–14. III. Remedies prescribed against that sin. 1. Conjugal love, ver. 15–20. 2. A regard to God's omniscience, ver. 21. 3. A dread of the miserable end of wicked people, ver. 22, 23.

I. A solemn preface, to introduce the caution which follows, v. 1, 2. Solomon here addresses himself to his son, that is, to all young men, as unto his children. "It is my wisdom, my understanding; I undertake to teach thee wisdom, which is to be learned in my school." Solomon's lectures are not designed to fill our heads with matters of nice speculation, or doubtful disputation, but to guide us in the government of ourselves.

II. The caution itself is to abstain from fleshly lusts, from adultery, fornication, and all uncleanness. Some apply this figuratively, and by the adulterous woman here understand idolatry, or false doctrine, which tends to debauch men's minds and manners, but the primary scope of it is plainly to warn us against seventh-commandment sins. It is true the lips of a strange woman drop as a honey-comb (v. 3); the kisses of its mouth, the words of its mouth, are smoother than oil, that the poisonous pill may go down glibly and there may be no suspicion of harm in it. But consider: It is bitter as wormwood, v. 4. What was luscious in the mouth rises in the stomach and turns sour there. If some that have been guilty of this sin have repented and been saved, yet the direct tendency of the sin is to destruction of body and soul; the feet of it go down to death, v. 5. Consider how false the charms are. The adulteress flatters and speaks fair, her words are honey and oil, but she will deceive those that hearken to her: Her ways are movable, that thou canst not know them. Proteus-like, she puts on many shapes, that she may keep in with those whom she has a design upon. And what does she aim at with all this art and management? Nothing but to keep them from pondering the path of life, for she knows that, if they once come to do that, she shall certainly lose them. Those are ignorant of Satan's devices who do not understand that the great thing he drives at in all his temptations is to keep them from choosing the path of life, to prevent them from being religious. The caution itself is very pressing (v. 7, 8): "Remove thy way far from her; if thy way should happen to lie near her, change thy way, rather than expose thyself to danger; come not nigh the door of her house; go on the other side of the street, nay, go through some other street, though it be about." Such tinder there is in the corrupt nature that it is madness, upon any pretence whatsoever, to come near the sparks. This sin blasts the reputation. "Thou wilt give thy honour unto others (v. 9); thou wilt lose it thyself; thou wilt put into the hand of each of thy neighbours a stone to throw at thee, for they will cry shame on thee as a foolish man." It wastes the time, gives the years, the years of youth, the flower of men's time, unto the cruel. Those years that should be given to the honour of a gracious God are spent in the service of a cruel sin. It ruins the estate (v. 10): "Strangers will be filled with thy wealth, which thou art but entrusted with as a steward for thy family; and the fruit of thy labours, which should be provision for thy own house, will be in the house of a stranger, that neither has right to it nor will ever thank thee for it." It is destructive to the health, and shortens men's days: Thy flesh and thy body will be consumed by it, v. 11. The lusts of uncleanness not only war against the soul, which the sinner neglects and is in no care about, but they war against the body too, which he is so indulgent of and is in such care to pamper. "Though thou art merry now, sporting thyself in thy own deceivings, yet thou wilt certainly mourn at the last," v. 11. Solomon brings in the convinced sinner reproaching himself because he hated to be reformed and therefore hated to be informed, and could not endure either to be taught his duty or to be told of his faults—My heart despised reproof, v. 12. He cannot but own that parents and ministers had given him good counsel and fair warning (v. 13). He had not taken their counsel, had not obeyed their voice, for indeed he never inclined his ear to those that instructed him. By the frequent acts of sin the habits of it were so rooted and confirmed that his heart was fully set in him to commit it (v. 14): I was almost in all evil in the midst of the congregation and assembly.

Solomon, having shown the great evil that there is in adultery and fornication, prescribes remedies against them.

I. Enjoy with satisfaction the comforts of lawful marriage, which was ordained for the prevention of uncleanness. Let none complain that God has dealt unkindly with them in forbidding them those pleasures which they have a natural desire of, for he has graciously provided for the regular gratification of them. "Thou mayest not indeed eat of every tree of the garden, but choose thee out one, which thou pleasest, and of that thou mayest freely eat; nature will be content with that, but lust with nothing." Let young men marry, marry and not burn. Have a cistern, a well of thy own (v. 15), even the wife of thy youth, v. 18. Wholly abstain, or wed.—Herbert. Let him that is married take delight in his wife, and let him be very fond of her, not only because she is the wife that he himself has chosen and he ought to be pleased with his own choice, but because she is the wife that God in his providence appointed for him. Let thy fountain be blessed (v. 18); think thyself very happy in her, look upon her as a blessed wife, let her have thy blessing, pray daily for her, and then rejoice with her. Mutual delight is the bond of mutual fidelity. Let him be fond of his wife and love her dearly (v. 19). If thou wilt suffer thy love to run into an excess, let it be only of thy own wife. Let him take delight in his children and look upon them with pleasure (v. 16, 17). Let him then scorn the offer of forbidden pleasures when he is always ravished with the love of a faithful virtuous wife; let him consider what an absurdity it will be for him to be ravished with a strange woman (v. 20). If the dictates of reason may be heard, the laws of virtue will be obeyed.

II. "See the eye of God always upon thee and let his fear rule in thy heart," v. 21. The ways of man, all his motions, all his actions, are before the eyes of the Lord. God sees it in a true light, and knows it with all its causes, circumstances, and consequences. He not only sees, but ponders all his goings, judges concerning them, as one that will shortly judge, the sinner for them.

III. "Foresee the certain ruin of those that go on still in their trespasses." Those that live in this sin promise themselves impunity, but they deceive themselves; their sin will find them out, v. 22, 23. As their own iniquities do arrest them in the reproaches of conscience and present rebukes (Jer. vii. 19), so their own iniquities shall arrest them and bind them over to the judgments of God. There needs no prison, no chains; they shall be holden in the cords of their own sins.

CHAP. VI

In this chapter we have, I. A caution against rash suretiship, ver. 1–5. II. A rebuke to slothfulness, ver. 6–11. III. The character and fate of a malicious mischievous man, ver. 12–15. IV. An account of seven things which God hates, ver. 16–19. V. An exhortation to make the word of God familiar to us, ver. 20–23. VI. A repeated warning of the pernicious consequences of the sin of whoredom, ver. 24–35.

Verses 1–5

It is the excellency of the word of God that it teaches us not only divine wisdom for another world, but human prudence for this world, that we may order our affairs with discretion; and this is one good rule. To avoid suretiship, because by it poverty and ruin are often brought into families. 1. We must look upon suretiship as a snare and decline it accordingly, v. 1, 2. "It is dangerous enough for a man to be bound for his friend, though it be one whose circumstances he is well acquainted with, and well assured of his sufficiency, but much more to strike the hands with a stranger, to become surety for one whom thou dost not know to be either able or honest." If thou hast rashly entered into such engagements, either wheedled into them or in hopes to have the same kindness done for thee another time, know that thou art snared with the words of thy mouth. If we have been drawn into this snare, it will be our wisdom by all means, with all speed, to get out of it, v. 3–5. It sleeps for the present; we hear nothing of it. The debt is not demanded; the principal says, "Never fear, we will take care of it." But still the bond is in force, interest is running on, the creditor may come upon thee when he will and perhaps may be hasty and severe. Therefore deliver thyself; rest not till either the creditor give up the bond or the principal give thee counter-security. Leave no stone unturned till thou hast agreed with thy adversary and compromised the matter, so that thy bond may not come against thee or thine.

But how are we to understand this? We are not to think it is unlawful in any case to become surety, or bail, for another; it may be a piece of justice or charity. Paul became bound for Onesimus, Philem. 19. We may help a young man into business that we know to be honest, and gain him credit by passing our word for him, and so do him a great kindness without any detriment to ourselves. But, 1. It is every man's wisdom to keep out of debt as much as may be, for it is an incumbrance upon him, entangles him in the world, puts him in danger of doing wrong or suffering wrong. The borrower is servant to the lender, and makes himself very much a slave to the world. A man ought never to be bound as surety for more than he is both able and willing to pay, and can afford to pay without wronging his family.

Solomon addresses himself to the sluggard who loves his ease, lives in idleness, sticks to nothing, and in a particular manner is careless in the business of religion.

I. By way of instruction, v. 6–8, he sends him to school, for sluggards must be schooled. The sluggard is not willing to come to school to him (dreaming scholars will never love wakeful teachers) and therefore he has found him out another school, as low as he can desire. Go to the ant, to the bee, so the LXX. Man is taught more than the beasts of the earth, and made wiser than the fowls of heaven, and yet is so degenerated that he may learn wisdom from the meanest insects and be shamed by them. When we observe the wonderful sagacities of the inferior creatures we must receive instruction to ourselves; by spiritualizing common things, we may make the things of God ready to us, and converse with them daily. Consider her ways. The sluggard is so because he does not consider. In particular, learn to provide meat in summer. We must prepare for hereafter, and not eat up all, and lay up nothing, but in gathering time, treasure up for a spending time. Lay in for winter, for straits and wants that may happen, and for old age; much more in the affairs of our souls. In the enjoyment of the means of grace provide for the want of them, in life for death, in time for eternity. Even in summer, when the weather is hot, the ant is busy in gathering food and laying it up, and does not indulge her ease, nor take her pleasure, as the grasshopper, that sings and sports in the summer and then perishes in the winter. The ants help one another; if one have a grain of corn too big for her to carry home, her neighbours will come in to her assistance. It is our wisdom to improve the season while that favours us. Walk while you have the light. The ant has no guides and rulers, but does it of herself, following the instinct of nature. We have parents, masters, ministers, magistrates, to put us in mind of our duty, to direct us in it.

II. By way of reproof, v. 9–11.

1. He expostulates with the sluggard: "How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard? When wilt thou think it time to arise?" Sluggards should be roused in the duties of their particular calling as men or their general calling as Christians. "How long wilt thou waste thy time, and when wilt thou be a better husband? How long wilt thou love thy ease, and when wilt thou learn to deny thyself, and to take pains? How long wilt thou delay, and put off, and trifle away thy opportunities; and when wilt thou stir up thyself to do what thou hast to do, which, if it be not done, will leave thee for ever undone?"

2. He exposes the frivolous excuses he makes for himself. When he is roused he stretches himself, and begs for more sleep, more slumber; he is well in his warm bed, and cannot endure to think of rising, especially of rising to work. He promises himself and his master that he will desire but a little more sleep, a little more slumber, and then he will get up and go to his business. But herein he deceives himself; the more a slothful temper is indulged the more it prevails. Thus men's great work is left undone by being put off yet a little longer—from day to day. A little more sleep proves an everlasting sleep.

3. He gives him fair warning of the fatal consequences of his slothfulness, v. 11. Poverty and want will certainly come upon those that are slothful in their business. He that leaves his concerns at sixes and sevens will soon see them go to wreck and ruin, and bring his noble to nine-pence. Spiritual poverty comes upon those that are slothful in the service of God. It will leave thee as naked as if thou wert stripped by a highwayman; so Bishop Patrick.

I. If the slothful are to be condemned, that do nothing, much more those that do ill, and contrive to do all the ill they can. It is a naughty person that is here spoken of, Heb. A man of Belial. A man of Belial is here described. He is a wicked man, that makes a trade of doing evil, especially with his tongue, for he walks and works his designs with a froward mouth (v. 12), by lying and perverseness. He has the subtlety of the serpent, and carries on his projects with a great deal of craft (v. 13), with his eyes, with his feet, with his fingers. Those whom he makes use of as the tools of his wickedness, understand the ill meaning of a wink of his eye, a stamp of his feet, for the least motion of his fingers. He gives orders for evil-doing so that he may not be suspected. It is not so much ambition or covetousness that is in his heart, as downright frowardness, malice, and ill nature. He aims not so much to enrich and advance himself as to do an ill turn to those about him. His calamity shall come and he shall be broken; he that devised mischief shall fall into mischief. Suddenly shall he be broken, to punish him for all the wicked arts he had to surprise people into his snares.

II. A catalogue of those things which are in a special manner odious to God, all which are generally to be found in men of Belial. God hates every sin. But there are some sins which he does in a special manner hate; and all those here mentioned are such as are injurious to our neighbour. Those things which God hates we must hate in ourselves. 1. Haughtiness and contempt of others—a proud look. Pride is the first, because it is at the bottom of much sin. When the show of men's countenance witnesses against them that they overvalue themselves and undervalue all about them, this is in a special manner hateful to him. 2. Falsehood, and fraud, and dissimulation. Next to a proud look, nothing is more an abomination to God than a lying tongue; nothing more sacred than truth, nor more necessary to conversation than speaking truth. 3. Cruelty and blood-thirstiness. The devil was, from the beginning, a liar and a murderer (John viii. 44), so hands that shed innocent blood are hateful to God, because they have in them the devil's image and do him service. 4. Subtlety in the contrivance of sin, a heart that designs and a head that devises wicked imaginations. The more there is of craft and management in sin the more it is an abomination to God. 5. Vigour and diligence in the prosecution of sin—feet that are swift in running to mischief. The eagerness and industry, of sinners, in their sinful pursuits, may shame us who go about that which is good so awkwardly and so coldly. 6. False-witness bearing: There cannot be a greater affront to God, nor a greater injury to our neighbour, than knowingly to give a false testimony. 7. Making mischief between relations and neighbours, and using all wicked means possible, not only to alienate their affections one from another, but to irritate their passions one against another. The God of love and peace hates him that sows discord among brethren.

Verses 20–35

I. A general exhortation faithfully to adhere to the word of God and to take it for our guide in all our actions.

1. We must look upon the word of God both as a light (v. 23) and as a law, v. 20, 23. It is a light, which our understandings must subscribe to; it is a lamp to our eyes for discovery, and so to our feet for direction. The word of God reveals to us truths of eternal certainty. Scripture-light is the sure light. It is a law, which our wills must submit to.

2. We must receive it as our father's commandment and the law of our mother, v. 20. It is God's commandment and his law. Our parents directed us to it, trained us up in the knowledge and observance of it. We believe indeed, not for their saying, for we have tried it ourselves and find it to be of God; but we were beholden to them for recommending it to us. The cautions, counsels, and commands which our parents gave us agree with the word of God, and therefore we must hold them fast.

3. We must retain the word of God and the good instructions which our parents gave us out of it. "Keep thy father's commandment, keep it still, and never forsake it." We must never lay them by (v. 21): Bind them continually, not only upon thy hand (as Moses had directed, Deut. vi. 8) but upon thy heart. Phylacteries upon the hand were of no value at all, any further than they occasioned pious thoughts and affections in the heart. Tie them about thy neck, as an ornament—about thy throat (so the word is); let them be a guard that no forbidden fruit may be suffered to go in nor any evil word suffered to go out through the throat. If we bind it continually upon our hearts, we must follow its direction. "When thou goest, it shall lead thee (v. 22); it shall lead thee in the good and right way. It will say unto thee, when thou art ready to turn aside, This is the way; walk in it. Let it be thy rule, and then thou shalt be led by the Spirit; he will be thy monitor and support." It will be our guard: "When thou sleepest, and liest exposed to the malignant powers of darkness, it shall keep thee; thou shalt be safe, and shalt think thyself so." It will be our companion: "When thou awakest in the night, and knowest not how to pass thy waking minutes, it shall talk with thee, with pleasant meditations in the night-watches; when thou awakest in the morning, and art contriving the work of the day, it shall talk with thee about it, and help thee to contrive for the best," Ps. i. 2.

II. A particular caution against the sin of uncleanness.

1. When we consider how much this iniquity abounds we shall not wonder that the cautions against it are so often repeated. "The reproofs of instruction are the way of life to thee, because they are designed to keep thee from the evil woman, who will be certain death to thee, from being enticed by the flattery of the tongue of a strange woman, who pretends to love thee, but intends to ruin thee." The greatest kindness we can do ourselves, is to keep at a distance from this sin (v. 25): "Lust not after her beauty, no, not in thy heart, for, if thou dost, thou hast there already committed adultery with her. Talk not of the charms in her face; let her not take thee with her eye-lids. Her looks are arrows and fiery darts; they call it a pleasing captivity, but it is a destroying one, it is worse than Egyptian slavery."

2. Divers arguments Solomon here urges to enforce this caution. It is a sin that impoverishes men, wastes their estates, and reduces them to beggary (v. 26): By means of a whorish woman a man is brought to a piece of bread. It threatens death; it kills men: The adulteress will hunt for the precious life, perhaps designedly, as Delilah for Samson's. It brings guilt upon the conscience. He that touches his neighbour's wife, with an immodest touch, cannot be innocent, v. 29. The bold presumptuous sinner says, "I may sin and yet escape punishment." He might as well say, I will take fire into my bosom and not burn my clothes. It is a much more scandalous sin than stealing is, v. 30–33. When Nathan would convict David of the evil of his adultery he did it by a parable concerning the most aggravated theft, which, in David's judgment, deserved to be punished with death (2 Sam. xii. 5), and then showed him that his sin was more exceedingly sinful than that. It is a greater reproach to a man's reason, for he cannot excuse it, as a thief may, by saying that it was to satisfy his hunger. Therefore whoso commits adultery with a woman lacks understanding, and deserves to be stigmatized as an arrant fool. It will be a wound to his good name, a dishonour to his family, and, though the guilt of it may be done away by repentance, the reproach of it never will. David's sin in the matter of Uriah was not only a perpetual blemish upon his own character, but gave occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme his name too. He that touches his neighbour's wife, and is familiar with her, gives him occasion for jealousy, much more he that debauches her, which, if kept ever so secret, might then be discovered by the waters of jealousy, Num. v. 12, etc.

CHAP. VII

The scope of this chapter is, as of several before, to warn young men against the lusts of the flesh. Solomon remembered of what ill consequence it was to his father, perhaps found himself, and perceived his son, addicted to it, and therefore he thought he could never say enough to dissuade men. In this chapter we have, I. A general exhortation to get our minds principled and governed by the word of God, as a sovereign antidote against this sin, ver. 1–5. II. A particular representation of the great danger, ver. 6–23. III. A serious caution to take heed of all approaches towards this sin, ver. 24–27. We should all pray, "Lord, lead us not into this temptation."

Verses 1–5

These verses are an introduction to his warning against fleshly lusts, much the same with that, ch. vi. 20, &c., and ending (v. 5) as that did (v. 24), To keep thee from the strange woman. He speaks in God's name; for it is God's commandments that we are to keep, his words, his law. We must keep it as our life: Keep my commandments and live (v. 2). Keep my law as the apple of thy eye. A little thing offends the eye, and therefore nature has so well guarded it. We pray, with David, that God would keep us as the apple of his eye (Ps. xvii. 8), that our lives and comforts may be precious in his sight; and they shall be so (Zech. ii. 8) if we be in like manner tender of his law and afraid of the least violation of it. "Bind them upon thy fingers; let them be precious to thee; look upon them as the signet on thy right hand; wear them continually as thy wedding-ring, the badge of thy espousals to God." Look upon the word of God as putting an honour upon thee, as an ensign of thy dignity. Write them upon the table of thy heart, as the names of the friends we dearly love, we say, are written in our hearts. "Say unto wisdom, Thou art my sister, whom I dearly love and take delight in; and call understanding thy kinswoman, to whom thou art nearly allied, and for whom thou hast a pure affection; call her thy friend, whom thou courtest." We must make the word of God familiar to us, for our defence and armour, to keep us from the strange woman, from sin, particularly from the sin of uncleanness, v. 5.

Verses 6–23

Solomon here, to enforce the caution he had given against the sin of whoredom, tells a story of a young man that was ruined to all intents and purposes by the enticements of an adulterous woman. Such a story as this would serve the lewd profane poets of our age to make a play of, and the harlot with them would be a heroine; nothing would be so entertaining to the audience, as her arts of beguiling the young gentleman. Her conquests would be celebrated as the triumphs of wit and love, and the comedy would conclude very pleasantly; and every young men that saw it acted would covet to be so picked up. Thus fools make a mock at sin. But Solomon here relates it, and all wise and good men read it, as a very melancholy story. The impudence of the adulterous woman is very justly looked upon with the highest indignation, and the easiness of the young man with the tenderest compassion. It is supposed to be a parable, or imagined case, but I doubt it was too true, and it is still too often true.

Solomon was a magistrate, and, as such, inspected the manners of his subjects. But here he writes as a minister, a prophet, who is by office a watchman, to give warning, that we may not be ignorant of Satan's devices, but may know where to double our guard.

I. The person tempted was a young man, v. 7. Fleshly lusts are called youthful lusts (2 Tim. ii. 22). Young people ought in a special manner to fortify their resolutions against this sin. He was a young man void of understanding, that went abroad into the world, not principled as he ought to have been with wisdom and the fear of God, and so ventured to sea without ballast, without pilot, cord, or compass. He kept bad company. He was sauntering, and had nothing to do, but passed through the street as one that knew not how to dispose of himself. One of the sins of filthy Sodom was abundance of idleness, Ezek. xvi. 49. He was a night-walker. Having fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, he begins to move in the twilight in the evening, v. 9. He steered his course towards the house of one that he thought would entertain him, and that he might be merry with; he went near her corner, the way to her house (v. 8), contrary to Solomon's advice (ch. v. 8), Come not nigh the door of her house.

II. The person tempting, not a common prostitute, was a married wife (v. 19), not suspected of any such wickedness, and yet, in the twilight of the evening, when her husband was abroad, abominably impudent. She had the attire of a harlot (v. 10), gaudy and flaunting. She is subtle of heart, mistress of all the arts of wheedling, and knowing how by all her caresses to serve her own base purposes. She is loud and stubborn, talkative and self-willed, noisy and troublesome, wilful and headstrong, and cannot bear to be counselled, much less reproved, by husband or parents, ministers or friends. She is a daughter of Belial, that will endure no yoke. She is all for gadding abroad, changing place and company. She is here, and there, and everywhere but where she should be. She lies in wait at every corner, to pick up such as she can make a prey of. Virtue is a penance to those to whom home is a prison.

III. She met the young spark. Perhaps she knew him; however she knew by his fashions that he was such a son as she wished for; so she caught him about the neck and kissed him, contrary to all the rules of modesty (v. 13), and with an impudent face invited him not only to her house, but to her bed. She courted him to sup with her (v. 14, 15): I have peace-offerings with me. Hereby she gives him to understand that she was compassed about with so many blessings that she had occasion to offer peace-offerings, in token of joy and thankfulness; so that he needed not fear having his pocket picked. She had been today at the temple, and was as well respected there as any that worshipped in the courts of the Lord. She had paid her vows, and, as she thought, made all even with God Almighty, and therefore might venture upon a new score of sins. It is sad that a show of piety should become the shelter of iniquity. The Pharisees made long prayers, that they might the more plausibly carry on their covetous and mischievous designs. The greatest part of the flesh of the peace-offerings was by the law returned back to the offerers, to feast upon with their friends, Lev. vii. 15. "Come," says she, "come home with me, for I have good cheer enough, and only want good company to help me off with it." She pretends to have a very great affection for him above any man: "Therefore, because I have a good supper upon the table, I came forth to meet thee, for no friend in the world shall be so welcome to it as thou shalt," v. 15. They will sit down to eat and drink, and then play the wanton. The bed is decked with coverings of tapestry and carved works. The sheets are of fine linen of Egypt, v. 16. It is perfumed with the sweetest scents, v. 17. Come, therefore, and let us take our fill of love, v. 18. Of love, does she say? Of lust she means, but it is a pity that the name of love should be thus abused. True love is from heaven. "Never fear," says she, "the good man is not at home" (v. 19); she does not call him her husband, but "the good man of the house, of whom I am weary." But will he not return quickly? No: "he has gone a long journey, and cannot return on a sudden; he appointed the day of his return, and he never comes home sooner than he says he will. He has taken a bag of money with him—either to buy goods and he will not return till he has laid it all out, or to revel." Whether justly or not, she insinuates that he was a bad husband; so she would represent him, because she was resolved to be a bad wife, and must have that for an excuse; it is often groundlessly suggested, but is never a sufficient excuse.

IV. Promising the young man everything that was pleasant, and impunity in the enjoyment she gained her point, v. 21. It should seem, the youth, though very simple, had no ill design, else a word, a beck, a wink, would have served and there would have been no need of all this harangue; but though he did not intend any such thing, nay, had something in his conscience that opposed it, yet with her much fair speech she caused him to yield. His corruptions at length triumphed over his convictions. With the flattery of her lips she forced him; he could not stop his ear against such a charmer, but surrendered. With what pity does Solomon here look upon this foolish young man, when he sees him follow the adulterous woman! He gives him up for gone. Going without his breast-plate, he will receive his death's wound, v. 23. That which makes his case the more piteous is that he is not himself aware of his misery and danger; he goes laughing to his ruin.

We have here the application of the foregoing story: "Hearken to me therefore, and not to such seducers (v. 24); give ear to a father, and not to an enemy." Let not thy heart decline to her ways (v. 25); never leave the paths of virtue. Do not only keep thy feet from those ways, but let not so much as thy heart incline to them. Let reason, and conscience, and the fear of God ruling in the heart, check the inclinations of the sensual appetite. Thousands have been undone by this sin; and those not only the weak and simple youths, such as he was of whom he had now spoken, but many strong men have been slain by her, v. 26. Therefore stand in awe and sin not.

CHAP. VIII

The word of God is wisdom. I. Divine revelation is the word and wisdom of God, and pure religion and undefiled is built upon it; and of that Solomon here speaks, ver. 1–21. God, by it, instructs, and governs, and blesses, the children of men. II. The Redeemer is the eternal Word and wisdom, the Logos. He is the Wisdom that speaks to the children of men in the former part of the chapter. All divine revelation passes through his hand, and centres in him; but of him as the personal Wisdom, the second person in the Godhead, Solomon here speaks, ver. 22–31. He concludes with a repeated charge to attend to the voice of God in his word, ver. 32–36.

I. The things revealed are easy to be known, for they belong to us and to our children (Deut. xxix. 29), for they are proclaimed in some measure by the works of the creation (Ps. xix. 1), more fully by the consciences of men and the eternal reasons and rules of good and evil, but most clearly by Moses and the prophets. The precepts of wisdom are proclaimed aloud (v. 1): Does not Wisdom cry? Yes, she cries aloud, and does not spare (Isa. lviii. 1). The curses and blessings were read with a loud voice by the Levites, Deut. xxvii. 14. And men's own hearts sometimes speak aloud to them; there are clamours of conscience, as well as whispers. They are proclaimed from on high (v. 2): She stands in the top of high places; it was from the top of Mount Sinai that the law was given, and Christ expounded it in a sermon upon the mount. Wisdom speaks openly; truth seeks no corners, but gladly appeals to the light, in the places of concourse, where multitudes are gathered together. Wisdom's discoveries and directions are given to all promiscuously. They are proclaimed where they are most needed, and therefore are published in the places of the paths, where many ways meet. The foolish man knows not how to go to the city (Eccles. x. 15), and therefore Wisdom stands ready to direct him, stands at the gates, at the entry of the city, ready to tell him where the seer's house is, 1 Sam. ix. 18. Nay, she follows men to their own houses, and cries to them at the coming in at the doors, saying, Peace be to this house. Wisdom speaks to us: "Unto you, O men! I call (v. 4), not to angels (they need not these instructions), not to devils (they are past them), not to the brute-creatures (they are not capable of them), but to you, O men!" They are designed to make them wise (v. 5); they are calculated not only for men that are capable of wisdom, but for sinful men, fallen men, foolish men, that need it, and are undone without it: "O you simple ones! understand wisdom. Though you are ever so simple, Wisdom will undertake to give you an understanding heart."

II. The things revealed are worthy of all acceptation. They are excellent things (v. 6), princely things, so the word is. Things which relate to an eternal God, an immortal soul, and an everlasting state, must needs be excellent things. They are right things (v. 6), all in righteousness (v. 8), and nothing froward or perverse in them. There is nothing in them that puts any hardship upon us, that lays us under any undue restraints, unbecoming the dignity and liberty of the human nature. They are of unquestionable truth. My mouth shall speak truth (v. 7). Every word of God is true. His word to us is yea, and amen; never then let ours be yea and nay. They are all plain, and not hard to be understood. If the book is sealed, it is to those who are willingly ignorant.

III. The right knowledge of those things is to be preferred before all the wealth of this world (v. 10, 11): Receive my instruction, and not silver. Wisdom is in itself, and therefore must be in our account, better than rubies. It will bring us in a better price, and it will be a better ornament than jewels.

Wisdom here is Christ, in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; it is Christ in the word and Christ in the heart, not only Christ revealed to us, but Christ revealed in us.

I. Divine wisdom gives men good heads (v. 12): I Wisdom dwell with prudence, not with carnal policy, for prudence is the product of religion and an ornament to religion; and there are more witty inventions found out with the help of the scripture, both for the right understanding of God's providences and for the doing of good in our generation, than were ever discovered by the learning of the philosophers or the politics of statesmen. We may apply it to Christ himself. We had found out many inventions for our ruin; he found out one for our recovery.

II. It gives men good hearts, v. 13. True religion, consisting in the fear of the Lord, teaches men, 1. To hate all sin, as displeasing to God and destructive to the soul: The fear of the Lord is to hate evil, the evil way. 2. Particularly to hate pride and passion, those two common and dangerous sins.

III. It has a great influence upon public affairs, v. 14. Christ, as God, has strength and wisdom: as Redeemer, he is the wisdom of God and the power of God. He is the wonderful counsellor and gives that grace which alone is sound wisdom. True religion gives men the best counsel in all difficult cases, and helps to make their way plain. And therefore Wisdom says, By me kings reign (v. 15, 16). They reign by him, and therefore ought to reign for him. Religion is very much the strength and support of the civil government; it teaches subjects their duty, and so by it kings reign over them the more easily; it teaches kings their duty, and so by it kings reign as they ought; they decree justice, while they rule in the fear of God. Those rule well whom religion rules.

IV. It will make all those happy that receive it. They shall be happy in the love of Christ; for he it is that says, I love those that love me, v. 17. "Those that seek me early, that is, seek me earnestly, seek me first before anything else, that begin betimes in the days of their youth to seek me, they shall find what they seek." Christ shall be theirs, and they shall be his. They shall have as much riches and honour as Infinite Wisdom sees good for them (v. 18). They are riches and righteousness, riches honestly got, not by fraud and oppression, but in regular ways, and riches charitably used, for alms are called righteousness. Therefore they are durable riches. That which is well got will wear well and will be left to the children's children, and that which is well spent in works of piety and charity is put out to the best interest and so will be durable. They shall have that which is infinitely better, if they have not riches and honour in this world (v. 19): "My fruit is better than gold, and will turn to a better account, will be of more value in less compass, and my revenue better than the choicest silver, will serve a better trade." They shall be happy in the grace of God now; that shall be their guide in the good way, v. 20. This is that fruit of wisdom which is better than gold, than fine gold, it leads us in the way of righteousness, shows us that way and goes before us in it, the way that God would have us walk in and which will certainly bring us to our desired end. They shall be happy in the glory of God hereafter, v. 21. It is a happiness which will subsist of itself, and stand alone, without the accidental supports of outward conveniences. Spiritual and eternal things are the only real and substantial things. Joy in God is substantial joy, solid and well-grounded. The promises are their bonds, Christ is their surety, and both substantial. It is satisfying; it will not only fill their hands, but fill their treasures, v. 21. The things of this world may fill men's bellies (Ps. xvii. 14), but not their treasures, for they cannot in them secure to themselves goods for many years.

Wisdom here has personal properties and actions; and that intelligent divine person can be no other than the Son of God himself, to whom the principal things here spoken of wisdom are attributed in other scriptures. The best exposition of these verses we have in the first four verses of St. John's gospel. In the beginning was the Word, &c. Concerning the Son of God observe,

I. His personality and distinct subsistence, one with the Father and of the same essence, and yet a person of himself, whom the Lord possessed (v. 22), who was set up (v. 23) was brought forth (v. 24, 25), was by him (v. 30), for he was the express image of his person, Heb. i. 3.

II. His eternity; he was begotten of the Father, for the Lord possessed him, as his own Son, his beloved Son, laid him in his bosom; he was brought forth as the only-begotten of the Father, and this before all worlds. The Word was eternal, and had a being before the world, before the beginning of time; and therefore it must follow that it was from eternity. The Lord possessed him in the beginning of his way, of his eternal counsels, for those were before his works. This way indeed had no beginning, for God's purposes in himself are eternal like himself, but God speaks to us in our own language. Wisdom explains herself (v. 23): I was set up from everlasting, Before the earth was, and before man was made. Before the sea was (v. 24), when there were no depths in which the waters were gathered together, no fountains from which those waters might arise, none of that deep on which the Spirit of God moved for the production of the visible creation, Gen. i. 2. Before the mountains were, v. 25, the eternal Word brought forth. Before the habitable parts of the world, which men cultivate (v. 26), the fields in the valleys, to which the mountains are as a wall, which are the highest part of the dust of the world; the first part of the dust (so some), the atoms which compose the several parts of the world; the chief or principal part of the dust, so it may be read, and understood of man, the principal part of the dust, dust enlivened, dust refined—the eternal Word had a being, in him was the life of men.

III. His agency in making the world. He not only had a being before the world, but he was present, not as a spectator, but as the architect, when the world was made. By him God made the worlds, Eph. iii. 9; Heb. i. 2; Col. i. 16. When, on the first day of the creation, God said, Let there be light, and with a word produced it, this eternal Wisdom was that almighty Word: Then I was there, when he prepared the heavens. He was no less active when, on the second day, he stretched out the firmament, the vast expanse, and set that as a compass upon the face of the depth (v. 27), surrounded it on all sides with that canopy, that curtain. He was also employed in the third day's work, when the waters above the heavens were gathered together by establishing the clouds above, and those under the heavens by strengthening the fountains of the deep, which send forth those waters (v. 28), and by preserving the bounds of the sea, which is the receptacle of those waters, v. 29.

IV. The infinite complacency which the Father had in him, and he in the Father (v. 30): I was by him, as one brought up with him. As by an eternal generation he was brought forth of the Father, so by an eternal counsel he was brought up with him. He did what he saw the Father do (John v. 19), pleased his Father, did according to the commandment he received from his Father, and all this as one brought up with him. He was daily his Father's delight (my elect, in whom my soul delighteth, says God, Isa. xlii. 1). This may be understood of the satisfaction they had in each other, with reference to the great work of man's redemption.

V. The gracious concern he had for mankind, v. 31. Wisdom rejoiced, not so much in the rich products of the earth, but in the redemption and salvation of man.

The application of Wisdom's discourse; the design and tendency of it is to bring us all into an entire subjection to the laws of religion, and to rectify what is amiss in our hearts and lives.

I. An exhortation to hear and obey the voice of Wisdom, to discern the voice of Christ, as the sheep know the shepherd's voice. "Hearken unto me, O you children!" v. 32. "Read the word written, sit under the word preached, bless God for both, and hear him in both speaking to you." Let Wisdom's children justify Wisdom by hearkening to her. Hear Wisdom's words with a willing heart (v. 33): "Hear instruction, and refuse it not, either as that which you need not or as that which you like not; it is offered you as a kindness, and it is at your peril if you refuse it." We must hear Wisdom so as to watch daily at her gates, as beggars to receive an alms, as clients and patients to receive advice, and as servants, with humility, and patience at the posts of her doors. We must watch and wait, as Christ's hearers, that hanged on him to hear him, as the word in the original is (Luke xix. 48 and ch. xxi. 38) came early in the morning to hear him.

II. An assurance of happiness to all those that do hearken to Wisdom. They shall find what they seek. But will it make them amends if they do find it? Yes (v. 35): Whoso finds me finds life, that is, all happiness, all that good which he needs or can desire. Christ is Wisdom, and he that finds Christ, finds life; for Christ is life to all believers.

III. The doom passed upon all those that reject Wisdom and her proposals, v. 26. They ruin themselves, and Wisdom will not hinder them, because they have set at nought all her counsel. They sin against Christ; they act in contempt of his authority, and in contradiction to all the purposes of his life and death. Those that offend Christ do the greatest wrong to themselves; they wrong their own souls. O Israel! thou hast destroyed thyself.

CHAP. IX

Christ and sin are rivals for the soul of man. The design of this representation is to set before us life and death, good and evil; and there needs no more than a fair stating of the case to determine us which of those to choose. I. Christ, under the name of Wisdom, invites us to accept of his entertainment, and so to enter into communion with him, ver. 1–6. And having foretold the different success of his invitation (ver. 7–9) he shows, in short, what he requires from us (ver. 10) and what he designs for us (ver. 11), and then leaves it to our choice what we will do, ver. 12. II. Sin, under the character of a foolish woman, courts us to accept of her entertainment, and (ver. 13–16) pretends it is very charming, ver. 17. But Solomon tells us what the reckoning will be, ver. 18.

Verses 1–12

Wisdom is here introduced as a magnificent and munificent queen, great and generous; that Word of God is this Wisdom in which God makes known his goodwill towards men; God the Word is this Wisdom, to whom the Father has committed all judgment. The word is plural, Wisdoms; for in Christ are hid treasures of wisdom.

I. The rich provision which Wisdom has made for the reception of all those that will be her disciples. This is represented under the similitude of a sumptuous feast. 1. Here is a stately palace provided, v. 1. Wisdom, not finding a house capacious enough for all her guests, has built one on purpose, and, has hewn out her seven pillars. Heaven is the house which Wisdom has built to entertain all her guests that are called to the marriage-supper of the Lamb; that is her Father's house, where there are many mansions, and whither she has gone to prepare places for us. 2. Here is a splendid feast got ready (v. 2): She has killed her beasts; she has mingled her wine. She has killed her sacrifice (so the word is); it is a sumptuous but a sacred feast, a feast upon a sacrifice. She has completely furnished her table with all the satisfactions that a soul can desire—righteousness and grace, peace and joy, the assurances of God's love, the consolations of the Spirit, and all the pledges and earnests of eternal life.

II. The gracious invitation she has given, not to some particular friends, but to all in general. She has sent forth her maidens, v. 3. The ministers of the gospel are commissioned to give notice of the preparations which God has made, in the everlasting covenant, for all those that are willing to come up to the terms of it; and they, with maiden purity, not corrupting themselves or the word of God, and with an exact observance of their orders, are to call upon all they meet with, even in the highways and hedges, to come and feast with Wisdom, for all things are now ready, Luke xiv. 23. She herself cries upon the highest places of the city, as one earnestly desirous of the welfare of the children of men. The invitation is given: Whoso is simple and wants understanding, v. 4. Wisdom invites such, because what she has to give is what they must need. He that is simple is invited, that he may be made wise, and he that wants a heart (so the word is) let him come hither, and he shall have one. Her preparations are designed for the cure of the mind. We are invited to Wisdom's house: Turn in hither. I say we are, for which of us is there that must not own the character of the invited, that are simple and want understanding? We are invited to her table (v. 5): Come, eat of my bread, that is, taste of the true pleasures that are to be found in the knowledge and fear of God. By faith acting on the promises of the gospel we feed, we feast, upon the provisions Christ has made for poor souls. We must break off from all bad company: "Forsake the foolish, converse not with them." The first step towards virtue is to shun vice, and therefore to shun the vicious. "Live not a mere animal-life, but the life of men. Live and you shall live; live spiritually, and you shall live eternally," Eph. v. 14.

III. The instructions which Wisdom gives to the ministers and others, who in their places are endeavouring to serve her designs. Their work must be, not only to tell in general what preparation is made for souls, but they must address themselves to particular persons, tell them of their faults, reprove, rebuke, v. 7, 8. They must instruct them how to amend—teach, v. 9. The word of God is intended, and therefore so is the ministry of that word, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness. They would meet with some scorners and wicked men who would mock the messengers of the Lord, and misuse them. And, though they are not forbidden to invite those simple ones to Wisdom's house, yet they are advised not to pursue the invitation by reproving and rebuking them. Thus Christ said of the Pharisees, Let them alone, Matt. xv. 14. They would meet with others, who are wise, and good, and just; thanks be to God, all are not scorners. We meet with some who are so wise as to be willing and glad to be taught. If there be occasion, we must reprove them; for wise men are not so perfectly wise but there is that in them which needs a reproof. The more wisdom a man has the more desirous he should be to have his weaknesses shown him. With our reproofs we must give them instruction, and must teach them, v. 9. It is as great an instance of wisdom to take a reproof well as to give it well. A wise man will be made wiser by the reproofs; he will increase in learning, will grow in knowledge, and so grow in grace.

IV. The instructions she gives to those that are invited, which her maidens must inculcate upon them.

1. Let them know wherein true wisdom consists, v. 10. The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom. A reverence of God's majesty, and a dread of his wrath, are the first steps towards true religion. The knowledge of holy things (the word is plural) is understanding, the things pertaining to the service of God (those are called holy things), that pertain to our own sanctification.

2. Let them know what will be the advantages of this wisdom (v. 11): "By me thy days shall be multiplied. It will contribute to the health of thy body, and so the years of thy life on earth shall be increased. It will bring thee to heaven, and there the years of thy life shall be increased without end."

3. Let them know what will be the consequence of their choosing or refusing this fair offer, v. 12. "If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself; thou wilt be the gainer by it, not Wisdom. If thou scornest Wisdom's proffer, thou alone shalt bear it."

How industrious the tempter is to seduce unwary souls into the paths of sin!

I. Who is the tempter—a foolish woman, Folly herself, in opposition to Wisdom. Carnal sensual pleasure I take to be especially meant by this foolish woman (v. 13); for that defiles the mind and stupefies conscience. This tempter is here described to be ignorant: She is simple and knows nothing, that is, she has no sufficient solid reason to offer. Whoredom, and wine, and new wine, take away the heart, they besot men, and make fools of them. The less she has to offer that is rational the more violent and pressing she is, and carries the day often by dint of impudence. She is clamorous and noisy (v. 13). She sits at the door of her house (v. 14), watching for a prey. She sits on a seat (on a throne, so the word signifies) in the high places of the city, as if she had authority, and perhaps she gains more by pretending to be fashionable than by pretending to be agreeable.

II. Who are the tempted—young people who have been well educated. They are passengers that go right on their ways (v. 15), that have been trained up in the paths of religion and virtue and set out very hopefully and well, and are not (as that young man, ch. vii. 8) going the way to her house. Such as these she lays snares for, and uses all her charms, to pervert them. She calls them simple, and wanting understanding, and therefore courts them to her school, that they may be cured of the restraints and formalities of their religion.

III. What the temptation is (v. 17): Stolen waters are sweet. It is to water and bread, whereas Wisdom invites to the beasts she has killed, and the wine she has mingled; however, bread and water are acceptable enough to those that are hungry and thirsty; and this is pretended to be more sweet and pleasant than common, for it is stolen water and bread eaten in secret, with a fear of being discovered. The pleasures of prohibited lusts are boasted of as more relishing than those of prescribed love; and dishonest gain is preferred to that which is justly gotten.

IV. An effectual antidote against the temptation, v. 18. He that so far wants understanding as to be drawn aside by these enticements is led on, ignorantly, to his own inevitable ruin: He knows that the dead are there, that those who live in pleasure are dead while they live, dead in trespasses and sins. Her guests, that are treated with these stolen waters, are led captive by Satan at his will.

CHAP. X

Hitherto we have been in the porch or preface to the proverbs; here they begin. They are short but weighty sentences; most of them are distichs, two sentences in one verse, illustrating each other; but it is seldom that there is any coherence between the verses, much less any thread of discourse, and therefore in these chapters we need not attempt to reduce the contents to their proper heads. The scope of them all is to set before us good and evil, the blessing and the curse. Many of the proverbs in this chapter relate to the good government of the tongue.

Verse 1

The comfort of parents, natural, political, and ecclesiastical, depends upon the good behaviour of those under their charge. Children should conduct themselves wisely, and live up to their good education, that they may gladden the hearts of their parents. It adds to the comfort of young people that thereby they do something towards recompensing their parents for all the care they have taken with them, and occasion pleasure to them in old age; and it is the duty of parents to rejoice in their children's wisdom and well-doing.

Verses 2–3

These two verses speak to the same purport. Wealth which men get unjustly will do them no good, because God will blast it: Treasures of wickedness profit nothing, v. 2. When profit and loss come to be balanced the profit gained by the treasures will by no means countervail the loss sustained by the wickedness, Matt. xvi. 26. They do not profit the soul. God casts away the substance of the wicked (v. 3). We often see that scattered by the justice of God which has been gathered together by the injustice of men. That which is honestly got will turn to a good account, for God will bless it. Righteousness delivers from death, that is, wealth gained, and kept, and used, in a right manner, answers the end of wealth, which is to keep us alive and be a defence to us.

Verse 4

Those are in a fair way to become poor who deal with a slack hand, who are careless and remiss in their business. Those who deal with a deceitful hand (so it may be read); who think to enrich themselves by fraud, will, in the end, impoverish themselves, not only by bringing the curse of God on what they have, but by forfeiting their reputation with men. Those who are diligent and honest, who are careful about their affairs, are likely to increase what they have. This is true in the affairs of our souls as well as in our worldly affairs; slothfulness and hypocrisy lead to spiritual poverty, but those who are fervent in spirit, serving the Lord, are likely to be rich in faith and rich in good works.

Verse 5

Those who improve their opportunities, who provide for hereafter while provision is to be made, gather in summer, which is gathering time. He who does so is a wise son. He acts wisely for his parents, whom, if there be occasion, he ought to maintain. He who sleeps idles away his time, and neglects his work, especially who sleeps in harvest, when he should be laying in for winter, is a son that causes shame; for he is a foolish son; he prepares shame for himself when winter comes. He who gets wisdom in the days of his youth gathers in summer, and he will have the credit of his industry; but he who idles away the days of his youth will bear the shame of his indolence when he is old.

Verse 6

Variety of blessings shall descend from above, and visibly abide on the head of good men. Blessings shall be on their head as a coronet to dignify them and as a helmet to protect them. The mouth of the wicked is covered with violence. Their mouths shall be stopped with shame for the violence which they have done.

Verse 7

Both the just and the wicked, when their days are fulfilled, must die. Between their bodies in the grave there is no visible difference; between the souls of the one and the other, in the world of spirits, there is a vast difference. Blessed men leave behind them blessed memories. Those that honour God he will thus honour, Ps. cxii. 3, 6, 9. It is part of the duty of the survivors: Let the memory of the just be blessed, so the Jews read it, and observe it as a precept, not naming an eminently just man that is dead without adding, Let his memory be blessed. Bad men are and shall be forgotten, or spoken of with contempt.

Verse 8

The obedient will take it as a privilege to be under government; and to be told their duty. And this is their wisdom; those are wise in heart who are tractable, and shall stand and be established. The disobedient, that will not be governed, nor endure any yoke, that will not be taught, nor take any advice, are fools, for they act against themselves and their own interest. They are commonly prating fools, full of talk, but full of nonsense, boasting of themselves.

Verse 9

Men's integrity will be their security: He that walks uprightly towards God and man, that is faithful to both and means as he says, walks surely; he is safe under a divine protection. He goes on his way with a humble boldness, being well armed against the temptations of Satan, the troubles of the world, and the reproaches of men. Men's dishonesty will be their shame: He that perverts his way, that dissembles with God and man, though he may for a time pass current, shall be known to be what he is.

Verse 10

Mischief is here said to attend designing, self-disguising sinners: He that winks with the eye, as if he took no notice of you, when he is watching an opportunity to do you an ill turn, that makes signs to his accomplices to assist him in executing his wicked projects, causes sorrow both to others and to himself. A prating fool shall fall, as was said before, v. 8. But his case is less dangerous of the two. He does not create so much sorrow to others as he that winks with his eyes. The dog that bites is not always the dog that barks.

Verse 11

How industrious a good man is, by communicating his goodness! His mouth, the outlet of his mind, is a well of life; it is a constant spring, whence issues good discourse for the edification of others. How industrious a bad man is, by concealing his badness: to do hurt with it: The mouth of the wicked covers violence, disguises the designed mischief with professions of friendship. Violence covers the mouth of the wicked; what he got by violence shall by violence be taken from him, Job v. 4, 5.

Verse 12

The great mischief-maker is malice. Even where there is no manifest occasion of strife, yet hatred seeks occasion and so stirs it up. Those are spiteful ill-natured people who take a pleasure in setting their neighbours by the ears, by tale-bearing, evil surmises, and misrepresentations, blowing up the sparks of contention into a flame, at which, with an unaccountable pleasure, they warm their hands. The great peace-maker, is love, which covers all sins, that is, the offences among relations which occasion discord. Love, instead of proclaiming and aggravating the offence, extenuates it as far as it is capable of being extenuated. Love will excuse the offence; when we are able to say that there was no ill intended, but it was an oversight, and we love our friend notwithstanding. It will also overlook the offence that is given us, and cover it, and by this means strife is prevented.

Verse 13

Wisdom and grace are the honour of good men. It is a man's honour to have wisdom, but much more to be instrumental to make others wise. Folly and sin are the shame of bad men: A rod is for the back of him that is void of understanding—of him that wants a heart; he exposes himself to the lashes of his own conscience, to the censures of the magistrate, and to the righteous judgments of God.

Verse 14

Observe, 1. It is the wisdom of the wise that they treasure up a stock of useful knowledge, which will be their preservation: Wisdom is therefore found in their lips (v. 13), because it is laid up in their hearts. 2. It is the folly of fools that they lay up mischief in their hearts. Their mouth is near destruction, having the sharp arrows of bitter words always at hand to throw about.

Verse 15

Rich people think themselves happy because they are rich; but it is their mistake: The rich man's wealth is, in his own conceit, his strong city, whereas the worst of evils it is utterly insufficient to protect them from. Poor people think themselves undone because they are poor; but it is their mistake. It sinks their spirits, whereas a man may live very comfortably, though he has but a little to live on, if he be but content, and keep a good conscience, and live by faith.

Verse 16

A righteous man eats only the labour of his hands, but that labour tends to life; he aims at nothing but to get an honest livelihood, to live and maintain his family. Nor does it tend only to his own life, but he would enable himself to do good to others; he labours that he may have to gain (Eph. iv. 28). A wicked man's wealth tends to sin. He makes it the food and fuel of his lusts, his pride and luxury; he does hurt with it and not good.

Verse 17

Those are in the right that do not only receive instruction, but retain it, keep it for their own use, that they may govern themselves by it, keep it for the benefit of others, that they may instruct them. Those are in the wrong that do not receive instruction, but wilfully and obstinately refuse it. They will not be taught their duty because it discovers their faults to them. The traveller that has missed his way, and cannot bear to be shown the right way, must needs err; he certainly misses the way of life.

Verse 18

Malice is folly and wickedness when it is concealed by flattery and dissimulation: He is a fool, though he may think himself a politician. Lying lips are bad enough of themselves, but have a peculiar malignity in them when they are made a cloak of maliciousness. He that utters slander is a fool too, for God will sooner or later bring forth that righteousness as the light which he endeavours to cloud.

Verse 19

Usually, those that speak much speak amiss, and among many words there cannot but be many idle words. Those that love to hear themselves talk do not consider what work they are making for repentance. It is therefore good to keep our mouth as with a bridle: He that refrains his lips, that often checks himself, is a wise man.

Verses 20–21

Value men, not by their wealth and preferment in the world, but by their virtue. Good men are good for something. As long as they have a mouth to speak, that will make them valuable and useful. The tongue of the just is as choice silver; they are sincere, freed from the dross of guile and evil design. They will enrich those that hear them with wisdom. It makes them useful: The lips of the righteous feed many; for they are full of the word of God, which is the bread of life, wherewith souls are nourished up. Bad men are good for nothing. The heart of the wicked is little worth. His principles, his notions, his thoughts, his purposes, and all the things that fill him, and affect him, are worldly and carnal, and therefore of no value. He that is of the earth speaks of the earth, and neither understands nor relishes the things of God, John iii. 31; 1 Cor. ii. 14.

Verse 22

Worldly wealth is that which most men have their hearts very much upon, but they generally mistake both the nature of the thing they desire and the way by which they hope to obtain it. Desirable wealth is to be expected, not by making ourselves drudges to the world (Ps. cxxvii. 2), but by the blessing of God. It is this that makes rich and adds no sorrow; what comes from the love of God has the sign of God, to preserve the soul from those turbulent lusts and passions of which the increase of riches is commonly the incentive.

Verse 23

It is as laughter to a fool to do mischief. He makes a laughing matter of sin. When he is warned not to sin, he makes a jest of the admonition. When he has sinned, he ridicules reproofs, and laughs away the convictions of his own conscience, ch. xiv. 9. Wisdom carries along with it the evidence of its own excellency. You need say no more in praise of a man understanding than this, "He is an understanding man; he has wisdom."

Verses 24–25

I. It shall be as ill with the wicked as they can fear, and as well with the righteous, as they can desire. The wicked, it is true, buoy themselves up sometimes in their wickedness with vain hopes which will deceive them, but at other times they cannot but be haunted with just fears, and those fears shall come upon them. The righteous it is true, sometimes have their fears, but their desire is towards the favour of God and a happiness in him, and that desire shall be granted. According to their faith, not according to their fear, it shall be unto them, Ps. xxxvii. 4.

II. The prosperity of the wicked shall quickly end, but the happiness of the righteous shall never end, v. 25.

Verse 26

Those that are of a slothful disposition are not fit to be sent on an errand. Such therefore are very unmeet to be ministers, Christ's messengers. A slothful servant is to his master as uneasy and troublesome as vinegar to the teeth and smoke to the eyes; he provokes his passion, as vinegar sets the teeth on edge, and occasions him grief to see his business neglected and undone, as smoke sets the eyes a-weeping.

Verses 27–28

Religion lengthens men's lives and crowns their hopes. What man is he that would see good days? Let him be religious, and then his days shall not only be many, but happy, for the hope of the righteous shall be gladness. Wickedness shortens men's lives, and frustrates their hopes.

Verses 29–30

Strength and stability are entailed upon integrity: The way of the Lord is strength to the upright, confirms him in his uprightness. All God's dealings with him, merciful and afflictive, serve to quicken him to his duty and animate him against his discouragements. A good conscience, kept pure from sin, gives a man boldness in a dangerous time. That joy of the Lord which is to be found only in the way of the Lord will be our strength (Neh. viii. 10), and therefore the righteous shall never be removed. Ruin and destruction are the certain consequences of wickedness. God's judgments will root them out.

Verses 31–32

It is both the proof and the praise of a man's wisdom and goodness that he speaks wisely and well. A good man, in his discourse, brings forth wisdom for the benefit of others. He knows what is acceptable, what discourse will be pleasing to God. It is the sin, and will be the ruin, of a wicked man, that he speaks wickedly.

CHAP. XI

Verse 1

Nothing is more offensive to God than deceit in commerce. A false balance is here put for all manner of unjust and fraudulent practices in dealing with any person, which are all an abomination to the Lord. Men make light of such frauds, and think there is no sin in that which there is money to be got by. Nothing is more pleasing to God than fair and honest dealing, nor more necessary to make us and our devotions acceptable to him: A just weight is his delight.

Verse 2

Pride is a shame to a man who springs out of the earth, who lives upon alms, depends upon God, and has forfeited all he has, to be proud. He that is haughty makes himself contemptible; it is a sin for which God often brings men down, as he did Nebuchadnezzar and Herod, whose ignominy immediately attended their vain-glory. As with the proud there is folly, and will be shame, so with the lowly there is wisdom, and will be honour, for a man's wisdom gains him respect and makes his face to shine before men.

Verse 3

The integrity of an honest man will itself be his guide. His principles are fixed, his rule is certain, and therefore his way is plain; his sincerity keeps him steady, and he need not tack about every time the wind turns, having no other end to drive at than to keep a good conscience. The iniquity of a bad man will itself be his ruin. The perverseness of sinners will be their destruction, though they think themselves ever so well fortified.

Verse 4

Riches will stand men in no stead in that day. They will neither put by the stroke nor ease the pain, much less take out the sting; what profit will this world's birthrights be then? A good conscience will make death easy. It is the privilege of the righteous not to be hurt of the second death, and so not much hurt by the first.

Verses 5–6

These two verses are to the same purport with v. 3. The ways of religion are plain and safe, and in them we may enjoy a holy security. The righteousness of the upright shall be armour of proof to them, to deliver them from the allurements of the devil and the world, and from their menaces. The ways of wickedness are dangerous and destructive: The wicked shall fall into misery and ruin by their own wickedness. Their sin will be their punishment.

Verse 7

It will be the great aggravation of the misery of wicked people that their hopes will sink into despair just when they expect them to be crowned with fruition. When a godly man dies his expectations are outdone, and all his fears vanish; but when a wicked man dies his hopes vanish.

Verse 8

Good people are helped out of the distresses which they thought themselves lost in, and their feet are set in a large room, Ps. lxvi. 12; xxxiv. 19. God has found out a way to deliver his people even when they have despaired. The wicked have fallen into the distresses which they thought themselves far from. Mordecai is saved from the gallows, Daniel from the lion's den, and Peter from the prison; and their persecutors come in their stead. The Israelites are delivered out of the Red Sea and the Egyptians drowned in it.

Verse 9

It is not only the murderer with his sword, but the hypocrite with his mouth, that destroys his neighbour, decoying him into sin, or into mischief, by the specious pretences of kindness and goodwill. Death and life are in the power of the tongue, but no tongue more fatal than the flattering tongue.

Verses 10–11

Good men are generally well-beloved by their neighbours. When it goes well with the righteous, when they are advanced and put into a capacity of doing good according to their desire, it is so much the better for all about them, and the city rejoices. Wicked people may perhaps have here and there a well-wisher, but among the generality of their neighbours they get ill-will; they may be feared, but they are not loved, and therefore when they perish there is shouting. There is good reason for this, because those that are good do good. Good men are public blessings. By the blessing of the upright, the blessings with which they are blessed, which enlarge their sphere of usefulness,—by the blessings with which they bless their neighbours, their advice, their examples, their prayers,—by the blessings with which God blesses others for their sake,—by these the city is exalted. Wicked men are public nuisances.

Verses 12–13

Silence is recommended as an instance of true friendship. A man of understanding, that has rule over his own spirit, if he be provoked, holds his peace, that he may neither give vent to his passion nor kindle the passion of others by any opprobrious language or peevish reflections. He that is void of wisdom discovers his folly by this; he despises his neighbour, calls him Raca, and Thou fool, upon the least provocation. A tale-bearer, that carries all the stories he can pick up, true or false, from house to house, to make mischief and sow discord, reveals secrets which he has been entrusted with, and so breaks the laws, and forfeits all the privileges, of friendship and conversation.

Verse 14

Where no counsel is, no consultation, but everythi ng done rashly, only caballing for parties and divided interests, the people fall, crumble into factions, fall to pieces. Councils of war are necessary to the operations of war; two eyes see more than one; and mutual advice is mutual assistance. In the multitude of counsellors, that see their need one of another, and act in concert and with concern for the public welfare, there is safety.

Verse 15

Our estates are not our own; we are but stewards. There is a good husbandry which is good divinity, part of the character of a good man, Ps. cxii. 5. Every man must be just to his family, else he is not true to his stewardship. In particular, we must not enter rashly into suretiship. There is danger of bringing ourselves into trouble by it, and our families too when we are gone: He that is surety for a stranger, he shall smart for it. He shall be sadly crushed and broken by it, and perhaps become a bankrupt.

Verse 16

Strong men retain riches. Men of spirit and interest are able to make good against all who stand in their way, are likely to keep what they have and to get more. A gracious woman is as solicitous to preserve her reputation for wisdom and modesty, humility and courtesy, and all those other graces that are the true ornaments of her sex, as strong men are to secure their estates; and those women who are truly gracious will secure their honour by their good conduct.

Verse 17

A merciful, tender, good-humoured man, does good to his own soul, makes and keeps himself easy. He has the pleasure of doing his duty, and contributing to the comfort of those that are to him as his own soul; for we are members one of another. We may by the soul understand the inward man, as the apostle calls it, and then it teaches us that the first and great act of mercy is to provide well for our own souls the necessary supports of the spiritual life. A cruel, froward, ill-natured man, troubles his own flesh, and so his sin becomes his punishment.

Verse 18

The wicked works a deceitful work, builds himself a house upon the sand, which will deceive him when the storm comes. Sin deceived me, and by it slew me. He that sows righteousness shall have a sure reward; it is made as sure to him as eternal truth can make it.

Verse 19

True holiness is true happiness; it is a preparative for it, a pledge and earnest of it. Righteousness inclines, disposes, and leads, the soul to life. Those that indulge themselves in sin are fitting themselves for destruction.

Verse 20

It concerns us to know what God hates and what he loves, that we may govern ourselves accordingly. Nothing is more offensive to God than hypocrisy and double-dealing, for these are signified by the word which we translate frowardness, pretending justice, but intending wrong, walking in crooked ways, to avoid discovery. Nothing is more pleasing to God than sincerity and plain-dealing.

Verse 21

Confederacies in sin shall certainly be broken, and shall not avail to protect the sinners: Though hand join in hand, though there are many that concur by their practice to keep wickedness in countenance, hough they are in league for the support and propagation of it, though wicked children tread in the steps of their wicked parents, they shall not be held guiltless; it will not excuse them to say that they did as the most did and as their company did. The seed of the righteous, that follow the steps of their righteousness, though they may fall into trouble, shall, in due time, be delivered.

Verse 22

By discretion here understand religion and grace, a true relish (so the word signifies) of the honours and pleasures that attend an unspotted virtue; so that a woman without discretion is a woman of a loose and dissolute conversation. Beauty or comeliness of body is as a jewel of gold, and, where there is wisdom and grace to guard against the temptations of it, it is a great ornament. A foolish wanton woman, of a light carriage, is fitly compared to a swine, though she be ever so handsome, wallowing in the mire of filthy lusts, with which the mind and conscience are defiled, and, though washed, returning to them. It is lamented that beauty should be so abused. It is quite misplaced, as a jewel in a swine's snout, with which he roots in the dunghill.

Verse 23

The righteous would have good, only good; all they desire is that it may go well with all about them; they wish no hurt to any, but happiness to all; as to themselves, their desire is to obtain the favour of a good God and to preserve the peace of a good conscience; and good they shall have, that good which they desire, Ps. xxxvii. 4. The wicked expect and desire mischief to others, but it shall return upon themselves; as they loved cursing, they shall have enough of it.

Verse 24

A man may grow rich by prudently spending what he has, may scatter in works of piety, charity, and generosity, and yet may increase; nay, by that means may increase, as the corn is increased by being sown. But it is especially to be ascribed to God; he blesses the giving hand, and so makes it a getting hand, 2 Cor. ix. 10. A man may grow poor by meanly sparing what he has, withholding more than is meet, not paying just debts, not relieving the poor, not providing what is convenient for the family. This tends to poverty, and forfeits the blessing of God.

Verse 25

The liberal soul that prays for the afflicted and provides for them, that scatters blessings with gracious lips and generous hands, that soul shall be made fat with true pleasure and enriched with more grace. He that waters others with the streams of his bounty shall be also watered himself; God will certainly return plentiful showers of his blessing. He that waters, even he shall be as rain (so some read it); he shall be recruited as the clouds are which return after the rain, and shall be further useful.

Verse 26

It is a sin, when corn is dear and scarce, to withhold it, in hopes that it will grow dearer, so to keep up and advance the market, when it is already so high that the poor suffer by it; and at such a time it is the duty of those that have stocks of corn by them to consider the poor, and to be willing to sell at the market-price, to be content with moderate profit.

Verse 27

He that rises early to that which is good (so the word is), that seeks opportunities of serving his friends and relieving the poor, and lays out himself therein, procures favour. All about him love him, and, which is better than life, he has God's loving-kindness. Those that are industrious to do mischief ruin themselves.

Verse 28

Our righteousness will stand us in stead when our riches fail us: The righteous shall then flourish as a branch, the branch of righteousness, like a tree whose leaf shall not wither, Ps. i. 3. When those that take root in the world wither those that are grafted into Christ shall be fruitful and flourishing.

Verse 29

Two extremes in the management of family-affairs are here condemned. 1. Carefulness and carnal policy, on the one hand. There are those that by their anxiety about their business and fretfulness about their losses, and their niggardliness towards their families, trouble their own houses; while others think, by supporting factions and feuds in their families, to serve some turn for themselves. But they will both be disappointed; they will inherit the wind. All they will get by these arts will be empty and worthless as the wind. 2. Carelessness and want of common prudence, on the other. He that is a fool in his business, that minds it not, that has no contrivance and consideration, not only loses his reputation, but becomes a servant to the wise in heart. He is impoverished, while those that manage wisely raise themselves, and come to have dominion over him.

Verse 30

The righteous are as trees of life; the fruits of their piety and charity, their instructions, reproofs, examples, and prayers, their interest in heaven, and their influence upon earth, are like the fruits of that tree, contributing to the nourishment of the spiritual life in many; they are the ornaments of paradise, God's church on earth. The wise are something more; they are as trees of knowledge, commanded to have knowledge. He that is wise, by communicating his wisdom, wins souls, wins them over into the interests of God's kingdom among men. Those that would win souls have need of wisdom to know how to deal with them.

Verse 31

This is the only one of Solomon's proverbs that has that note of attention prefixed to it, Behold! which intimates that it contains not only an evident truth, but an eminent truth. Some understand both parts of "recompence" as displeasure: The righteous, if they do amiss, shall be punished for their offences in this world; much more shall wicked people be punished for theirs, which are committed, not through infirmity, but with a high hand. Others understand it of a "recompence" of reward to the righteous and punishment to sinners. There are some recompences in the earth, in this world; but many sins go unpunished in the earth, and services unrewarded, which indicates that there is a judgment to come. Many times the righteous are recompensed for their righteousness here in the earth, though that is not the only reward intended for them, but whatever the word of God has promised them, or the wisdom of God sees good for them, they shall have in the earth. The wicked also, are sometimes remarkably punished in this life, nations, families, particular persons.

CHAP. XII

Verse 1

Those that have grace will delight in all the instructions that are given them by the word or providence of God; they will value a good education, and think it not a hardship, but a happiness, to be under a strict and prudent discipline. Those show themselves not only void of grace, but void of common sense, that take it as an affront to be told of their faults, and an imposition upon their liberty to be put in mind of their duty. Those that desire to live in loose families and societies, where they may be under no check, are the brutish.

Verse 2

Our Father judges of his children very much by their conduct one to another; and therefore a good man, that is merciful, and charitable, and does good, draws out favour from the Lord by his prayers; but a malicious man, that devises wickedness against his neighbours, he will condemn, as unworthy of a place in his kingdom.

Verse 3

Though men may advance themselves by sinful arts, they cannot by such arts settle and secure themselves. A man shall not be established by wickedness; it may set him in high places, but they are slippery places, Ps. lxxiii. 18. Though good men may have but little of the world, yet what is honestly got will wear well.

Verse 4

He that is blessed with a good wife is as happy as if he were upon the throne, for she is no less than a crown to him. A virtuous woman is pious and prudent, active for the good of her family, makes conscience of her duty, a woman that can bear crosses without disturbance. She is faithful to him and by her example teaches his children and servants to be so too. A bad wife is no better than rottenness in his bones, an incurable disease, besides that she makes him ashamed. She that is silly and slothful, wasteful and wanton, passionate and ill-tongued, ruins both the credit and comfort of her husband.

Verse 5

We mistake if we imagine that thoughts are free; they are under the divine cognizance. A good man may have in his mind bad suggestions, but he does not indulge them and harbour them. It is a man's honour to mean honestly, though a word or action may be misplaced, or mistimed, or at least misinterpreted. But it is a man's shame to act with deceit, with trick and design, not only with a long reach, but with an overreach.

Verse 6

In the foregoing verse the thoughts of the wicked and righteous were compared. Wicked indeed those are whose words are to lie in wait for blood; their tongues are swords to those that stand in their way, to good men whom they hate and persecute. See an instance, Luke xx. 20, 21. Good men speak help to their neighbours: The mouth of the upright is ready to be opened in the cause of those that are oppressed (ch. xxxi. 8).

Verse 7

Turn the wicked, and they are not; they stand in such a slippery place that the least touch of trouble brings them down, like the apples of Sodom, which look fair, but touch them and they go to dust. The prosperity of the righteous will endure. Death will remove them, but their house shall stand, their families shall be kept up.

Verse 8

The best reputation is that which attends virtue and the prudent conduct of life: A man shall be commended not according to his riches or preferments, his craft and subtlety, but according to his wisdom, the honesty of his designs. The worst reproach is that which follows wickedness, that turns aside to crooked ways.

Verse 9

It is the folly of some that they covet to make a great figure abroad, and yet want necessaries at home, and, if their debts were paid, would not be worth a morsel of bread, nay, perhaps, pinch their bellies to put it on their backs, that they may appear very gay, because fine feathers make fine birds. The character of those is every way better who content themselves in a lower sphere, where they are despised for the plainness of their dress, that they may be able to afford themselves, not only necessaries, but conveniences, in their own houses, not only bread, but a servant.

Verse 10

A good man will be merciful. He regards even the life of his beast, not only because it is his servant, but because it is God's creature. The beasts that are under our care must be provided for, must have convenient food and rest. Balaam was checked for beating his ass. The law took care for oxen. A wicked man will be unmerciful; even his tender mercies are cruel; natural compassion is turned into hard-heartedness.

Verse 11

It is men's wisdom to mind their business and follow an honest calling, for that is the way, by the blessing of God, to get a livelihood. Be busy, and that is the true way to be easy. Keep thy shop and thy shop will keep thee. It is men's folly to neglect their business, for then they come to want bread, and make themselves burdensome to others, eating the bread out of other people's mouths.

Verse 12

The care and aim of a wicked man. "Oh that I were but as cunning as such a man, that I had but his art of over-reaching, that I could but take my revenge on one I have spite to as effectually as he can!" A good man desires, to do good and to be fixed and confirmed in doing good. The wicked desires only a net wherewith to fish for himself; the righteous desires to yield fruit for the benefit of others and God's glory, Rom. xiv. 6.

Verse 13

Many a man has paid dearly in this world for the transgression of his lips, and has felt the lash on his back for want of a bridle upon his tongue, Ps. lxiv. 8. The righteous extricate themselves out of trouble by their own wisdom, when God in mercy comes in for their succour.

Verse 14

Even good words will turn to a good account (v. 14): A man shall gain present comfort, inward pleasure which is truly satisfying, by the good he does with his pious discourse and prudent advice. Good works: much more, will be abundantly rewarded.

Verse 15

A fool thinks he is in the right in everything he does, and therefore asks no advice. A wise man is willing to be advised, desires to have counsel given him, and hearkens to counsel, being diffident of his own judgment.

Verse 16

Passion is folly: a wise man may be angry when there is just cause for it, but then he has his anger under check, is lord of his anger, whereas a fool's anger lords it over him. Those that are soon angry, that are quickly put into a flame by the least spark, have not that rule which they ought to have over their own spirits. Meekness is wisdom: A prudent man covers shame. He covers the passion that is in his own breast; he keeps his mouth as with a bridle. It is a kindness to ourselves, and contributes to the repose of our own minds, to extenuate and excuse the injuries and affronts that we receive, instead of aggravating them and making the worst of them.

Verse 17

Here is, 1. A faithful witness representing everything fairly, to the best of his knowledge, whether in judgment or in common conversation, whether he be upon his oath or no, makes it to appear that he is governed and actuated by the principles and laws of righteousness, and he promotes justice by doing honour to it. 2. A false witness condemned for a cheat; he shows forth deceit, and is possessed by a lying spirit.

Verse 18

The tongue is death or life, poison or medicine, as it is used. Slanders, like a sword, wound the reputation of those of whom they are uttered. Whisperings and evil surmises, like a sword, divide and cut asunder the bonds of love and friendship, and separate those that have been dearest to each other. There are words that are curing and healing, closing up those wounds which the backbiting tongue had given, restoring peace, and persuading to reconciliation.

Verse 19

If truth be spoken, it will hold good. What is true will be always true; we may abide by it. A lying tongue will be disproved. The liar, when he comes to be examined, will be found not consistent with himself as he is that speaks truth. Truth may be eclipsed, but it will come to light.

Verse 20

Those that devise mischief deceive themselves. Let them imagine it ever so artfully, deceivers will be deceived. Those that study the things which make for peace and give peaceable advice, promote healing and further the public welfare, will have not only the credit, but the comfort of it. Blessed are the peacemakers.

Verse 21

If men be sincerely righteous, God has engaged that no evil shall happen to them. He will, by the power of his grace in them, keep them so that, though they be tempted, yet they shall not be overcome by the temptation, and though they come into trouble, yet those troubles shall have no evil in them (Ps. xci. 10), for they shall be overruled to work for their good. Those that live in contempt of God and man shall be made miserable with the mischiefs that shall come upon them. Those that delight in mischief shall have enough of it.

Verse 22

Lying is an abomination to the Lord, not only because it is a breach of his law, but because it is destructive to human society. Those that deal truly and sincerely in all their dealings are his delight, and he is well pleased with them.

Verse 23

He that is wise communicates his knowledge when it may turn to the edification of others, but he conceals it when the showing of it would only tend to his own commendation. Prudent men will carefully avoid everything that savours of ostentation. He that is foolish cannot avoid proclaiming his folly.

Verse 24

Industry is the way to preferment. Solomon advanced Jeroboam because he saw that he was an industrious young man, and minded his business, 1 Kings xi. 28. Those that are diligent when they are young will get that which will enable them to rule, and so to rest, when they are old. Knavery is the way to slavery. Those that, because they will not take pains in an honest calling, live by their shifts and arts of dishonesty, are paltry and beggarly, and will be kept under.

Verse 25

The cause and consequence of melancholy is heaviness in the heart; it is a load of care, and fear, and sorrow, upon the spirits; it makes them stoop, prostrates and sinks them. The cure of it: A good word from God, applied by faith, makes it glad: Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee; the good word of God, particularly the gospel, is designed to make the hearts glad that are weary and heavy laden, Matt. xi. 28.

Verse 26

The righteous is more abundant than his neighbour (so the margin); he is richer, though not in this world's goods, yet in the graces and comforts of the Spirit, which are the true riches. There is a true excellency in religion; it ennobles men, inspires them with generous principles. His neighbour may make a greater figure in the world, but the righteous man has the intrinsic worth. Wicked men walk in a way which seduces them. It seems to them to be a pleasant way, but it is all a cheat.

Verse 27

That which may make us hate slothfulness and deceit, for the word here signifies both: The slothful deceitful man has roast meat, but that which he roasts is not what he himself took in hunting. Or, if slothful deceitful men have taken anything by hunting, yet they do not roast it when they have taken it. The substance of a diligent man, though it be not great perhaps, is yet precious. It comes from the blessing of God; he has comfort in it; it does him good, and his family. It is his own daily bread, not bread out of other people's mouths.

Verse 28

Religion is a pathway, a way which God has cast up for us (Isa. xxxv. 8); it is a highway, the king's highway, the King of kings' highway, a way which is tracked before us by all the saints, the good old way, full of the footsteps of the flock. There is not only life at the end, but there is life in the way. In it there is no death, none of that sorrow of the world which works death.

CHAP. XIII

Verse 1

There is great hope of those that have a reverence for their parents, and are willing to be advised and admonished by them. There is little hope of those that will not so much as hear rebuke, but scorn to submit to government and scoff at those that deal faithfully with them. How can those mend a fault who will not be told of it.

Verse 2

Inward comfort and satisfaction will be daily bread. Violence done will recoil in the face of him that does it: The soul of the transgressors that plots mischief, and vents it by word and deed, shall eat violence; they shall have their belly full of it. Every man shall drink as he brews, eat as he speaks; for by our words we must be justified or condemned.

Verse 3

A guard upon the lips is a guard to the soul. He that is cautious, that thinks twice before he speaks once, keeps his soul from a great deal of guilt and grief and saves himself the trouble of many bitter reflections. There is many a one ruined by an ungoverned tongue.

Verse 4

The slothful desire the gains which the diligent get, but they hate the pains which the diligent take; they covet everything that is to be coveted, but will do nothing that is to be done; and therefore it follows, They have nothing; for he that will not labour let him hunger, and let him not eat, 2 Thess. iii. 10. The happiness and honour of the diligent: they shall have abundance. This is especially true in spiritual affairs.

Verse 5

It is the undoubted character of every righteous man that he hates lying (that is, all sin, for every sin is a lie, and particularly all fraud and falsehood in commerce and conversation), not only that he will not tell a lie, but he abhors lying, from a rooted reigning principle of love to truth and justice, and conformity to God. If the wicked man's eyes were opened, and his conscience awakened, he would abhor himself and repent in dust and ashes.

Verse 6

Those that are upright in their way deal sincerely both with God and man, their integrity will keep them from the temptations of Satan, which shall not prevail over them. Those that are wicked, even their wickedness will be their overthrow at last, and they are held in the cords of it in the meantime.

Verse 7

The world is a great cheat. Some that are really poor would be thought to be rich and are thought to be so; they trade and spend as if they were rich, make a great show when perhaps, if all their debts were paid, they are not worth a groat. This is sin, and shame. Some that are really rich would be thought to be poor, because they sordidly and meanly live below what God has given them. In this there is an ingratitude to God, injustice to the family and neighbourhood, and uncharitableness to the poor. There are many presuming hypocrites, that are really poor and empty of grace and yet pretend themselves rich, and will not own their poverty. There are many timorous trembling Christians, that are spiritually rich, and full of grace, and yet think themselves poor, and by their doubts and fears, their complaints and griefs, make themselves poor.

Verse 8

We are apt to judge of men's blessedness, at least in this world, by their wealth, but Solomon shows what a gross mistake it is. Those that are rich, if by some they are respected for their riches, yet by others they are envied and brought in danger of their lives, which therefore they are forced to ransom with their riches. How little is a man beholden to his wealth when it only serves to redeem that life which otherwise would not have been exposed! Those that are poor, if by some, that should be their friends, they are despised and overlooked, yet are despised and overlooked by others that would be their enemies if they had anything to lose.

Verse 9

The light of the righteous rejoices, that is, it increases, and makes them glad. Even their outward prosperity is their joy, and much more those gifts, graces, and comforts, with which their souls are illuminated. The lamp of the wicked burns dimly and faint; it looks melancholy, like a taper in an urn, and it will shortly be put out.

Verse 10

Foolish pride is the great make-bate. Would you know whence come wars and fightings? They come from this root of bitterness. Pride makes men impatient of contradiction, impatient of competition, impatient of contempt, or anything that looks like a slight, and hence arise quarrels among relations and neighbours, quarrels in states and kingdoms, in churches and Christian societies. Men will not forgive, because they are proud. Those that are humble and peaceable will ask and take advice, will consult their own consciences, their Bibles, their ministers, their friends, to preserve quietness and prevent quarrels.

Verse 11

That which is won ill will never wear well. That which is got by such employments as are not lawful, or not becoming Christians, that which is got by gaming, may as truly be said to be gotten by vanity as that which is got by fraud and lying, and will be diminished. That which is got by industry and honesty will grow more, instead of growing less; it will be a maintenance; it will be an inheritance; it will be an abundance.

Verse 12

Nothing is more grievous than the disappointment of a raised expectation, though not in the thing itself by a denial, yet in the time of it by a delay. Nothing is more grateful than to enjoy that, at last, which we have long wished and waited for: It puts men into a sort of paradise, a garden of pleasure, for it is a tree of life. It will make the happiness of heaven the more welcome to the saints that it is what they have earnestly longed for as the crown of their hopes.

Verse 13

Those that prefer the rules of carnal policy before divine precepts, and the allurements of the world and the flesh before God's promises and comforts, despise his word. He that fears the commandment, that stands in awe of God, has a reverence for his word, is afraid of displeasing God and incurring the penalties annexed to the commandment, shall be rewarded for his godly fear.

Verse 14

By the law of the wise we may understand the principles and rules by which they govern themselves: They will be constant springs of comfort, as a fountain of life; the closer we keep to those rules the more effectually we secure our own peace. Those that follow the dictates of this law will escape the snares of death which those run into that forsake the law of the wise.

Verse 15

Those that conduct themselves prudently, and serve Christ, are accepted of God and approved of men, Rom. xiv. 17, 19. The way of sinners is rough and uneasy. It is hard, hard upon others, who complain of it, hard to the sinner himself, who can have little enjoyment of himself while he is doing that which is disobliging to all mankind.

Verse 16

It is wisdom to be cautious: Every prudent discreet man acts with deliberation and is careful not to meddle with that which he has not some knowledge of. It is folly to be rash, as the fool is, who is forward to undertake that which he is no way fit for, and so makes himself ridiculous.

Verse 17

The ill consequences of betraying a trust. A wicked messenger, who, being sent to negotiate any business, is false to him that employed him, will be discovered and punished. The happy effects of fidelity: An ambassador who faithfully discharges his trust, and serves the interests of those who employ him, is health to those by whom and for whom he is employed, heals differences between them; he is health to himself, for he secures his own interest. This is applicable to ministers, Christ's messengers.

Verse 18

He that is so proud that he scorns to be taught will certainly be abased. He that is so humble that he takes it well to be told of his faults shall certainly be exalted: He that regards a reproof, gains respect.

Verse 19

There are in man strong desires of happiness; God has provided for the accomplishment of those desires. The desire of good men towards the favour of God and spiritual blessings brings that which is sweet to their souls, Ps. iv. 6, 7. Yet evil men will not be happy; for it is an abomination to them to depart from evil, which is necessary to their being happy.

Verse 20

Those that would be good must keep good company, which is an evidence for them that they would be good (men's character is known by the company they choose). Multitudes are brought to ruin by bad company.

Verse 21

Whom God pursues he is sure to overtake. They may prosper for a while and grow very secure, but their damnation slumbers not, though they do. The righteous shall be abundantly recompensed for all the good they have done, and all the ill they have suffered, in this world.

Verse 22

A good man's estate lasts. It is part of his praise that he is thoughtful for posterity. He is careful, both by justice and charity, to obtain the blessing of God upon what he has, and to entail that blessing upon his children. If he should not leave them much of this world's goods, his prayers, his instructions, his good example, will be the best entail, and the promises of the covenant will be an inheritance to his children's children, Ps. ciii. 17. God, in his providence, often brings into their hands that which wicked people had laid up for themselves.

Verse 23

A small estate may be improved by industry, so that a man, by making the best of everything, may live comfortably upon it. The less compass the field is of the more let the skill and labour of the owner be employed about it, and it will turn to a very good account. Let him dig, and he need not beg. A great estate may be ruined by indiscretion. Men overbuild themselves or over-buy themselves, keep a better table, or more servants, than they can afford.

Verse 24

To the education of children in that which is good there is necessary a due correction for what is amiss. It is his rod that must be used, the rod of a parent, directed by wisdom and love, and designed for good, not the rod of a servant. It is good to begin the necessary restraints before vicious habits are confirmed. Those really hate their children, though they pretend to be fond of them, that do not keep them under a strict discipline.

Verse 25

It is the happiness of the righteous that they shall have enough and that they know when they have enough. Those that feed on the bread of life, eat, and are filled. It is the misery of the wicked that, through the insatiableness of their own desires, they are always needy; even their belly shall want; their sensual appetite is always craving.

CHAP. XIV

Verse 1

A good wife is a great blessing to a family. By a prudent wife, one that is pious, industrious, and considerate, the affairs of the family are made to prosper, debts are paid, the children well educated and the family has comfort within doors and credit without; thus is the house built. Many a family is brought to ruin by ill housewifery, as well as by ill husbandry. A foolish woman, that has no fear of God, that is wilful, and wasteful, and is all for jaunting and feasting, cards and the playhouse, will as certainly be the ruin of her house as if she plucked it down with her hands.

Verse 2

Grace reigning is a reverence of God, and gives honour to him. Sin reigning is no less than a contempt of God.

Verse 3

Where there is pride in the heart, and no wisdom in the head to suppress it, it commonly shows itself in the words: In the mouth there is pride, proud boasting, proud scorning; this is the rod, or branch, of pride; the word is used only here and Isa. xi. 1. It grows from that root of bitterness which is in the heart. The root must be plucked up, or we cannot conquer this branch. Or it is meant of a smiting beating rod, a rod of pride which strikes others. The lips of the wise shall preserve them from doing that mischief to others which proud men do with their tongues, and from bringing that mischief on themselves which haughty scorners are often involved in.

Verse 4

The neglect of husbandry is the way to poverty: Where no oxen are, to till the ground and tread out the corn, the crib is empty, is clean; there is no straw for the cattle, and consequently no bread for the service of man. The crib indeed is clean from dung, which pleases the neat and nice, that cannot endure husbandry because there is so much dirty work in it, and therefore will sell their oxen to keep the crib clean. This shows the folly of those who addict themselves to the pleasures of the country, but do not mind the business of it, who (as we say) keep more horses than kine, more dogs than swine; their families must needs suffer by it. Those who take pains about their ground are likely to reap the profit of it.

Verse 5

In the administration of justice much depends upon the witnesses, and therefore it is necessary to the common good that witnesses be principled. A witness that is conscientious will not dare to give in a testimony that is in the least untrue. But a witness that will be bribed, and biassed, and browbeaten, will utter lies with as much assurance as if what he said were all true.

Verse 6

The reason why some people seek wisdom, and do not find it, is because they do not seek it from a right principle. They are scorners, and it is in scorn that they ask instruction, that they may ridicule what is told them. He that understands, so as to depart from evil (for that is understanding), to quit his prejudices, to lay aside all corrupt dispositions and affections, will easily apprehend instruction and receive the impressions of it.

Verse 7

A wicked man is a foolish man. We must decline such a one and depart from him. Sometimes the only way we have of reproving wicked discourse is by leaving the company and going out of the hearing of it.

Verse 8

It is not the wisdom of the learned, which consists only in speculation, that is here recommended, but the wisdom of the prudent, which is practical, and is of use to direct our actions. It is to understand our own way, not to be critics and busybodies in other men's matters, but to look well to ourselves and to understand the directions of our way. The bad conduct of a bad man; he puts a cheat upon himself. He does not rightly understand his way; he thinks he does, and so misses his way.

Verse 9

Wicked people are hardened in their wickedness: they make a mock at sin. They make a laughing matter of the sins of others, and they make a light matter of their own sins. Those that make light of sin make light of Christ. Good people, if they in anything offend, presently repent and obtain the favour of God. They have goodwill one to another; and, in their societies, there is mutual charity and compassion in cases of offences, and no mocking.

Verse 10

Every man feels his own burden, especially a burden upon the spirits. We must not censure the griefs of others, for we know not what they feel; their stroke perhaps is heavier than their groaning. Many enjoy divine consolations, which others are not aware of, much less are sharers in.

Verse 11

Sin is the ruin of great families. Righteousness is the rise and stability even of mean families: Even the tabernacle of the upright, though movable and despicable as a tent, shall flourish, if Infinite Wisdom see good.

Verse 12

The way of ignorance and carelessness, the way of sensuality and flesh-pleasing, seem right to those that walk in them, much more the way of hypocrisy in religion, external performances, partial reformations, and blind zeal; this they imagine will bring them to heaven. They will perish with a lie in their right hand. Self-deceivers will prove in the end self-destroyers.

Verse 13

Sometimes when sinners are under convictions, or some great trouble, they dissemble their grief by a forced mirth, because they will not seem to yield. When men really are merry, yet at the same time there is something that casts a damp upon it, their consciences tell them they have no reason to be merry (Hos. ix. 1); they cannot but see the vanity of it. Spiritual joy is seated in the soul; the joy of the hypocrite is but from the teeth outward. The end of that mirth is heaviness.

Verse 14

The backslider in heart, who for fear of suffering, or in hope of profit or pleasure, forsakes God and his duty, shall be filled with his own ways; God will give him enough of them. He that is filthy shall be filthy still. A good man shall be abundantly satisfied from himself, from what God has wrought in him. As sinners never think they have sin enough till it brings them to hell, so saints never think they have grace enough till it brings them to heaven.

Verse 15

It is folly to be credulous, to heed every flying report, to take things upon trust from common fame, and give credit to everyone that will promise payment. The prudent man will try before he trusts.

Verse 16

Holy fear is an excellent guard upon every holy thing, and against everything that is unholy. It is wisdom to depart from evil, to be afraid of coming near the borders of sin or dallying with the beginnings of it. Presumption is folly. He who, when he is warned of his danger, rages and is confident, furiously pushes on, persists in his rebellion, and plays upon the precipice, is a fool.

Verse 17

Men who are peevish and touchy, and are soon angry, say and do that which is ridiculous, and so expose themselves to contempt. A man of wicked devices, who stifles his resentments till he has an opportunity of being revenged, is hated by all mankind. An angry man through the surprise of a temptation disgraces himself, but it is soon over, and he is sorry for it. But that of a spiteful revengeful man is odious; there is no fence against him nor cure for him.

Verse 18

Sin is the shame of sinners: The simple, who love simplicity, get nothing by it; they inherit folly. What they value themselves upon is really foolish. They will for ever rue their own foolish choice. Wisdom is the honour of the wise: The prudent crown themselves with knowledge. Wise heads shall be respected as if they were crowned heads. Wisdom is not only justified, but glorified, of all her children.

Verse 19

The wicked are oftentimes impoverished and brought low, so that they are forced to beg, their wickedness having reduced them to straits; while good men, by the blessing of God, are enriched, and enabled to give, and do give, even to the evil; for where God grants life we must not deny a livelihood.

Verse 20

The poor, who should be pitied, and relieved, is hated, and kept at a distance, even by his own neighbour. Most are swallow-friends, that are gone in winter. It is good having God our friend, for he will not desert us when we are poor. The rich have many friends in hope to get something out of them.

Verse 21

Men's character and condition are measured by their conduct towards their poor neighbours. He that despises his neighbour because he is of a mean extraction, rustic education, and makes but a mean figure, that thinks it below him to take notice of him, is a sinner, and shall be dealt with as a sinner. He that has mercy on the poor, is ready to do all the good offices he can to him, and does that which is pleasing to God.

Verse 22

Those are that not only do evil, but devise it, think that by sinning with craft and carrying on their intrigues with more artifice than others, shall come off better. But they are mistaken. God's justice cannot be outwitted. Those that devise evil against their neighbours greatly err, for it will end in their own ruin. Those that are so liberal as to devise liberal things, that seek opportunities of doing good, and contrive how to make their charity most extensive and most acceptable to those that need it, by liberal things they shall stand, Isa. xxxii. 8.

Verse 23

Industrious people are generally thriving people. The stirring hand gets a penny. Those that love to boast of their business and make a noise about it, and that waste their time in tittle-tattle, waste what they have, and the course they take tends to penury. It is true in the affairs of our souls; those that take pains in the service of God, that strive earnestly in prayer, will find profit in it. But if men's religion runs all out in talk and noise, they will be spiritually poor, and come to nothing.

Verse 24

If men be wise and good, riches make them so much the more honourable and useful, and give them more influence. Those that have wealth, and wisdom to use it, will have a great opportunity of honouring God and doing good in the world. If men be wicked and corrupt, their wealth will but the more expose them.

Verse 25

A faithful witness delivers the souls of the innocent, who are falsely accused, and their good names, which are as dear to them as their lives. A false witness forges lies, and yet pours them out with the greatest assurance imaginable. It is the interest of a nation to detect and punish false-witness-bearing, for truth is the cement of society.

Verses 26–27

The fear of the Lord is here put for all gracious principles, producing gracious practices. Where this reigns it produces security and serenity of mind. It enables a man still to hold fast his peace, and gives him boldness before God and the world. It entails a blessing upon posterity. The children of religious parents often do the better for their parents' instructions and example and fare the better for their faith and prayers. "Our fathers trusted in thee, therefore we will." It is an over-flowing ever-flowing spring of comfort and joy. It is a sovereign antidote against sin and temptation.

Verse 28

Here are two maxims in politics: 1. That it is much for the honour of a king to have a populous kingdom; it is a sign that he rules well, since strangers are hereby invited to come and settle under his protection and his own subjects live comfortably. It is therefore the wisdom of princes, by a mild and gentle government, by encouraging trade and husbandry, to promote the increase of their people. 2. That when the people are lessened the prince is weakened: In the want of people is the leanness of the prince (so some read it); trade lies dead, the ground lies untilled, the army wants to be recruited, the navy to be manned, and all because there are not hands sufficient.

Verse 29

Meekness is wisdom. He rightly understands himself, and the infirmities of human nature, who is slow to anger, and knows how to excuse the faults of others as well as his own, so as by no provocation to be put out of the possession of his own soul. Unbridled passion is folly proclaimed: He that is hasty of spirit, whose heart is tinder to every spark of provocation, that is all fire and tow, thinks to magnify himself, whereas really he exalts his own folly.

Verse 30
Our health depends on the government of our passions and the preserving of the temper of the mind. A healing spirit, made up of love and meekness, a hearty, friendly, cheerful disposition, is the life of the flesh; it contributes to a good constitution of body; people grow fat with good humour. A fretful, envious, discontented spirit, makes the countenance pale, and is the rottenness of the bones.

Verse 31
Whosoever he be that wrongs a poor man, let him know that he puts an affront upon his Maker. God made him, and gave him his being. We have all one Father, one Maker. He reckons himself honoured in the kindnesses that are done them; he takes them as done to himself, and will show himself accordingly pleased with them. I was hungry, and you gave me meat.

Verse 32
A wicked man cleaves so closely to the world that he cannot find in his heart to leave it, but is driven away out of it; his soul is required, is forced from him. He is driven away in his wickedness, dies in his sins. A godly man when he finishes his course, has hope in his death of a happiness on the other side death, of better things in another world than ever he had in this.

Verse 33
Modesty is the badge of wisdom. His wisdom rests in his heart; he digests what he knows, and has it ready to him, but does not make a noise with it. If fools have a little smattering of knowledge, they take all occasions to produce it.

Verse 34
Justice, reigning in a nation, puts an honour upon it. A righteous administration of the government, equity between man and man, public countenance given to religion, charity and compassion to strangers, uphold the throne, elevate the people's minds, and qualify a nation for the favour of God. Vice in a nation puts disgrace upon it: Sin is a reproach to any city or kingdom. The people of Israel were great when they were good, but when they forsook God all about them insulted them and trampled on them.

Verse 35
In a well-ordered court and government smiles and favours are dispensed among those in public trusts according to their merits. Those who behave themselves wisely shall be respected and preferred. No man's services shall be neglected to please a party or a favourite. Those who are selfish and false, who betray their country, oppress the poor, and sow discord, shall be displaced.

CHAP. XV

Verse 1
Peace may be kept by soft words. If wrath be risen like a threatening cloud, pregnant with storms and thunder, a soft answer will disperse it and turn it away. Reason will be better spoken, and a righteous cause better pleaded, with meekness than with passion; hard arguments do best with soft words. Nothing stirs up anger, and sows discord, like grievous words, calling foul names, upbraiding men with their infirmities, or anything that lessens them and makes them mean.

Verse 2
He that has knowledge is not only to enjoy it, for his own entertainment, but use it aright, for the edification of others; and it is the tongue that must make use of it. A wicked heart by the tongue becomes very hurtful; for the mouth of fools belches out foolishness, whilst filthiness, and foolish talking, corrupt good manners.

Verse 3
The eyes of the Lord are in every place; for he not only sees all from on high (Ps. xxxiii. 13), but he is everywhere present. Secret sins, services, and sorrows, are under his eye. He is displeased with the evil and approves of the good. This speaks as much comfort to saints as terror to sinners.

Verse 4
A good tongue is healing to sin-sick souls by convincing them, and reconciling parties at variance; this is the healing of the tongue, which is a tree of life, the leaves of which have a sanative virtue, Rev. xxii. 2. He that knows how to discourse will make the place he lives in a paradise. An evil tongue is wounding.

Verse 5
Let superiors give instruction and reproof to those that are under their charge. They must not only instruct with the light of knowledge, but reprove with zeal; and both these must be done with the authority and affection of a father. It is indeed against the grain with good-humoured men to find fault, and make those about them uneasy; but better so than to suffer them to go on the way to ruin. He that slights his good education is a fool and is likely to live and die one.

Verse 6
Where righteousness is riches are, and the comforts of them. If there be not much of this world's goods, yet where there is grace there is true treasure; and those who have but little, if they have a heart to be therewith content, and to enjoy the comfort of that little, it is enough; it is all riches. Where wickedness is, though there may be riches, yet there is vexation of spirit.

Verse 7
We use knowledge aright when we disperse it, not confine it to a few of our intimates. We must take pains to spread and propagate useful knowledge, must teach some that they may teach others.

Verse 8
God has sacrifices brought him even by wicked men, but their sacrifices, though ever so costly, are not accepted of God, because not offered in sincerity nor from a good principle. God has such a love for upright good people that their prayer is a delight to him.

Verse 9
The sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to God, not for want of some nice points of ceremony, but because the whole course and tenor of their conversation, is wicked.

Verse 10
This shows that those who cannot bear to be corrected must expect to be destroyed. Of all sinners, reproofs are worst resented by apostates.

Verse 11
This confirms what was said (v. 3) concerning God's omnipresence, in order to his judging of evil and good. God knows all things, even those things that are hidden from the eyes of all living. The word here used for destruction is Abaddon, which is one of the devil's names, Rev. ix. 11. That destroyer, though he deceives us, cannot evade or elude the divine cognizance. God sees through all his disguises, Job xxvi. 6. If he sees through the depths and wiles of Satan himself, much more can he search men's hearts. God is greater than our hearts, and knows them better than we know them ourselves, and therefore is an infallible Judge of every man's character, Heb. iv. 13.

Verse 12

A scorner is one that not only makes a jest of God and religion, but bids defiance to the methods employed for his conviction and reformation. He cannot endure to retire into his own heart and commune seriously, nor let his own heart smite him, if he can help it. That man's case is sad who is afraid of arguing with himself. He cannot endure the advice and admonitions of his friends.

Verse 13

Harmless mirth is recommended to us, as that which contributes to the health of the body, making men lively and fit for business, making the face to shine and rendering us pleasant one to another. A cheerful spirit under the government of wisdom and grace, is a great ornament to religion, puts a further lustre upon the beauty of holiness, and makes men the more capable of doing good. Hurtful melancholy is what we are cautioned against, as a great enemy to us, when it has dominion and plays the tyrant. The spirit is broken, and becomes unfit for the service of God.

Verse 14

Here are two things to be wondered at:—A wise man not satisfied with his wisdom, but still seeking the increase of it; the more he has the more he would have. A fool well satisfied with his folly and not seeking the cure of it.

Verse 15

Some are much in affliction, and of a sorrowful spirit, and all their days are evil days. Such are not to be censured or despised, but pitied and prayed for, succoured and comforted. Others are of a cheerful spirit; and they have not only good days, but have a continual feast; and if they serve God with gladness of heart, and it is oil to the wheels of their obedience (all this, and heaven too), then they serve a good Master.

Verses 16–17

Christian contentment, and joy in God, make life easy and pleasant. Cheerfulness of spirit will furnish a man with a continual feast, though he has but little in the world—holiness and love. A little, if we keep a good conscience, and serve God faithfully with the little we have, will be more comfortable, than great treasure and trouble therewith. Those that have great treasure have often great trouble therewith. If those that have great estates would do their duty with them, and then trust God with them, their treasure would not have so much trouble attending it. It is therefore far better to have but a little of the world, to keep up communion with God, and enjoy him in it, and live by faith, than to have the greatest plenty and live without God in the world. If brethren dwell together in unity, if they are friendly, and hearty, and pleasant, that will make a dinner of herbs a feast sufficient. Love will sweeten it and they may be as merry over it as if they had all dainties. If there be mutual enmity and strife, though there be a whole ox for dinner, a fat ox, there can be no comfort in it; the leaven of malice, of hating and being hated, is enough to sour it all.

Verse 18

Anger strikes the fire which sets cities and churches into a flame: A wrathful man, with his peevish passionate reflections, gives occasion to others to quarrel. He that is slow to anger not only prevents strife, but if it be already kindled, brings water to the flame, unites those again that have fallen out, and by gentle methods brings them to mutual concessions for peace-sake.

Verse 19

Those that have no heart to their work pretend that they cannot do their work without a great deal of hardship and danger; and therefore they go about it with as much reluctance as if they were to go barefoot through a thorny hedge. An honest desire and endeavour to do our duty will, by the grace of God, make it easy, and we shall find it strewed with roses.

Verse 20

Good children are the joy of their parents, who ought to have joy of them, having taken so much care and pains about them. And it adds much to the satisfaction of those that are good if they have reason to think that they have been a comfort to their parents in their declining years. Wicked children put contempt upon their parents, slight their authority, and make an ill requital for their kindness.

Verse 21

A wicked man sins, not only without regret, but with delight. A fool walks by no rule, acts with no sincerity or steadiness; but a man of understanding, the eyes of whose understanding are enlightened by the Spirit, walks uprightly, lives a regular life, and studies in everything to conform himself to the will of God.

Verse 22

If men will not take time and pains to deliberate with themselves, or are so confident of their own judgment that they scorn to consult with others, they are not likely to bring anything considerable to pass; circumstances defeat them which, with a little consultation, might have been foreseen and obviated.

Verse 23

We speak wisely when we speak seasonably: when it is needed, and, as we say, hits the joint. Many a good word comes short of doing the good it might have done, for want of being well-timed.

Verse 24

The way of wisdom and holiness is the way of life, the way that leads to eternal life. Be wise and live. It is the way to escape from hell beneath. A good man sets his affections on things above, and deals in those things. His conversation is in heaven; his way leads directly thither; there his treasure is, above, out of the reach of enemies, above the changes of this lower world.

Verse 25

The proud, that magnify themselves, and trample on all about them, are such as God will destroy, not them only, but their houses. Those that are dejected God delights to support. He will establish the border which the poor widow is not herself able to defend and make good.

Verse 26

The thoughts of wicked men, for the most part, are such as God hates, and are an offence to him, who not only knows the heart and all that passes and repasses there, but requires the innermost and uppermost place in it. The thoughts and words of the pure may be understood both of their devotions to God and of their discourses with men. Both are pleasant when they come from a pure, a purified, heart.

Verse 27

He that is greedy of gain, and makes himself a slave to the world, hurries, and puts himself and all about him upon the stretch, frets and vexes at every loss and disappointment, and quarrels with everybody that stands in the way of his profit—is a burden and vexation to his children and servants. Those that are generous entail a blessing upon their families; He that abhors all sinful indirect ways of getting money—that hates to be paltry and mercenary, and is willing, if there be occasion, to do good gratis—he shall have the comfort of life; his name and family shall live and continue.

Verse 28

It is the character of a righteous man that being convinced of the account he must give of his words, and of the good and bad influence of them upon others, he makes conscience of speaking truly (it is his heart that answers, he speaks as he thinks, Ps. xv. 2), and of speaking pertinently and profitably, and therefore he studies to answer, that his speech may be with grace, Neh. ii. 4; v. 7. A wicked man never heeds what he says, but his mouth pours out evil things, to the dishonour of God and religion.

Verse 29

God sets himself at a distance from those that set him at defiance. He will draw nigh to those in a way of mercy who draw nigh to him in a way of duty.

Verse 30

It is pleasant to have a good prospect, to see the light of the sun (Eccles. xi. 7) and by it to see the wonderful works of God, with which this lower world is beautiful and enriched. The consideration of this should make us thankful for our eyesight. It is also very comfortable to hear (as some understand it) a good report concerning others; a good man has no greater joy than to hear that his friends walk in the truth.

Verse 31

The ear that can take the reproof will love the reprover. Faithful friendly reproofs are here called the reproofs of life because they are means of spiritual life. Those that learn well, and obey well, are likely in time to teach well and rule well.

Verse 32

Those who refuse correction (margin) despise their own souls. The fundamental error of sinners is undervaluing their own souls; therefore they wrong the soul to please the body. He that hears reproof, and amends the faults, gets understanding, by which his soul is secured from bad ways and directed in good ways.

Verse 33

An awe of God upon our spirits will put us upon the wisest counsels and chastise us when we say or do unwisely. Where there is humility there is a happy presage of honour and preparative for it.

CHAP. XVI

Verse 1

In short, 1. Man purposes. He has a freedom of thought and a freedom of will permitted him; let him form his projects, and lay his schemes, as he thinks best: but, after all, 2. God disposes. Man cannot go on with his business without the assistance and blessing of God, who made man's mouth and teaches us what we shall say.

Verse 2

We are all apt to be partial in judging of ourselves. The judgment of God concerning us is according to truth: He weighs the spirits in a just and unerring balance, knows what is in us, and passes a judgment upon us accordingly, and by his judgment we must stand or fall.

Verse 3

The only way to have our thoughts established is to commit our works to the Lord. The great concerns of our souls must be committed to the grace of God. All our outward concerns must be committed to the providence of God, and to the sovereign, wise, and gracious disposal of that providence. Roll thy works upon the Lord (so the word is); roll the burden of thy care from thyself upon God.

Verse 4

God is the first cause. Even the wicked are his creatures, though they are rebels; he gave them those powers with which they fight against him. God is the last end. All is of him and from him, and therefore all is to him and for him.

Verse 5

The pride of sinners sets God against them. The power of sinners cannot secure them against God, though they strengthen themselves with both hands. Though they strengthen one another with their confederacies and combinations, joining forces against God, they shall not escape his righteous judgment.

Verse 6

The guilt of sin is taken away from us—by the mercy and truth of God, in Jesus Christ the Mediator, and not by the legal sacrifices, Mic. vi. 7, 8. The power of sin is broken in us. The corrupt inclinations are purged out. By the fear of the Lord, and the influence of that fear, men depart from evil; those will not dare to sin against God who keep up in their minds a holy dread and reverence of him.

Verse 7

God can turn foes into friends when he pleases. He that has all hearts in his hand can make a man's enemies to be at peace with him. He will do it for us when we please him. God made Esau to be at peace with Jacob, Abimelech with Isaac.

Verse 8

A small estate, honestly come by, which a man is content with, serves God with cheerfully, and puts to a right use, is much more valuable than a great estate ill-got, and then ill-kept or ill-spent. It carries with it more inward satisfaction, a better reputation with all that are wise and good; it will last longer, and will turn to a better account in the great day, when men will be judged, not according to what they had, but what they did.

Verse 9

Man is a reasonable creature, that has the faculty of contriving for himself. But as a depending creature, he is subject to the direction and dominion of his Maker. If men devise their way, so as to make God's glory their end and his will their rule, they may expect that he will direct their steps by his Spirit and grace, so that they shall not miss their way nor come short of their end. Lord, direct my way, 1 Thess. iii. 11.

Verse 10

It may be read as a precept to the kings and judges of the earth to be wise and instructed. Let them be just, and rule in the fear of God. It may be taken as a promise to all good kings, that if they sincerely aim at God's glory, and seek direction from him, he will qualify them with wisdom and grace above others, in proportion to the eminency of their station and the trusts lodged in their hands.

Verse 11

The administration of public justice by the magistrates is an ordinance of God; in it the scales are held, and ought to be held by a steady and impartial hand. The observance of justice in commerce between man and man is likewise a divine appointment.

Verse 12

A good king not only does justice, but it is an abomination to him to do otherwise. He hates the thought of doing wrong and perverting justice. He that makes conscience of using his power aright shall find that to be the best security of his government, and it will obtain the blessing of God, a basis to the throne and a strong guard about it.

Verse 13

Good kings hate parasites and those that flatter them. They not only do righteousness themselves, but take care to employ those under them that do righteousness too. A good king will therefore put those in power who are conscientious, and will say that which is righteous and discreet.

Verse 14–15

These two verses show the power of kings, which is everywhere great, but was especially so in those eastern countries, where they were absolute and arbitrary. We have reason to bless God for the happy constitution of the government we live under, which maintains the prerogative of the prince without any injury to the liberty of the subject. But here it is intimated. 1. How formidable the wrath of a king is: It is as messengers of death; the wrath of Ahasuerus was so to Haman. An angry word from an incensed prince has been to many a messenger of death. He must be a very wise man that knows how to pacify the wrath of a king with a world fitly spoken, as Jonathan once pacified his father's rage against David, 1 Sam. xix. 6. 2. How valuable and desirable the king's favour is to those that have incurred his displeasure; it is life from the dead if the king be reconciled to them. To others it is as a cloud of the latter rain, very refreshing to the ground. Those are fools who to escape the wrath, and obtain the favour, of an earthly prince, will throw themselves out of God's favour.

Verse 16

Heavenly wisdom is better than worldly wealth, and to be preferred before it. Grace is more valuable than gold. Grace is the gift of God's peculiar favour; gold only of common providence. Grace is for the soul and eternity; gold only for the body and time. Grace will stand us in stead in a dying hour, when gold will do us no good. There is vanity and vexation of spirit in getting wealth, but joy and satisfaction of Spirit in getting wisdom. Great peace have those that love it.

Verse 17

It is the way of the upright to avoid sin, and this is a highway marked out by authority, tracked by many that have gone before us. It is the care of the upright to preserve their souls. Those that adhere to their duty secure their felicity. Keep thy way and God will keep thee.

Verse 18

Pride will have a fall. It is the act of justice that those who have lifted up themselves should be laid low. Pharaoh, Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, were instances of this. When proud men set God's judgments at defiance, it is a sign that they are at the door, witness the case of Benhadad and Herod. Therefore let us not fear the pride of others, but greatly fear pride in ourselves.

Verse 19

Those that are proud and will put forth themselves that thrust, and shove, and scramble, for preferment, are the men that commonly divide the spoil and share it among them. Humility, while it recommends us to the favour of God, qualifies us for his gracious visits, secures us from many temptations, and preserves the quiet and repose of our own souls, is much better than that high-spiritedness which, though it carry the honour and wealth of the world, makes God a man's enemy and the devil his master.

Verse 20

Prudence gains men respect and success: but it is piety only that will secure men's true happiness. Some read the former part of the verse as of piety, which is indeed true wisdom: He that attends to the word (the word of God, ch. xiii. 13) shall find good in it and good by it. And whoso trusts in the Lord is happy.

Verse 21

Those that have solid wisdom will have the credit of it; and a deference will be paid to their judgment. Those that with their wisdom deliver their sentiments easily and with a good grace, increase learning; they diffuse and propagate knowledge to others, and do good with it, and by that means increase their own stock. To him that has, and uses what he has, more shall be given.

Verse 22

There is always some good to be gotten by a wise and good man. His understanding is a spring of life to himself; within his own thoughts he entertains and edifies himself, if not others. There is nothing that is good to be gotten by a fool.

Verse 23

Solomon had commended eloquence, or the sweetness of the lips (v. 21), and seemed to prefer it before wisdom; but here he corrects himself, as it were, and shows that unless there be a good treasure within to support the eloquence it is worth little. Wisdom in the heart is the main matter. Quaint expressions please the ear, and humour the fancy, but it is learning that must convince the judgment and sway that, to which wisdom in the heart is necessary.

Verse 24

The pleasant words here commended must be those which the heart of the wise teaches, and adds learning to (v. 23), words of seasonable advice, instruction, and comfort, words taken from God's word, for that is it which Solomon had learned from his father to account sweeter than honey and the honey-comb, Ps. xix. 10. Many things are pleasant that are not profitable, but these pleasant words are health to the bones, to the inward man, as well as sweet to the soul.

Verse 25

This we had before (ch. xiv. 12), but here it is repeated, 1. By way of caution to us all to be impartial in self-examination. 2. By way of terror to those whose way is not right, however it may seem to themselves or others.

Verse 26

This is designed to engage us to diligence, and quicken us, both in our worldly business and in the work of religion; for in the original it is, The soul that labours for itself. It is heart-work which is here intended, the labour of the soul. If we make religion our business, God will make it our blessedness.

Verses 27–28

There are those that are not only vicious themselves, but spiteful and mischievous to others, and they are the worst of men. They dig up evil; they take a great deal of pains to find out something or other on which to ground a slander. If none appear above ground they will dig for it, by diving into what is secret, or looking a great way back, or by evil suspicions and surmises, and forced innuendos. In the lips of a slanderer and backbiter there is as a fire, to brand his neighbour's reputation. A froward man, that cannot find in his heart to love anybody but himself, is vexed to see others live in love, and therefore makes it his business to sow strife, by telling lies, and carrying ill-natured stories between chief friends, so as to separate them one from another. Those are bad men, and bad women, too, that do such ill offices; they are doing the devil's work.

Verse 29

Evil men described to us, that we may neither do like them nor have anything to do with them. They are violent men, that do all by rapine and oppression, that shut their eyes, meditating with the closest application to devise froward things, to contrive how they may do the greatest mischief to their neighbour. Then moving their lips, giving the word of command to their agents, they bring the evil to pass. Such do all they can to entice others to join in doing mischief, leading them in a way that is not good, but offensive to God.

Verse 31

Let old people be old disciples. If old people be found in the way of righteousness, their age will be their honour. Old age, as such, is honourable, and commands respect but, if it be found in the way of wickedness, its honour is forfeited, its crown laid in the dust, Isa. lxv. 20. Grace is the glory of old age.

Verse 32

The grace of meekness is to be slow to anger, not easily put into a passion, nor apt to resent provocation, so slow in our motions towards anger that we may be quickly stopped and pacified. It is to have the rule of our own spirits, particularly our passions. He that gets and keeps the mastery of his passions is better than the mighty. Behold, a greater than Alexander or Cæsar is here. The conquest of our own unruly passions, requires more true wisdom, and a more steady management, than the obtaining of a victory over an enemy. No lives or treasures are sacrificed to it. It is harder to quash an insurrection at home than to resist an invasion from abroad; such are the gains of meekness that by it we are more than conquerors.

Verse 33

Nothing comes to pass by chance, nor is an event determined by a blind fortune, but everything by the will and counsel of God. All the disposals of Providence concerning our affairs we must look upon to be the directing of our lot, the determining of what we referred to God, and we must be reconciled to them accordingly.

CHAP. XVII

These words recommend family-love and peace, as conducing very much to the comfort of human life. Those that live in unity and quietness, and that study to make themselves obliging to one another, live very comfortably, though they work hard and fare hard, though they have but each of them a morsel, and that a dry morsel. There may be peace and quietness where there are not three meals a day, provided there be a joint satisfaction in God's providence and a mutual satisfaction in each other's prudence. Holy love may be found in a cottage. Those that live in contention, that are always jarring and brawling, though they have plenty of dainties, live uncomfortably; they cannot expect the blessing of God upon them. Love will sweeten a dry morsel, but strife will sour and embitter a house full of sacrifices.

Verse 2

True merit does not go by dignity. Sometimes it so happens that the servant is wise, and a blessing and credit to the family, when the son is a fool, and a shame to the family. True dignity will go by merit. A prudent servant may perhaps come to have such an interest in his master as to be taken in for a child's share of the estate and to have part of the inheritance among the brethren.

Verse 3

As the fining-pot is for silver, both to prove it and to improve it, so the Lord tries the hearts; he searches whether they are standard or no, and those that are he refines and makes purer, Jer. xvii. 10. God tries the heart by affliction (Ps. lxvi. 10, 11), and often chooses his people in that furnace (Isa. xlviii. 10) and makes them choice. It is God only that tries the hearts. Men have no such way of trying one another's hearts.

Verse 4

Those that design to do ill support themselves by falsehood and lying: A wicked doer gives ear, with a great deal of pleasure, to false lips, that will justify him in the ill he does. Sinners will strengthen one another's hands.

Verse 5

Those who trample upon the poor, who ridicule their wants, reproach their Maker, who owns them, and takes care of them, and can, when he pleases, reduce us to that condition. He that is glad at calamities, that he may be built up upon the ruins of others, and regales himself with the judgments of God when they are abroad, let him know that he shall not go unpunished.

Verse 6

It is an honour to a man to live so long as to see his children's children (Ps. cxxviii. 6; Gen. l. 23), to see his house built up in them, and to see them likely to serve their generation according to the will of God. This crowns and completes their comfort in this world. It is an honour to children to have wise and godly parents, and to have them continued to them even after they have themselves grown up and settled in the world.

Verse 7

A fool, in Solomon's proverbs, signifies a wicked man, whom excellent speech does not become, because his conversation gives the lie to his excellent speech. If it is unbecoming a despicable man to presume to speak as a philosopher or politician, much more unbecoming is it for a prince, for a man of honour, to take advantage from the confidence that is put in him to lie, and dissemble, and make no conscience of breaking his word.

Verse 8

Rich men value a little money as if it were a precious stone, and value themselves on it as if it gave them not only ornament, but power, and everyone were bound to be at their beck, even justice itself. Whithersoever they turn this sparkling diamond they expect it should dazzle the eyes of all, and make them do just what they would have them do in hopes of it.

Verse 9

The way to preserve peace among relations and neighbours is to make the best of everything, not to tell others what has been said or done against them when it is not necessary to their safety, nor to take notice of what has been said or done against ourselves, but to excuse both, and put the best construction upon them. "It was an oversight; therefore overlook it. It was done through forgetfulness; therefore forget it."

Verse 10

A word is enough to the wise. Stripes are not enough for a fool, to make him sensible of his errors, that he may repent of them.

Verse 11

He is an evil man indeed that seeks all occasions to rebel against God, and the government God has set over him, and to contradict and quarrel with those about him. A rebellious man seeks mischief (so some read it), watches all opportunities to disturb the public peace. Because he will not be reclaimed by mild and gentle methods, a cruel messenger shall be sent against him, some dreadful judgment or other, as a messenger from God.

Verse 12

A passionate man is a brutish man in his passion ungoverned, and a fool in his folly. He is a dangerous man, falls foul of everyone that stands in his way, even the innocent. A bear robbed of her whelps sets upon the first man she meets as the robber. Ira furor brevis est—Anger is temporary madness. One may more easily guard against an enraged bear, than an outrageous angry man.

Verse 13

A malicious mischievous man is ungrateful to his friends. To render evil for evil is brutish, but to render evil for good is devilish. He is unkind to his family, for he entails a curse upon it.

Verse 14

The danger in the beginning of strife. One hot word begets another, and so on, till it proves like the cutting of a dam; when the water has got a little passage it does itself widen the breach, and there is then no stopping it. Take heed of the first spark of contention and put it out as soon as it appears.

Verse 15

When those that are entrusted with the administration of public justice, do either acquit the guilty or condemn those that are not guilty, this defeats the end of government, which is to protect the good and punish the bad.

Verse 16

God's great goodness to foolish men, in putting a price into his hand to get wisdom. We have rational souls, the means of grace, the strivings of the Spirit, access to God by prayer; we have time and opportunity. Good parents, relations, ministers, friends, are helps to get wisdom. It is a price, therefore of value. We have reason to wonder that God should entrust us with such advantages. Man's neglect of God's favour and his own interest, is absurd and unaccountable: He has no part to it.

Verse 17

Friends must be constant to each other at all times. That is not true friendship which is not constant. Swallow-friends fly to you in summer, but are gone in winter. But if I love my friend because he is wise, and good, though he fall into poverty and disgrace, still I shall love him. Christ is a friend that loves at all times (John xiii. 1) and we must so love him, Rom. viii. 35. Relations must in a special manner be tender of one another in affliction: A brother is born to succour a brother or sister in distress. Some take it thus: A friend that loves at all times is born (that is, becomes) a brother in adversity, and is so to be valued.

Verse 18

It is wisdom to keep out of debt as much as may be, especially to dread suretiship. Those that are void of understanding are commonly taken in this snare, to the prejudice of their families.

Verse 19

He that loves strife, that in his worldly business loves to go to law, in religion loves controversies, and in common conversation loves to fall out, he loves transgression. He pretends to stand up for truth, and for his right, but really he loves sin. Those that are ambitious expose themselves to trouble. He that exalts his gate, builds a stately house, at least a fine frontispiece, that he may outshine his neighbours, seeks his own destruction.

Verse 20

He that has a froward heart, that sows discord and is full of resentment, cannot take any rational satisfaction in it; he finds no good. He that has a perverse tongue, spiteful and abusive, scurrilous or backbiting, loses his friends, provokes his enemies, and pulls trouble upon his own head.

Verse 21

There was joy when a man-child was born into the world, and yet, if he prove vicious, his own father will wish he had never been born. The name of Absalom signifies his father's peace, but he was his greatest trouble. The father of a fool lays that so much to heart that he has no joy of anything else.

Verse 22

It is healthful to be cheerful. The Lord is for the body, and has provided for it, not only meat, but medicine, and has here told us that the best medicine is a merry heart, not a heart addicted to vain, carnal, sensual mirth. God gives us leave to be cheerful and cause to be cheerful, especially if by his grace he gives us hearts to be cheerful. This does good to a medicine (so some read it); it will make physic more efficient. Or it does good as a medicine to the body, making it easy and fit for business. The sorrows of the mind often contribute to the sickliness of the body: A broken spirit, sunk by the burden of afflictions, and especially a conscience wounded with the sense of guilt, dries the bones.

Verse 23

He is a wicked man that will take a gift to engage him to give a false testimony, verdict, or judgment; he is ashamed of it, for he takes it, with all the secrecy imaginable, out of the bosom where he knows it is laid ready for him; it is industriously concealed. The course of justice is not only obstructed but turned into injustice.

Verse 24
An intelligent man lays his wisdom before him, as his card and compass which he steers by, has his eye always upon it. He that has a roving rambling fancy, will never be fit for any solid business, and cannot fix his thoughts to one subject nor pursue any one purpose with steadiness.

Verse 25
Wicked children are an affliction to both their parents. They are an occasion of anger to the father (so the word signifies), because they contemn his authority, but of sorrow and bitterness to the mother, because they abuse her tenderness.

Verse 26
Let magistrates see to it that they never punish the just. When princes become tyrants and persecutors their thrones will be neither easy nor firm. Let subjects not find fault with the government for doing its duty, for it is a wicked thing to strike princes for equity, by defaming their administration.

Verse 27
A gracious spirit is a precious spirit, and renders a man amiable and more excellent than his neighbour. He is of a cool spirit (so some read it), not heated with passion. A cool head with a warm heart is an admirable composition. He that has knowledge, and aims to do good with it, is careful, when he does speak to speak to the purpose. He spares his words, because they are better spared than ill-spent.

CHAP. XVIII

Verse 1
The original here is difficult. Some take it as a rebuke to an affected singularity. When men take a pride in separating themselves from the sentiments and society of others, in contradicting all that has been said and advancing new notions of their own, it is to gratify a desire of vain-glory, and they are seekers and meddlers and pretend to pass a judgment upon every man's matter. Our translation seems to take it as an excitement to diligence in the pursuit of wisdom. If we would get knowledge or grace, we must desire it, and must separate ourselves from all those things which would retard us in the pursuit, retire out of the noise of this world's vanities, and then seek and intermeddle with all the means and instructions of wisdom, and be acquainted with a variety of opinions, that we may prove all things and hold fast that which is good.

Verse 2
A fool may pretend to understanding but he has no true delight in it. He does not love his book, nor his business, nor his Bible, nor his prayers; he would rather be playing the fool with his sports. He has no good design in it, only that his heart may discover itself, that he may have something to make a show with, because he loves to hear himself talk.

Verse 3
This may include a double sense: 1. Wicked people are scornful people, and put contempt upon others. When the wicked comes into any company, into schools of wisdom or into assemblies for worship, then comes contempt of God, of his people and ministers, and of everything that is said and done. 2. Wicked people are shameful people, and bring contempt upon themselves, for God has said that those who despise him shall be lightly esteemed.

Verse 4
An intelligent man has in him a treasure of useful things, which furnishes him with something to say that is pertinent and profitable. This is as deep waters, which make no noise, but never run dry. The words of such a man's mouth are as a flowing brook. What he sees cause to speak flows naturally. It is clean and fresh.

Verse 5
This justly condemns those who, being employed in the administration of justice, pervert judgment, conniving at men's crimes because of their dignity or wealth. The merits of the cause must be regarded, not the person.

Verses 6–7
A fool's lips enter into contention by advancing foolish notions which others oppose, and so a quarrel is begun. Proud, and passionate men, and drunkards, are fools, whose lips enter into contention. The fool's mouth does, in effect, call for strokes; he has said that which deserves to be punished with strokes. They involve themselves in ruin: A fool's mouth, which has been, or would have been, the destruction of others, proves at length his own destruction.

Verse 8
Tale-bearers are those who secretly carry stories from house to house, told with design to blast reputation, to break friendship, to make mischief between relations. Now the words of such are here said to be, Like as when men are wounded (so the margin reads it); they pretend that it is with the greatest grief and reluctance that they speak of them. They look as if they themselves were wounded by it, whereas really they are fond of the story, and tell it with pride and pleasure. Thus their words seem; but they go down as poison into the innermost parts of the belly. The words of the tale-bearer wound him of whom they are spoken, his credit and interest, and him to whom they are spoken, his love and charity.

Verse 9
Those are justly branded as fools who are wasters of their estates, who live above what they have. Idleness is no better. He that is remiss in his work, whose hands hang down (so the word signifies), that stands, as we say, with his thumbs in his mouth, is own brother to him that is a prodigal. One scatters what he has, the other lets it run through his fingers.

Verse 10
Here is God's sufficiency for the saints: His name is a strong tower for them, in which they may take rest when they are weary and take sanctuary when they are pursued. The wealth laid up in this tower is enough to enrich them. The strength of this tower is enough to protect them.

Verse 11
The rich man has his portion and treasure in the things of this world. His wealth is as much his confidence, and he expects as much from it, as a godly man from his God. He makes his wealth his city, where he rules, with a great deal of self-complacency, and sets danger at defiance, as if nothing could hurt him. His scales are his pride; his wealth is his wall, and he thinks it a high wall, which cannot be scaled. Herein he cheats himself. It is a strong city, and a high wall, but it is so only in his own conceit.

Verse 12
Pride is the presage of ruin, and ruin will at last be the punishment of pride. Humility is the presage of honour, and honour shall at length be the reward of humility.

Verse 13

Some take a pride in being quick. They answer a matter before they hear it. When they have heard one side, they think the matter so plain that they need not trouble themselves to hear the other. Whereas, though a ready wit is an agreeable thing to play with, it is solid judgment and sound wisdom that do business. It is folly for a man to pass sentence upon a matter which he has not patience to make a strict enquiry into.

Verse 14

Many infirmities, many calamities, we are liable to in this world, in body, name, and estate, which a man may bear if he have but good courage, and act with reason and resolution, especially if he have a good conscience. If the spirit of a man will sustain the infirmity, much more will the spirit of a Christian, or rather the Spirit of God witnessing and working with our spirits in a day of trouble.

Verse 15

The more prudent a man is the more inquisitive will he be after knowledge, the knowledge of God and his duty, and the way to heaven, for that is the best knowledge. We must get knowledge, not only into our heads, but into our hearts.

Verse 16

A man's gift, if he be in prison, may procure his enlargement. Or, if a mean man know not how to get access to a great man, he may do it by a fee to his servants or a present to himself; those will make room for him. It will bring him to sit among great men, in honour and power. See how corrupt the world is when men's gifts will do that for them which their merits will not do, though ever so great.

Verse 17

This shows that one tale is good till another is told. He that speaks first will be sure to tell a story so that his cause shall appear good, whether it really be so or no. The defendant should be heard and perhaps may make the matter appear quite otherwise than it did. We must therefore remember that we have two ears, to hear both sides before we give judgment.

Verse 18

Contentions commonly happen among the mighty, that are confident of their being able to make their part good and therefore will hardly condescend to the necessary terms of an accommodation; whereas those that are poor are forced to be peaceable, and sit down losers. Even the contentions of the mighty may be ended by lot if they cannot otherwise be compromised.

Verse 19

Great care must be taken to prevent quarrels among relations, and those that are under special obligation to each other, because they are most unnatural and unbecoming. Great pains must be taken to compromise matters in variance between relations, with all speed, because it is a work of much difficulty.

Verse 20

Our comfort depends very much upon the testimony of our own consciences, for us or against us. The belly is here put for the conscience, as ch. xx. 27. The testimony of our consciences will be for us, or against us, according as we have or have not governed our tongues well. According as the fruit of the mouth is good or bad, so the character of the man is, and consequently the testimony of his conscience concerning him.

Verse 21

Many a one has been his own death by a foul tongue, or the death of others by a false tongue; and, on the contrary, many a one has saved his life by a prudent gentle tongue, and saved the lives of others by intercession for them.

Verse 22

A good wife is a great blessing to a man. He that finds a wife (that is, a wife indeed; a bad wife does not deserve to be called by a name of so much honour), that finds a help meet for him (that is a wife in the original acceptation of the word), has found that which will not only contribute more than anything to his comfort in this life, but will forward him in the way to heaven. God is to be acknowledged in it with thankfulness.

Verse 23

Poverty, though many inconveniences to the body attend it, has often a good effect upon the spirit, for it makes men humble. It teaches them to use entreaties. It tells them they must take what is given them and be thankful. At the throne of God's grace we are all poor, and must use entreaties. A prosperous condition, though it has many advantages, has often this mischief attending it, that it makes men proud, haughty and imperious. It is very foolish humour of some rich men, especially those who have risen from little, that they think it becomes them to answer roughly, whereas gentlemen ought to be gentle, James iii. 17.

Verse 24

Would we have friends and keep them, we must not only not affront them, but we must love them. We may promise ourselves a great deal of comfort in a true friend. Sometimes there is a friend, that is nothing akin to us, the bonds of whose esteem and love prove stronger than those of nature. Christ is a friend to all believers that sticks closer than a brother.

CHAP. XIX

Verse 1

1. The credit and comfort of a poor man: Let him be honest and walk in integrity, let him keep a good conscience, let him speak and act with sincerity when he is under the greatest temptations to break his word, and then let him value himself upon that, for all wise and good men will value him. 2. The shame of a rich man, notwithstanding all his pomp. If he have a shallow head and an evil tongue he is a fool.

Verse 2

To be without the knowledge of the soul is not good, so some read it. He that hastes with his feet (that does things inconsiderately and with precipitation, and will not take time to ponder the path of his feet) sins. As good not know as not consider.

Verse 3

The foolishness of man perverts his way. Men meet with crosses and disappointments in their affairs, and it is owing to themselves and their own folly; it is their own iniquity that corrects them. When they have done so they lay the blame upon God, and their hearts fret against him, as if he had done them wrong, whereas really they wrong themselves.

Verse 4

Wealth enables a man to send many presents, and do many good offices, and so gains him many friends, who flatter him, but really love what he has.

He, who while he prospered, was beloved and respected, if he fall into poverty is separated from his neighbour, is not owned nor looked upon, is bidden to keep his distance and told he is troublesome.

Verse 5

Men teach their tongues to speak lies, Jer. ix. 5. Those that will take a liberty to tell lies in discourse are in a fair way to be guilty of the greater wickedness of false-witness-bearing, whenever they are tempted to it, though they seemed to detest it. But it shall not escape the righteous judgment of God, who is jealous, and will not suffer his name to be profaned.

Verses 6–7

The prince that has power in his hand, and preferments at his disposal, has his antechamber thronged with petitioners, ready to adore him for what they can get. How earnest then should we be for the favour of God, which is far beyond that of any earthly prince. But, it should seem, liberality will go further than majesty itself to gain respect, for every man is a friend to him that gives gifts. Those that are accounted benefactors exercise an authority which may give them an opportunity of doing good, Luke xxii. 25. Those that are poor and low are slighted and despised. It should not be so; we must honour all men, even under their greatest abasements. All the brethren of the poor do hate him; even his own relations look upon him as a blemish to their family; and then others of his friends, that were nothing akin to him, go far from him, to get out of his way. He pursues them with words, hoping to prevail with them by his importunity to be kind to him, but all in vain; they have nothing for him. Let poor people therefore make God their friend, pursue him with their prayers, and he will not be wanting to them.

Verse 8

Get wisdom, get knowledge, and grace, and acquaintance with God; those that do so, show that they love their own souls, and will be found to have done themselves the greatest kindness imaginable. He that keeps understanding shall certainly find good, all good.

Verse 9

We have need to be again and again warned of the danger of the sin of lying and false-witness-bearing. His punishment shall be such as will be his destruction: he shall perish. It is a damning destroying sin.

Verse 10

Pleasure and liberty ill become a fool. A man that has not wisdom and grace has no right nor title to true joy, and therefore it is unseemly. Power and honour ill become a man of a servile spirit. None are so insolent and intolerable as a beggar on horseback, a servant when he reigns, ch. xxx. 22.

Verse 11

A wise man will observe these two rules about his anger: 1. Not to be over-hasty in his resentments: Discretion teaches us to defer our anger till we have thoroughly considered all the merits of the provocation, and then to defer the prosecution of it till there be no danger of running into any indecencies. Plato said to his servant, "I would beat thee, but that I am angry." 2. Not to be over-critical in his resentments. It is here made a man's glory to pass over a transgression, or, if he sees fit to take notice of it, yet to forgive it.

Verse 12

Kings are not common persons; their frowns are very terrible and their smiles very comfortable, and therefore it concerns them that they never frighten a good man from doing well with their frowns, nor ever give countenance to a wicked man in doing ill with their smiles, for then they abuse their influence, Rom. xiii. 3. To make subjects faithful and dutiful let them be encouraged in all good services to the public by the hopes of the favour of their prince.

Verse 13

A foolish son is a great affliction. A son that will apply himself to no study or business, that will take no advice, that lives a lewd, loose, rakish life, and spends what he has extravagantly, games it away, or that is proud, foppish, and conceited, such a one is the grief of his father. A cross peevish wife is as great an affliction: Her contentions are continual. Those that are accustomed to chide never want something or other to chide at; but it is a continual dropping, that is, a continual vexation, as it is to have a house so much out of repair that it rains in and a man cannot lie dry in it.

Verse 14

A discreet and virtuous wife is a choice gift of God's providence to a man—a wife that is prudent, in opposition, to one that is contentious, v. 13. A prudent wife makes the best of everything. If a man has such a wife let him ascribe it to the goodness of God, who made him a helpmeet for him, and perhaps by some hits and turns of providence that seemed casual brought her to him. A good estate may be the inheritance of fathers, which, by the common direction of Providence, comes in course to a man; but no man has a good wife by descent or entail.

Verse 15

A sluggish slothful disposition stupefies men, and makes them mindless of their own affairs, as if they were cast into a deep sleep, dreaming much, but doing nothing. Even their souls are idle and lulled asleep, their rational powers chilled and frozen. Those that will not labour cannot expect to eat, but must suffer hunger. One that is idle in the affairs of his soul, that takes no care or pains to work out his salvation, shall perish for want of that which is necessary to the life and happiness of the soul.

Verse 16

Those that make conscience of keeping the commandment in everything, that live by rule, keep their own souls; they secure their present peace and future bliss. If we keep God's word, God's word will keep us from everything really hurtful.

Verse 17

The duty of charity includes two things: 1. Compassion, which is the inward principle of charity in the heart; it is to have pity on the poor, 1 Cor. xiii. 3. 2. Bounty and liberality. We must not only pity the poor, but give, according to their necessity and our ability, James ii. 15, 16. It is charity to do for the poor, as well as to give. What is given to the poor, or done for them, God will place it to account as lent to him, lent upon interest (so the word signifies); he takes it kindly, as if it were done to himself. He will pay him again, in temporal, spiritual, and eternal blessings.

Verse 18

As soon as ever there appears a corrupt disposition in them check it immediately, before it is hardened into a habit. If the point can be gained without correction, well and good; but if you find that your forgiving them once, upon a dissembled repentance and promise of amendment, does but embolden them to offend again, put on resolution. It is better that he should cry under thy rod than under the sword of the magistrate, or of divine vengeance.

Verse 19

Angry men never want woe. Those that are of headstrong passions, commonly bring themselves and their families into trouble by vexatious suits and quarrels. All which troubles to themselves and others would be prevented if they would get the rule of their own spirits. It may be read, He that is of great wrath (meaning the child that is to be corrected and is impatient of rebuke, cries and makes a noise) deserves to be punished; for, if thou deliver him for the sake of that, thou wilt be forced to punish him the more the next time.

Verse 20

It is well with those that are wise in their latter end, wise for their future state, wise for another world. Those that would be wise in their latter end must be willing to be taught, advised and reproved, when they are young.

Verse 21

God knows the many devices that are in men's hearts (as those, Ps. ii. 1–3, Micah iv. 11). His counsel often breaks men's measures and baffles their devices; but their devices cannot in the least alter his counsel, nor disturb the proceedings of it. Politic designing men think they can outwit all mankind, but there is a God in heaven that laughs at them! Ps. ii. 4. All God's purposes, which we are sure are right and good, shall be accomplished in due time!

Verse 22

It cannot but be the desire of a man, if he have any spark of virtue in him, to be kind. It is far better to have a heart to do good and want ability for it than to have ability for it and want a heart to it. A poor man, who wishes you well, but can promise you nothing, because he has nothing to be kind with, is better than a liar, who makes you believe he will do mighty things, but, when it comes to the setting, will do nothing.

Verse 23

Those that live in the fear of God shall not be visited with evil; they may be visited with afflictions, but there shall be nothing to hurt the soul, whereas all the satisfactions of sense are transient and soon gone. He shall have true and complete happiness. Serious godliness has a direct tendency to life, to all good, to eternal life.

Verse 24

A sluggard is here exposed as a fool. All his care is to save himself from labour and cold. He hides his hand in his bosom; his hands are cold, and he must warm them in his bosom. He is resolved against labour and hardship. He will not be at pains to feed himself, to take his hand out of his bosom, no, not to put meat into his own mouth.

Verse 25

The punishment of scorners will be a means of good to others. If it cure not the infected, it may prevent the spreading of the infection. The reproof of wise men will be a means of good to themselves. Do but reprove one that has understanding and he will so far understand himself, so kindly does he take reproof and so wisely improve it.

Verse 26

The sin of a prodigal son is injurious to his parents, and basely ungrateful to those that were the instruments of his being and have taken so much care about him: He wastes his father, wastes his estate which he should have to support him in his old age, and breaks his heart. He chases away his mother, makes her weary of the house, with his rudeness and insolence, and glad to retire for a little quietness; and, when he has spent all, he turns her out of doors.

Verse 27

There is that which seems designed for the instruction, but really tends to the destruction of young men. The factors for vice will undertake to teach them how to palliate sins and stop the mouth of their own consciences, how to get clear of restraints. It is the wisdom of young men to turn a deaf ear to such instructions.

Verse 28

An ungodly witness is one that bears false witness against his neighbour, and will forswear himself to do another a mischief, in which there is great injustice, great impiety. Tell him of law and equity, that the scriptures and an oath are sacred things, that there will come a reckoning day; he laughs at it all. They are greedy, and glad of that which gives them an opportunity to sin.

Verse 29

Scorners are fools. Those that ridicule things sacred and serious do but make themselves ridiculous.

CHAP. XX

Verse 1

Wine is a mocker; strong drink is raging. It smiles upon him at first, but at the last it bites. It rages in his conscience. It is raging in the body. When the wine is in the wit is out, and then the man, according as his natural temper is, either mocks like a fool or rages like a madman. Drunkenness, which pretends to be a sociable thing, renders men unfit for society. A drunkard is a fool, and a fool he is likely to be.

Verse 2

Those princes that rule by wisdom and love, rule like God himself, but those that rule merely by terror, and with a high hand, do but rule like a lion in the forest, with a brutal power. How unwise therefore those are that quarrel with them! They sin against their own lives. Much more do those do so that provoke the King of kings to anger.

Verse 3

He thinks himself a wise man that is quick in resenting affronts, that stands upon every nicety of honour and right, but he that thus meddles creates needless vexation to himself. Really it is an honour for a man to cease from strife, to drop a controversy, to forgive an injury, and to be friends.

Verse 4

Slothfulness keeps men from ploughing and sowing when the season is: some excuse or other he has to shift it off, but the true reason is that it is cold weather. Thus careless are many in the affairs of their souls. Those that will not plough in seedtime cannot expect to reap in harvest. They must beg their bread when the diligent are bringing home their sheaves with joy.

Verse 5

Though men's counsels and designs are carefully concealed by them, so that they are as deep water which one cannot fathom, yet there are those who by sly insinuations and questions will get out of them both what they have done and what they intend to do. Some are very able and fit to give counsel, but they are reserved; they have a great deal in them, but it is loth to come out. A man of understanding will draw it out, as wine out of a vessel.

Verse 6

Most men will talk a great deal of their charity, hospitality, and piety. But it is hard to find those that really are kind and liberal, that have done more than they care to hear spoken of, that will be true friends in a strait.

Verse 7

A good man keeps a good conscience, and has the comfort of it, for it is his rejoicing. He is not liable to those uneasinesses which those are liable to that walk in deceit. He does well for his family. God has mercy in store for the seed of the faithful.

Verse 8

He is a king that deserves to be called so who sits in the throne, not as a throne of honour, to take his ease and oblige men to keep their distance, but as a throne of judgment, that he may do justice, give redress to the injured. If he inspect his affairs himself, those that are employed will be restrained from doing wrong. If great men be good men, and will use their power as they may and ought, what good may they do and what evil may they prevent!

Verse 9

This question is not only a challenge to any man to prove himself sinless, but a lamentation of the corruption of mankind. Here, in this imperfect state, no person whatsoever can pretend to be without sin. Those that think themselves as good as they should be cannot, and those that are really good will not, dare not, say this.

Verse 10

In paying and receiving money, which was then commonly done by the scale, they had divers weights, an underweight for what they paid and an overweight for what they received; and divers measures, a scanty measure to sell by and a large measure to buy by. Under these is included all manner of fraud and deceit in commerce and trade. They are all alike an abomination to the Lord. He hates those that thus break the common faith by which justice is maintained.

Verse 11

The tree is known by its fruits, even a young tree, and a child by his childish things. Children will discover themselves. One may soon see what their temper is. Parents should observe their children, that they may discover their disposition and genius, and manage them accordingly, drive the nail that will go and draw out that which goes amiss.

Verse 12

God is the God of nature, and formed the eye and planted the ear (Ps. xciv. 9). Hearing and seeing are the learning senses, and we must particularly own God's goodness in them. It is he that gives the ear that hears God's voice, the eye that sees his beauty, for it is he that opens the understanding.

Verse 13

Though thou must sleep yet love not sleep, as those do that hate business. Love not sleep for its own sake, but only as it fits for further work. And, when thou art awake, look up, and do not let slip thy opportunities; apply thy mind closely to thy business.

Verse 14

What arts men use to get a good bargain and to buy cheap! They vilify and run down that which they know to be of value; they cry, "It is naught, it is naught; it has this and the other fault, and it is too dear; we can have better and cheaper elsewhere, or have bought better and cheaper." But the seller does as extravagantly commend his goods and justify the price he sets on them, and so there is a fault on both sides. When the buyer has beaten down the seller he goes his way, and boasts what excellent goods he has got at his own price.

Verse 15

The lips of knowledge (a good understanding to guide the lips and to diffuse the knowledge) are to be preferred before gold and rubies. They are more rare in themselves, more scarce and hard to be got. They make us rich towards God, rich in good works, 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10.

Verse 16

Those that will be bound for anybody that will ask them, in rash suretiship to oblige their idle companions, cannot hold out long. Those that are in league with abandoned women will be beggars in a little time; never give them credit without a good pledge.

Verse 17

All the pleasures and profits of sin are bread of deceit. They are stolen, for they are forbidden fruit; and they will deceive men, for they are not what they promise. For a time, however, they are rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel. Afterwards the sinner's mouth shall be filled with gravel. Some nations have punished malefactors by mingling gravel with their bread.

Verse 18

Ask counsel of God, and beg direction from him. What is done hastily and with precipitation is repented of at leisure. It is especially our wisdom to be cautious in making war. Consider, and take advice, whether the war should be begun or no, and, when it is begun, consider how and by what arts it may be prosecuted, for management is as necessary as courage.

Verse 19

Tale-bearers are unprincipled people that go about carrying stories, make mischief among neighbours and relations, sow in the minds of people jealousies of their governors, of their ministers, and of one another, and reveal secrets. "Be not familiar with such; do not give them hearing for you may be sure that they will betray your secrets too and tell tales of you." Flatterers are commonly tale-bearers.

Verse 20

An undutiful child becomes very wicked by degrees. He began with despising his father and mother, but at length he arrives at such a pitch as to curse them, in defiance of God and his law, which has made this a capital crime (Exod. xxi. 17, Matt. xv. 4). An undutiful child becomes very miserable at last: His lamp shall be put out in obscure darkness; all his honour shall be laid in the dust.

Verse 21

There are those who will be rich, by right or wrong, who will cheat their own father, grudging themselves and their families food. An estate that is suddenly raised is often as suddenly ruined. It proves soon ripe and soon rotten.

Verse 22

We must not avenge ourselves. "Say not thou I will recompense evil for evil. Do not wish revenge.

Never say that thou wilt do a thing which thou canst not in faith pray to God to assist thee in, and that thou canst not do in meditating revenge." We must refer ourselves to God, and leave it to him to plead our cause, to maintain our right, and reckon with those that do us wrong in such a way and manner as he thinks fit and in his own due time.

Verse 23

This is to the same purport with what was said v. 10. It is here added, A false balance is not good, to intimate that it is not only abominable to God, but unprofitable to the sinner himself; there is really no good to be got by it, for a bargain made by fraud will prove a losing bargain in the end.

Verse 24

We have a constant dependence upon God. All our natural actions depend upon his providence, all our spiritual actions upon his grace. The best man is no better than God makes him. We have no foresight of future events, and therefore How can a man understand his own way? We so little understand own own way that we know not what is good for ourselves, and therefore we must commit our way unto the Lord.

Verse 25

Sacrilege, men's alienating holy things and converting them to their own use, is here called devouring them. What is devoted to the service of God ought to be conscientiously preserved to the purposes designed. Those that hurry over religious offices (their praying and preaching) may be said to devour that which is holy. It is a snare to a man, after he has made vows to God, to enquire how he may evade them or contrive excuses for the violating of them. If the matter of them was doubtful, and the expressions were ambiguous, that was his fault; he should have made them with more caution and consideration.

Verse 26

Magistrates must scatter the wicked, who are linked in confederacies, and there is no doing this but by bringing the wheel over them, that is, putting the laws in execution against them, crushing their power and quashing their projects.

Verse 27

The great soul of man is a divine light; it is the candle of the Lord, a candle of his lighting. Conscience, that noble faculty, is God's deputy in the soul; it is a candle not only lighted by him, but lighted for him. By the help of conscience we come to know ourselves. The spirit of a man has a self-consciousness (1 Cor. ii. 11); it searches into the dispositions and affections of the soul, praises what is good, condemns what is otherwise.

Verse 28

A good king must be strictly faithful to his word, must abhor all dissimulation, must support and countenance truth. He must likewise rule with clemency, and compassion. These virtues will make him easy and safe, beloved by his people.

Verse 29

Both young and old have their advantages and neither of them must despise nor envy the other. The young are strong and fit for action, able to break through difficulties. The old are grave, and fit for counsel, and, though they have not the strength that young men have, yet they have more wisdom and experience.

Verse 30

Many need severe rebukes. Some criminals must feel the rigour of the law and public justice; gentle methods will not work upon them; they must be beaten black and blue. Severe rebukes sometimes do a great deal of good, as corrosives contribute to the cure of a wound, eating out the proud flesh.

CHAP. XXI

Verse 1

Even the hearts of men are in God's hand. God can change men's minds, can turn them from that which they seemed most intent upon, as the husbandman, by canals and gutters, turns the water through his grounds, which does not alter the nature of the water, nor put any force upon it, any more than God's providence does upon the native freedom of man's will, but directs the course of it to serve his own purpose.

Verse 2

We are all apt to think too favourably of our own character. The proud heart is very ingenious in making that appear right to itself which is far from being so, to stop the mouth of conscience. God looks at the heart, and judges men according to their actions, their principles and intentions.

Verse 3

Many deceive themselves that, if they offer sacrifice, that will procure them a dispensation for unrighteousness. Living a good life (doing justly and loving mercy) is more pleasing to God than the most pompous devotion. Sacrifices were of divine institution, and were acceptable to God if they were offered in faith and with repentance, otherwise not, Isa. i. 11, &c. But even then moral duties were preferred before them (1 Sam. xv. 22).

Verse 4

He that carries himself insolently and scornfully towards both God and man, and that is always ploughing and plotting some mischief, is indeed a wicked man.

Verse 5

If we would live plentifully and comfortably we must be diligent in our business, and not shrink from the toil and trouble of it.Those that are rash and inconsiderate in their affairs, that are greedy of gain, by right or wrong, and make haste to be rich by unjust practices, are in the road to poverty.

Verse 6

Those that hope to enrich themselves by dishonest practices may perhaps heap up treasures, but will not meet with the satisfaction they expect. It is a vanity tossed to and fro; disappointment and vexation of spirit to them. They lay themselves open to the envy and ill-will of men and to the wrath of God.

Verse 7

Getting money by lying (v. 6) is no better than downright robbery. Cheating is stealing. Men refuse to do judgment; they will not render to all their due, but withhold it, and omissions make way for commissions; they come at length to robbery itself.

Verse 8

The froward man, the man of deceit, that acts by craft and trick, his way is strange, contrary to all the rules of honour and honesty. It is strange, for you know not when you have him. Men that are pure are proved to be such by their work, for it is right, it is just and regular; and they are accepted of God and approved of men.

Verse 9
What a great affliction it is to a man to have a brawling scolding woman for his wife, who is fretful to herself and furious to her children and servants. If a man has a wide house, spacious and pompous, this will embitter the comfort of it to him. He finds it his best way to retire into a corner of the house-top, and sit alone there, out of the hearing of her clamour.

Verse 10
A very wicked man desires that evil may be done and that he may have the pleasure of having a hand in it. His neighbour, his friend, his nearest relation, cannot gain from him the least kindness.

Verse 11
Let the law be executed upon a scorner, and even he that is simple will be awakened and alarmed by it, and will discern the evil of sin. When the wise is instructed by the preaching of the word he (not only the wise himself, but the simple that stands by) receives knowledge.

Verse 12
The righteous man (the judge or magistrate) examines the house of the wicked, searches it for arms or for stolen goods, makes a diligent enquiry concerning his family, that he may overthrow the wicked for their wickedness and prevent their doing any further mischief.

Verse 13
An uncharitable man stops his ears at the cry of the poor, turns them away from his door, and shuts up the bowels of his compassion, Acts vii. 57. He shall himself be reduced to straits, which will make him cry. Men will not hear him, but reward him as he has rewarded others. God will not hear him; for he that showed no mercy shall have judgment without mercy (James ii. 13).

Verse 14
A handsome present, prudently managed, will turn away some men's wrath when it seemed implacable. If it be a bribe to pervert justice, that is so scandalous that those who are fond of it are shamed of it.

Verse 15
It is a pleasure and satisfaction to good men to see justice administered by the government they live under, and also to practise it themselves. It is a terror to wicked men to see the laws put in execution against vice and profaneness.

Verse 16
The sinner wanders out of the way of understanding, and when once he has left that good way he wanders endlessly. The way of religion is the way of understanding; those that are not truly pious are not truly intelligent; and they go astray like lost sheep.

Verse 17
An epicure loves pleasure. God allows us to use the delights of sense soberly and temperately, wine to make glad the heart, and oil to make the face to shine and beautify the countenance; but he that sets his heart upon them is impatient of everything that crosses him in his pleasures. He shall be a poor man who once could not live without dainties and varieties. Many a beau becomes a beggar.

Verse 18
The wicked, that are the troublers of a land, ought to be punished, for the preventing of those national judgments which otherwise will be inflicted. God will rather leave many wicked people to be cut off than abandon his own people.

Verse 19
Unbridled passions embitter and spoil the comfort of all relations. Those cannot dwell in peace and happiness that cannot dwell in peace and love.

Verse 20
Those that are wise will increase what they have and live plentifully; their wisdom will teach them to proportion their expenses to their income and to lay up a good stock of all things convenient, particularly of oil, one of the staple commodities of Canaan. It is better to have an old-fashioned house, and have it well furnished, than a fine modern one, with sorry housekeeping.

Verse 21
We must do justly and love mercy, and, though we cannot attain to perfection, yet it will be a comfort to us if we aim at it. Those that do follow after righteousness shall find righteousness.

Verse 22
Those that have wisdom, though they are so modest as not to promise much, often perform great things, even against those that are so confident of their strength. A stratagem, well managed, may effectually scale the city of the mighty and cast down the strength it had such a confidence in. A wise man will gain upon the affections of people and conquer them by strength of reason, which is a more noble conquest than that obtained by strength of arms.

Verse 23
Those that would keep their souls must keep a watch before the door of their lips, must keep the mouth by temperance, that nothing be eaten or drunk to excess; they must keep the tongue also, that no forbidden word go out of the door of the lips, no corrupt communication. Keep thy heart, and that will keep thy tongue from sin; keep thy tongue, and that will keep thy heart from trouble.

Verse 24
Most of the wrath that inflames the spirits and societies of men is proud wrath. Men cannot bear the least slight, nor in anything to be crossed or contradicted, but they are in a heat, immediately. It makes them scornful when they are angry.

Verses 25–26
The slothful are as fit for labour as other men. They are enemies to themselves; for their slothfulness starves them, their desires at the same time stab them. Though their hands refuse to labour, their hearts cease not to covet riches, and pleasures, and honours. They expect everybody should do for them. Many that must have money with which to make provision for the flesh, and would not be at pains to get it honestly, have turned highwaymen, and that has killed them. The righteous and industrious have their desires satisfied, and enjoy not only that satisfaction, but the further satisfaction of doing good to others. The slothful are always gaping to receive, but the righteous are always contriving to give.

Verse 27
Sacrifices were of divine institution; and when they were offered in faith, and with repentance and reformation, God was well-pleased. They were an abomination when they were brought by wicked men, who did not repent of their sins, mortify their lusts, and amend their lives. Much more when they were brought with wicked minds, when their sacrifices were made serviceable to their wickedness. When men make a show of devotion, when holiness is pretended, but some wickedness intended, then the performance is an abomination, Isa. lxvi. 5.

Verse 28

A man may tell a lie perhaps in his haste; but he that gives in a false testimony does it with deliberation and solemnity, and it cannot but be a presumptuous sin. The vengeance he imprecated upon himself, when he took the false oath, will come upon him. He who hears (that is, obeys) the command of God, which is to speak every man truth with his neighbour, testifies nothing but what he knows to be true, speaks constantly (that is, consistently with himself).

Verse 29

A wicked man hardens his face—brazens it, that he may not blush—steels it, that he may not tremble when he commits the greatest crimes; he bids defiance to the terrors of the law and the checks of his own conscience. A good man does not say, What would I do? but, What should I do? And so he directs his way by a safe and certain rule.

Verse 30

There can be no success against God. Though men think they have wisdom, and understanding, and counsel, the best politics and politicians, on their side, yet if it be against the Lord, it cannot prosper long. There can be no success without God. Be the cause ever so good and the means of carrying it on ever so probable, still men must acknowledge God and take him along with them. Means indeed are to be used; the horse must be prepared against the day of battle, and the foot too. But, after all, safety and salvation are of the Lord; he can save without armies, but armies cannot save without him.

CHAP. XXII

Verse 1

We should be more careful to do that by which we may get and keep a good name than that by which we may raise and increase a great estate. By great riches we may relieve the bodily wants of others, but by a good name we may recommend religion to them. To be well beloved, to have an interest in the esteem and affections of all about us; this is better than silver and gold.

Verse 2

The greatest man in the world must acknowledge God to be his Maker, and is under the same obligations to be subject to him that the meanest is; and the poorest has the honour to be the work of God's hands as much as the greatest. Rich and poor meet together at the bar of God's justice, all guilty before God; and they meet at the throne of God's grace; the poor are as welcome there as the rich. There is the same Christ, the same scripture, the same Spirit, the same covenant of promises, for them both. There is the same heaven for poor saints that there is for rich.

Verse 3

A prudent man will foresee an evil before it comes and stand on his guard. When the clouds are gathering for a storm he takes the warning, and flies to the name of the Lord as his strong tower. The simple, who believe every word that flatters them, will believe none that warns them, and so they pass on and are punished. See an instance of both these, Exod. ix. 20, 21.

Verse 4

Religion does very much consist—in humility and the fear of the Lord; that is, walking humbly with God. What is to be gotten by it—riches, and honour, and comfort, and long life, in this world, as far as God sees good, and the privileges of the covenant of grace, and eternal life at last.

Verse 5

In the way of the froward, that crooked way, which is contrary to the will and word of God, thorns and snares are found, thorns of grief for past sins and snares entangling them in further sin. He that keeps his soul, that watches carefully over his own heart and ways, is far from those thorns and snares, for his way is both plain and pleasant.

Verse 6

Train up children in that learning age. Catechise them; initiate them. Train them as soldiers, who are taught to handle their arms, keep rank, and observe the word of command. Train them up in the way they should go, the way in which, if you love them, you would have them go. Train up a child according as he is capable (so some take it), with a gentle hand, as nurses feed children, little and often, Deut. vi. 7. Good impressions made upon them then will abide upon them all their days.

Verse 7

The rich rule over the poor, and too often with pride and rigour, unlike to God, who, though he be great, yet despises not any. The borrower is servant to the lender, and must sometimes beg, Have patience with me. Some sell their liberty to gratify their luxury.

Verse 8

Ill-gotten gains will not prosper. He that sows iniquity, that does an unjust thing in hopes to get by it, shall reap vanity. If the rod of authority turn into a rod of anger, if men rule by passion instead of prudence, instead of the public welfare, their power shall not bear them out, Isa. x. 24, 25.

Verse 9

A charitable man has a bountiful eye, opposed to the evil eye (ch. xxiii. 6) and the same with the single eye (Matt. vi. 22),—an eye that seeks out objects of charity, that, upon the sight of one in want and misery, affects the heart with compassion,—an eye that with the alms gives a pleasant look, which makes the alms doubly acceptable. He has also a liberal hand: He gives of his bread, the bread appointed for his own eating. God himself will bless him.

Verse 10

The scorner sows discord. Much of the strife and contention which disturb the peace is owing to the evil interpreter (as some read it), that construes everything into the worst, and takes a pride in bantering all mankind. Those that would secure the peace must exclude the scorner.

Verse 11

A complete gentleman, fit to be employed in public business, must be an honest man, a man that loves pureness of heart and hates all impurity, free from all deceit, all selfishness and sinister designs, that is just and delights in keeping his own conscience clean. He must also speak with a good grace, not to daub and flatter, but to deliver his sentiments decently, in language as clean as his spirit. The king, if he be wise and good, and understand his own and his people's interest, will be his friend.

Verse 12

God takes special care to preserve knowledge, that is, to keep up religion in the world by keeping up among men the knowledge of himself and of good and evil. He preserves men of knowledge, wise and good men (2 Chron. xvi. 9), particularly faithful witnesses, who speak what they know. He overthrows the words of the transgressor, and preserves knowledge in spite of him.

Verse 13

Many frighten themselves from real duties by imaginary difficulties: The slothful man has work to do without in the fields, but he fancies there is a lion there. He talks of a lion without, but considers not his real danger from the devil, that roaring lion, which is in bed with him, and from his own slothfulness, which kills him.

Verse 14

This is designed to warn all young men against the lusts of uncleanness. As they regard the welfare of their souls, let them take heed of the mouth of strange women, of the kisses of their lips (ch. vii. 13), their charms and enticements. Dread them; have nothing to do with them. Those who abandon themselves to that sin are abandoned of God: who takes off the bridle of his restraining grace.

Verse 15

Sin is foolishness; it is contrary both to our reason and to our true interest. It is in the heart; there is an inward inclination to sin, to speak and act foolishly. It is not only found there, but it is bound there; it is annexed to the heart (so some); vicious dispositions cleave closely to the soul. Correction is necessary to the cure of it. There must be strictness and severity, which will cause grief. Children need to be corrected, and kept under discipline, by their parents; and we all need to be corrected by our heavenly Father (Heb. xii. 6, 7), and under the correction we must kiss the rod.

Verse 16

Rich men sometimes oppress the poor and give to the rich. They will not in charity relieve the poor, but they will make presents to the rich, and give them great entertainments, either in vain-glory, that they may look great, or in policy, that they may receive it again with advantage. Such shall surely come to want. Many have been beggared by a foolish generosity, but never any by a prudent charity. Christ bids us invite the poor, Luke xiv. 12, 13.

Verses 17–21

Solomon here changes his style. Since the beginning of ch. x, he had laid down doctrinal truths, leaving us to make the application as we went along; but here, to the end of ch. xxiv, he directs his speech to his son, his pupil, his reader, his hearer, speaking as to a particular person. Hitherto, for the most part, his sense was comprised in one verse, but here usually it is drawn out further. Here is,

I. An earnest exhortation to get wisdom and grace, by attending to the words of the wise men, both written and preached. To these words, to this knowledge, the ear must be bowed down and the heart applied by faith, and love, and close consideration. The ear will not serve without the heart.

II. Arguments to enforce this exhortation. Consider,

1. The worth and weight of the things themselves which Solomon in this book gives us. They are not trivial, jocular proverbs. They are excellent things, which concern the glory of God, the holiness and happiness of our souls, the welfare of mankind, princely things (so the word is), fit for kings to speak and senates to hear.

2. The clearness of these things and the directing of them to us in particular. The emphasis here is that they are made known to thee, even to thee, and written to thee, as if it were a letter directed to thee by name. It is suited to thee and to thy case. If we make use of them in our discourse, they will be very becoming. They shall be fitted in thy lips.

3. The advantage designed us by them. The excellent things which God has written to us are not like the commands which the master gives his servant, which are all intended for the benefit of the master, but like those which the master gives his scholar, which are all intended for the benefit of the scholar. We cannot trust in God except in the way of duty; we are therefore taught our duty, that we may have reason to trust in God. It is a desirable thing to know, not only the words of truth, but the certainty of them, that our faith may be intelligent and rational, and may grow up to a full assurance. If any man do his will, he shall know for certain that the doctrine is of God, John vii. 17. Knowledge is given us to do good with, that others may light their candle at our lamp, and that we may in our place serve our generation according to the will of God.

After this solemn preface, one would have expected something new and surprising; but no; here is a plain but very needful caution against the inhuman practice of oppressing poor people. The sin itself is robbing the poor and making them poorer. It is bad to rob any man, but most absurd to rob the poor, whom we should relieve. To oppress the afflicted, and so to add affliction to them is not only a base and cowardly thing, to take advantage against a man because he is helpless, but it is unnatural, and proves men worse than beasts. He that robs and oppresses the poor does it at his peril. The oppressed will find God their powerful patron.

Verse 24

A good caution against being intimate with a passionate man. A man who is easily provoked, touchy, and apt to resent affronts, who, when he is in a passion, grows outrageous, is not fit to be made a friend, for he will be angry with us, and he will expect that we should, like him, be angry with others, and that will be our sin. It is dangerous conversing with those that throw about the sparks of their passion, "Lest thou imitate him, to humour him, and so contract an ill habit."

Verses 26–27

We must not cheat people of their money, by striking hands ourselves, or becoming surety for others, when we have not to pay. If a man is disabled to pay his debts, he ought to be pitied and helped; but he that takes up money or goods himself, or is bound for another, when he knows that he has not wherewithal to pay, does in effect pick his neighbour's pocket, and though, in all cases, compassion is to be used, yet he may thank himself if the law have its course and his bed be taken from under him, which might not be taken for a pledge to secure a debt, Exod. xxii. 26, 27. For, if a man appeared to be so poor that he had nothing else to give for security, he ought to be relieved, but, for the recovery of a debt, it seems it might be taken by the strict operation of law.

Verse 28

The land-marks, or meer-stones, are standing witnesses to every man's right; let not those be removed quite away, for thence come wars, and fightings, and endless disputes; let them not be removed so as to take from thy neighbour's lot to thy own, for that is downright robbing him and entailing the fraud upon posterity. Deference is to be paid, in all civil matters, to usages that have prevailed time out of mind.

Verse 29

A truly ingenious industrious man is here commended who lays out himself to get business, though it be but in a very low and narrow sphere. A man of despatch knows how to bring a deal of business into a little compass. Though now he stands before mean men, is employed by them, yet he will rise, and is likely enough to stand before kings, as an ambassador or prime-minister.

CHAP. XXIII

Verses 1–3

We are in most danger of falling into this sin: "When thou hast great plenty before thee, varieties and dainties, such a table spread as thou hast seldom seen." The temptation may be stronger to one that is not used to such entertainments. We must alarm ourselves into temperance and moderation: "Put a knife to thy throat, that is, restrain thyself, as it were with a sword hanging over thy head. But that is not enough: lay the axe to the root; mortify that appetite which has such a power over thee."

Verses 4–5

Some are given to appetite (v. 2), others to covetousness. We must endeavour to live comfortably, and provide for our children and families, but we must not seek great things. Be not of those that will be rich, that design it as their highest end, 1 Tim. vi. 9. What thou hast, or doest, be master of it, and not a slave to it as those that rise up early, sit up late, and eat the bread of carefulness, and all to be rich. The things of this world are a show, a shadow, a sham upon the soul that trusts to them. Wilt thou do a thing so absurd in itself? What thou, a reasonable creature, wilt thou dote upon shadows? Riches are very uncertain things; They make themselves wings, and fly away. The wings they fly away upon are of their own making. They have in themselves the principles of their own corruption. They go irresistibly and irrecoverably, as an eagle towards heaven, that flies strongly, and flies out of sight and out of call (there is no bringing her back); thus do riches leave men in grief and vexation if they set their hearts upon them.

Verses 6–8

There are those that pretend to bid their friends welcome that are not hearty and sincere in it. They have a fair tongue, and know what they should say: Eat and drink, saith he, because it is expected that the master of the feast should so compliment his guests; but they have an evil eye, and grudge their guests every bit they eat. If a man be so mean that he cannot find in his heart to bid his friends welcome to what he has, he ought not to add to that the guilt of dissimulation by inviting them. "Eat not thou the bread of such a man; let him keep it to himself. Do not sponge upon those that are bountiful, but especially scorn to be beholden to those that are paltry and not sincere."

Verse 9

It is our duty to take all fit occasions to speak of divine things; but, some will make a jest of everything. A wise man is advised not to speak in the ears of such fools. If what a wise man says in his wisdom will not be heard, let him hold his peace, and try whether the wisdom of that will be regarded.

Verses 10–11

The fatherless are taken under God's special protection. He is their Redeemer, their Goël, their near kinsman, that will take their part and stand up for them. Every man therefore must be careful not to injure them in anything, or to invade their rights, either by a clandestine removal of the old landmarks or by a forcible entry into their fields.

Verses 12–16

A parent should persuade his child to attend to the words of knowledge so that he may learn what is his duty. A tender parent finds it hard to administer correction but, for his child's good, he beats him with the rod, gives him a gentle correction, the stripes of the sons of men, not such as we give to beasts. The rod will not kill him; it will prevent his killing himself by those vicious courses which the rod will restrain him from. It is to be hoped that those will do right things when they grow up who learn to speak right things when they are young. "Children, if you be wise and good, devout and conscientious, we shall think our labour in instructing you well bestowed. We shall rejoice in hope that you will be a credit and comfort to us, if we should live to be old, that you will bear up the name of Christ in your generation, that you will live comfortably in this world and happily in another."

Verses 17–18

"Let not thy heart envy sinners; do not grudge them either the liberty they take to sin or the success they have in sin; it will cost them dearly and they are to be pitied rather than envied." We must be in the fear of the Lord, taking a pleasure in contemplating God's glory and complying with his will. There will be an end of the prosperity of the wicked, therefore do not envy them (Ps. lxxiii. 17); there will be an end of thy afflictions, perfect love will shortly cast out fear, and thy expectation of the reward not only will be not cut off, or disappointed, but it will be infinitely outdone.

Verses 19–28

"Hearken unto thy father who begat thee, and who therefore has an authority over thee and an affection for thee, and can have no other design than thy own good." We ought to give reverence to the fathers of our flesh, who were the instruments of our being; much more ought we to obey and be in subjection to the Father of our spirits, who made us and is the author of our being. And since the mother also, from a sense of duty to God and from love to her child, gives him good instructions, let him not despise her, nor her advice, when she is old. Buy the truth and sell it not (v. 23). Truth is that by which the heart must be guided and governed, for without truth there is no goodness. We must buy it whatever it costs us, we shall not repent the bargain. Riches should be employed for the getting of knowledge, rather than knowledge for the getting of riches. When we are at pains in searching after truth, then we buy it. Heaven concedes everything to the laborious. We must not sell it. Do not part with it for pleasures, honours, riches, anything in this world. God, in this exhortation, speaks to us as unto children: "Son, Daughter, Give me thy heart." Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart. To this call we must readily answer, "My father, take my heart, such as it is, and make it such as it should be; take possession of it, and set up thy throne in it." Be not a wine-bibber. Be not an excessive eater of flesh. Intemperance must be avoided in meat as well as drink. He fetches an argument against this sin from the expensiveness of it. The drunkard and the glutton hate to be reformed, though they are told they shall come to poverty. Drunkenness is the cause of drowsiness; it stupefies men, and makes them inattentive to business, and then all goes to wreck and ruin. Whoredom is a sin which bewitches men to their ruin: The adulteress lies in wait as a robber, pretending friendship, but designing to strip them both of their armour and of their ornaments. It is a sin that contributes more than any other to the spreading of vice and immorality in a kingdom. One adulteress may be the ruin of many a precious soul and may help to debauch a whole town. Houses of uncleanness are therefore such pest-houses as ought to be suppressed by those whose office it is to take care of the public welfare.

Verses 29–35

Solomon here gives fair warning against the sin of drunkenness, to confirm what he had said, v. 20. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red. Red wine was in Canaan looked upon as the best wine; it is therefore called the blood of the grape. Covet not that which pleases the eye, but let thy serious thoughts convince thee that that which seems delightful is really hurtful. The pernicious consequences of the sin of drunkenness: At the last it bites, v. 32. The drunkard is made sick by his surfeit, beggared and ruined in his estate, especially when his conscience is awakened and he cannot reflect upon it without horror and indignation at himself. It embroils men in quarrels. Many have woe and sorrow, and cannot help it; but drunkards wilfully create woe and sorrow to themselves. The wounds which men receive in defence of their country and its just rights are their honour; but wounds without cause, received in the service of their lusts, are marks of their infamy. Drunkenness makes men impure and insolent, v. 33. The eyes grow unruly and behold strange women to lust after them, and so let in adultery into the heart. The tongue also grows unruly and talks extravagantly; by it the heart utters perverse things, contrary to reason, religion, and common civility. What ridiculous incoherent nonsense men will talk when they are drunk! It stupefies and besots men, v. 34. Their judgments are clouded, and they have no more steadiness and consistency than he that sleeps upon the top of a mast. Set a drunkard in the stocks, and he is not sensible of the punishment. "They have stricken me, and I was not sick; I felt it not." Drunkenness turns men into stocks and stones; they are scarcely to be reckoned animals; they are dead while they live. Look not upon the wine when it is red.

CHAP. XXIV

Verses 1–2

"Let not such a thought ever come into thy mind, O that I could shake off the restraints of religion and conscience, and take as great a liberty to indulge the sensual appetite, as I see such and such do! No; desire not to be with them, to do as they do and fare as they fare, and to cast in thy lot among them." Do not think with them, for their heart studies destruction to others, but it will prove destruction to themselves. It is therefore thy wisdom to have nothing to do with them. Nor hast thou any reason to look upon them with envy, but with pity rather, or a just indignation at their wicked practices.

Verses 3–6

A man, with prudent management, may raise his estate and family by lawful and honest means, with the blessing of God upon his industry; and, if the other be raised a little sooner, yet these will last a great deal longer. True wisdom will make men's outward affairs prosperous and successful. It will build a house and establish it, v. 3. Men may by unrighteous practices build their houses, but they cannot establish them, for the foundation is rotten (Hab. ii. 9, 10). It will enrich a house and furnish it, v. 4. By knowledge the chambers of the soul are filled with the graces and comforts of the Spirit, those precious and pleasant riches. It will fortify a house and turn it into a castle: Wisdom is better than weapons of war, offensive or defensive. The spirit is strengthened both for the spiritual work and the spiritual warfare by true wisdom. Wisdom will erect a college, or council of state. Wisdom will be of use, to make an advantageous peace.

Verses 7–9

It is no easy thing to get wisdom; those that have natural parts good enough, yet if they be foolish, that is, if they be slothful and will not take pains, if they be viciously inclined and keep bad company, it is too high for them; they are not likely to reach it. And, for want of it, they are unfit for the service of their country: They open not their mouth in the gate; they are not admitted into the council or magistracy, or, if they are, they are dumb statues, they say nothing, because they have nothing to say. This devising evil is the thought of foolishness, v. 9. It is bad to do evil, but it is worse to devise it; for that has in it the subtlety and poison of the old serpent. But it may be taken more generally. We contract guilt, not only by the act of foolishness, but by the thought of it, though it go no further; the first risings of sin in the heart are sin, offensive to God, and must be repented of or we are undone. The scorner, who takes a pleasure in affronting people and reflecting upon them, is an abomination to men.

Verse 10

In the day of adversity we are apt to faint, to droop and be discouraged, to desist from our work, and to despair of relief. "It is a sign that thou art not a man of any resolution, any firmness of thought, any consideration, any faith (for that is the strength of a soul), if thou canst not bear up under an afflictive change of thy condition." Be of good courage therefore, and God shall strengthen thy heart.

Verses 11–12

A great duty required of us is to appear for the relief of oppressed innocency. Though the persons be not such as we are under any particular obligation to, we must help them, out of a general zeal for justice. It is easy to make an excuse when we say, We knew it not, or, We forgot. It is not easy with such excuses to evade the judgment of God. God ponders the heart and keeps the soul; keeps an eye upon it. We should be tender of the lives of others, and do all we can to preserve them, because our lives have been precious in the sight of God and he has graciously kept them. He will render to every man according to his works, not only the commission of evil works, but the omission of good works.

Verse 13–14

The study of wisdom will be very pleasant. We eat honey because it is sweet to the taste, and upon that account we call it good, especially that which runs first from the honeycomb. Canaan was said to flow with milk and honey, and honey was the common food of the country (Luke xxiv. 41, 42), even for children, Isa. vii. 15. Thus should we feed upon wisdom, and relish the good instructions of it. Those that have experienced the power of truth and godliness are abundantly satisfied of the pleasure of both; they have tasted the sweetness of them, and all the atheists in the world with their sophistry, and the profane with their banter, cannot alter their sentiments.

Verses 15–16

The designs of the wicked against the righteous; the plot is laid deeply: They lay wait against the dwelling of the righteous. They doubt not but to spoil his dwelling-place because his condition is low and distressed, and he is almost down already. The righteous man, whose ruin was expected, recovers himself. The just man falls, sometimes falls seven times perhaps, sins of infirmity, through the surprise of temptation; but he rises again by repentance, finds mercy with God, and regains his peace. The wicked man, who expected to see his ruin and to help it forward, is undone.

Verses 17–18

If any have done us an ill turn, or if we bear them ill-will only because they stand in our way, when any damage comes to them (suppose they fall), our corrupt hearts are too apt to conceive a secret delight and satisfaction in it. "Men hope in the ruin of their enemies or rivals to wreak their revenge or to find their account; but be not thou so inhuman; rejoice not when the worst enemy thou hast falls." The Lord will see it, though it be hidden in the heart only, and it will displease him, as it will displease a prudent father to see one child triumph in the correction of another, which he ought to take warning by, not knowing how soon it may be his own case, he having so often deserved it.

Verses 19–20

Even that which grieves us must not fret us; nor must our eye be evil against any because God is good. If wicked people prosper, we must not therefore incline to do as they do. Envy not their prosperity. There is no true happiness in it. He has his reward, Matt. vi. 2. Those are not to be envied that have their portion in this life and must out-live it, Ps. xvii. 14. Their candle shines brightly, but it shall presently be put out.

Verses 21–22

Religion and loyalty must go together. As men, it is our duty to honour our Creator, to worship and reverence him; as members of a community, incorporated for mutual benefit, it is our duty to be faithful and dutiful to the government God has set over us, Rom. xiii. 1, 2. Those are not truly loyal that are not religious. How should he be true to his prince that is false to his God? And, if they come in competition, it is an adjudged case, we must obey God rather than men. Those that are of restless, factious, turbulent spirits, commonly pull mischief upon their own heads ere they are aware: Their calamity shall rise suddenly.

Verses 23–26

As subjects must do their duty, and be obedient to magistrates, so magistrates must do their duty in administering justice to their subjects. They must always weigh the merits of a cause, and not be swayed by any regard, one way or other, to the parties concerned. A good judge will know the truth, not know faces, so as to countenance a friend and help him out in a bad cause, or so much as omit anything that can be said or done in favour of a righteous cause, when it is the cause of an enemy. They must discountenance and give check to all fraud, violence, injustice, and immorality. Let magistrates and ministers, and private persons too that are capable of doing it, rebuke the wicked, that they may bring them to repentance or put them to shame, and they shall have the comfort of it in their own bosoms: To them shall be delight, when their consciences witness for them that they have been witnesses for God. They must give a right answer, that is, give their opinion and pass sentence according to law and the true merits of the cause; and everyone shall kiss his lips that does so, that is, shall love and honour him with a kiss of allegiance. He that in common conversation speaks pertinently and with sincerity is beloved and respected by all.

Verse 27

This is a rule of prudence in the management of household affairs. We must prefer necessaries before conveniences, and not lay that out for show which should be expended for the support of the family. We must not think of building till we can afford it: "First apply thyself to thy work without in the field; look after thy husbandry, for it is that by which thou must get; and, when thou hast got well by that, then, and not till then, thou mayest think of rebuilding and beautifying thy house."

Verses 28–29

As a witness: "Never bear a testimony against any man without cause, unless what thou sayest thou knowest to be punctually true and thou hast a clear call to testify it. Never bear a false testimony against anyone"; As a plaintiff or prosecutor: If there be occasion to bring an action or information against thy neighbour, let it not be from a spirit of revenge. Even a righteous cause becomes unrighteous when it is prosecuted with malice.

Verses 30–34

The view which Solomon took of the field and vineyard of the slothful man. He cast his eye upon a field and a vineyard unlike all the rest; for, though the soil was good, yet there was nothing growing in them but thorns and nettles; and, if there had been any fruit, it would have been eaten up by the beasts, for there was no fence. He paused a little and considered it, looked again upon it, and received instruction. He did not break out into any passionate censures of the owner, but he endeavoured himself to get good by the observation. Plutarch relates a saying of Cato Major, "That wise men profit more by fools than fools by wise men; for wise men will avoid the faults of fools, but fools will not imitate the virtues of wise men." What a scandalous thing slothfulness is, and how injurious to the family, and to the affairs of our souls! Our souls are our fields and vineyards, which we are every one of us to take care of, to dress, and to keep. They are capable of being improved with good husbandry. These fields and vineyards are often in a very bad state, not only no fruit brought forth, but all overgrown with thorns and nettles (scratching, stinging, inordinate lusts and passions, pride, covetousness, sensuality, malice, those are the thorns and nettles, the wild grapes, which the unsanctified heart produces), no guard kept against the enemy, but the stone-wall broken down. Where it is thus it is owing to the sinner's own slothfulness and folly.

CHAP. XXV

Verse 1

This verse is the title of this latter collection of Solomon's proverbs. The publishers were Hezekiah's servants, who, it is likely, herein acted as his servants, being appointed by him to do this good service to the church, among other good offices that he did in the law and in the commandments, 2 Chron. xxxi. 21. They copied out these proverbs from the records of Solomon's reign, and published them as an appendix to the former edition of this book. It may be a piece of very good service to the church to publish other men's works that have lain hidden in obscurity.

Verses 2–3

An instance given of the honour of God: It is his glory to conceal a matter. There is an unfathomable depth in his counsels, Rom. xi. 33. We see what he does, but we know not the reasons. It is God's glory that he needs not search into a matter, because he knows it without search; but it is the honour of kings to search out the matters that are brought before them, to take pains in examining offenders and not to give judgment hastily.

Verses 4–5

The vigorous endeavour of a prince to suppress vice, and reform the manners of his people, is the most effectual way to support his government. The duty of magistrates is to use their power for the terror of evil works and evil workers, not only to banish those that are vicious, but so to frighten them that they may not spread the infection of their wickedness among their subjects. This is called taking away the dross from the silver, which is done by the force of fire. The reformation of the court will promote the reformation of the kingdom, Ps. ci. 3, 8.

Verses 6–7

Religion is so far from destroying good manners that it teaches us to give place to those to whom it belongs. Religion teaches us humility and self-denial, which is a better lesson than that of good manners. This is really the way to advancement, as our Saviour shows in a parable that seems to be borrowed from this, Luke xiv. 9. It is better, more for a man's satisfaction and reputation, to be advanced above his pretensions and expectations, than to be thrust down below them.

Verses 8–10

"Be not hasty in bringing an action, before thou hast thyself considered it, and consulted with thy friends about it. Bring not an action before thou hast tried to end the matter amicably (v. 9): Debate thy cause with thy neighbour privately, and perhaps you will understand one another better and see that there is no occasion to go to law." Reveal not the secret of another, so some read it. "Do not, in revenge, to disgrace thy adversary, disclose that which should be kept private and which does not at all belong to the cause." Be thus cautious in going to law, otherwise the cause will be in danger of going against thee. It will turn very much to thy reproach if thou fall under the character of being litigious.

Verses 11–12

Instruction, advice, or comfort, given seasonably, and in apt expressions, adapted to the case of the person spoken to and agreeing with the character of the person speaking—is like golden balls resembling apples, brought to table in a silver network basket, or in a silver box of that which we call philligree-work, through which the golden apples might be seen. Doubtless it was some ornament of the table, then well known. A reproof with discretion, well given, by a wise reprover, and well taken, by an obedient ear, it is an ear-ring of gold and an ornament of fine gold, very graceful and well becoming both the reprover and the reproved.

Verse 13

A servant ought to be faithful to him that sends him, and to see to it that he does not, by mistake or with design, falsify his trust. This will be the satisfaction of the master; it will refresh his soul as much as ever the cold of snow (which in hot countries they preserve by art all the year round) refreshed the labourers in the harvest, that bore the burden and heat of the day.

Verse 14

Who pretends to have received or given that which he never had, which he never gave, makes a noise of his great accomplishments and his good services, but it is all false; he is not what he pretends to be. Such a one is like the morning-cloud, that passes away, and disappoints those who looked for rain from it to water the parched ground (Jude 12), clouds without water.

Verse 15

Two things recommended in dealing with others, 1. Patience, to bear a present heat without being put into a heat by it, and to wait for a fit opportunity to offer our reasons and to give persons time to consider them. By this means even a prince may be persuaded. 2. Mildness, to speak without passion or provocation: A soft tongue breaks the bone; it mollifies the roughest spirits and overcomes those that are most morose, like lightning, which, they say, has sometimes broken the bone, and yet not pierced the flesh.

Verse 16

"Hast thou found honey?" It is not forbidden fruit to thee, as it was to Jonathan; thou mayest eat of it with thanksgiving to God. Eat as much as is sufficient, and no more. We must use all pleasures as we do honey, with a check upon our appetite. The pleasures of sense lose their sweetness by the excessive use of them and become nauseous, as honey, which turns sour in the stomach.

Verse 17

It is a piece of civility to visit our neighbours sometimes. It is wisdom, as well as good manners, not to be troublesome to our friends in visiting them too often, nor stay too long, nor contrive to come at meal-time, nor make ourselves busy in the affairs of their families. After the third day fish and company become distasteful. Familiarity breeds contempt. How much better a friend then is God than any other friend; the oftener we come to him the better and the more welcome.

Verse 18

A false testimony is everything that is dangerous; it is a maul (or club to knock a man's brains out with), a flail, which there is no fence against; it is a sword to wound near at hand and a sharp arrow to wound at a distance; we have therefore need to pray, Deliver my soul, O Lord! from lying lips, Ps. cxx. 2.

Verse 19

Confidence in an unfaithful man (so we read it), in a man whom we thought trusty but who proves otherwise, proves not only unserviceable, but painful and vexatious, like a broken tooth, or a foot out of joint.

Verse 20

The absurdity here censured is singing songs to a heavy heart. Those that are in great sorrow are to be comforted by sympathizing with them, but we take a wrong course if we think to relieve them by being merry with them, and endeavouring to make them merry. Taking away a garment from a man in cold weather, makes him colder, and pouring vinegar upon nitre puts it into a ferment; so incongruous, is it to sing pleasant songs to one that is of a sorrowful spirit. Some read it in a contrary sense: As he that puts on a garment in cold weather warms the body, or as vinegar upon nitre dissolves it, so he that sings songs of comfort to a person in sorrow refreshes him and dispels his grief.

Verses 21–22

However the scribes and Pharisees had corrupted the law the commandment of loving our brethren, even that of loving our enemies, was not only a new, but also an old commandment, an Old Testament commandment, though our Saviour has given it to us with the new enforcement of his own great example in loving us when we were enemies. We shall mollify them as the refiner melts the metal in the crucible, not only by putting it over the fire, but by heaping coals of fire upon it. The way to turn an enemy into a friend is to act towards him in a friendly manner.

Verse 23

Slanders would not be so readily spoken as they are if they were not readily heard; but good manners would silence the slanderer if he saw that his tales displeased the company. If we cannot otherwise reprove, we may do it by our looks. Who knows but it may silence and drive away a backbiting tongue? Many abuse those they speak of only in hopes to curry favour with those they speak to.

Verse 24

This is the same with what he had said, ch. xxi. 9. Those are to be pitied that are unequally yoked, especially with such as are brawling and contentious, whether husband or wife; for it is equally true of both.

Verse 25

It is sometimes with impatience that we expect to hear from abroad; our souls thirst after it. How acceptable good news will be when it does come, as refreshing as cold water to one that is thirsty. Heaven is a country afar off; how refreshing is it to hear good news thence, both in the everlasting gospel, which signifies glad tidings, and in the witness of the Spirit with our spirits that we are God's children.

Verse 26

For the righteous to fall into sin in the sight of the wicked troubles the fountains by grieving some, and corrupts the springs by infecting others and emboldening them to do likewise. For the righteous to be oppressed and trampled upon, by the violence or subtlety of evil men, this is the troubling of the fountains of justice and corrupting the very springs of government, ch. xxviii. 12, 28; xxix. 2. For the righteous to be cowardly, to truckle to the wicked, this is a reflection upon religion, and so is like a troubled fountain and a corrupt spring.

Verse 27

It is true of all the delights of the children of men that they will surfeit, but never satisfy, and they are dangerous to those that allow themselves the liberal use of them. For men to search their own glory, to court applause is not their glory, but their shame; everyone will laugh at them for it. Some give another sense of this verse: To eat much honey is not good, but to search into glorious and excellent things is a great commendation, it is true glory; we cannot therein offend by excess.

Verse 28

A wise and virtuous man is one that has rule over his own spirit. A vicious man, who has not this rule over his own spirit, is like a city that is broken down and without walls. He lies exposed to all the temptations of Satan and becomes an easy prey.

CHAP. XXVI

Verse 1

Bad men, who have neither wit nor grace, are sometimes preferred by princes, and applauded and cried up by the people. It is very absurd and unbecoming. It is as incongruous as snow in summer, as injurious as rain in harvest, which hinders the labourers and spoils the fruits of the earth when they are ready to be gathered.

Verse 2

He that is cursed without cause, whether by furious imprecations or solemn anathemas, the curse shall do him no more harm than the bird that flies over his head, than Goliath's curses did to David, 1 Sam. xvii. 43.

Verse 3

Wicked men are compared to the horse and the ass, so brutish are they, and not to be governed but by force or fear, so low has sin sunk men, so much below themselves. A horse unbroken needs a whip for correction, and an ass a bridle for direction and to check him when he would turn out of the way; so a vicious man, who will not be under the guidance and restraint of religion and reason, ought to be whipped and bridled, to be rebuked severely, and to be restrained from offending any more.

Verses 4–5

The scripture-style seems to contradict itself, but really does not. Wise men have need to be directed how to deal with fools; and they have need of wisdom in dealing with such, to know when to keep silence and when to speak, for there may be a time for both In some cases a wise man will not set his wit to that of a fool so far as to answer him according to his folly. "If he boast of himself, do not answer him by boasting of thyself. If he rail and talk passionately, do not thou rail and talk passionately too. If he tell one great lie, do not thou tell another to match it. If he banter, do not answer him in his own language, lest thou be like him." Yet, in other cases, a wise man will use his wisdom for the conviction of a fool, when, by taking notice of what he says, there may be hopes of doing good. "If thou have reason to think that thy silence will be deemed an evidence of weakness, in such a case answer him, and let it be an answer to the man, beat him at his own weapons, and that will be an answer to the point. If he offer anything that looks like an argument, then give him an answer, lest he be wise in his own conceit and boast of a victory."

Verses 6–9

Solomon here shows that fools are fit for nothing; they are either sottish men, who will never think and design at all, or vicious men, who will never think and design well. They are not fit to be entrusted with any business, not fit to go on an errand (v. 6): He that does but send a message by the hand of a fool, of a careless heedless person, will find his message misunderstood, and so many blunders made that he might as well have cut off his legs, that is, never have sent him. He will drink damage; it will be very much to his prejudice to have employed such a one. People will be apt to judge of the master by his messenger. To give honour to a fool is to put a sword in a madman's hand, with which we know not what mischief he may do, even to those that put it into his hand. A parable in the mouth of fools ceases to be a parable, and becomes a jest. As the legs of the lame are not equal, by reason of which their going is unseemly, so unseemly is it for a fool to pretend to speak apophthegms, and give advice. His good words raise him up, but then his bad life takes him down, and so his legs are not equal. He does but do mischief with it to himself and others, as a drunkard does with a thorn, or any other sharp thing which he takes in his hand, with which he tears himself and those about him, because he knows not how to manage it.

Verse 10

Our translation gives this verse a different reading in the text and in the margin; and accordingly it expresses either, 1. The equity of a good God. The great God that formed all things at first, and still governs them in infinite wisdom, renders to every man according to his work. He rewards the fool, who sinned through ignorance, with few stripes; and he rewards the transgressor, who sinned presumptuously, with many stripes. Or, 2. The iniquity of a bad prince (so the margin reads it): A great man grieves all, and he hires the fool; he hires also the transgressors. When a wicked man gets power in his hand, by himself, and by the fools and knaves whom he employs under him, he grieves all who are under him and is vexatious to them.

Verse 11

What an abominable thing sin is! When his conscience is convinced, or he feels smart from his sin, he is sick of it, he seems then to detest it and to be willing to part with it. Sinners, who have been convinced only and not converted, return to sin again, forgetting how sick it made them.

Verse 12

A spiritual disease is self-conceit. Many a one, wise in his own conceit, has some little sense, but is proud of it, has such a conceit of his own abilities as makes him opinionative, dogmatical, and censorious. There is more hope of a fool, that knows and owns himself to be such, than of such a one.

Verse 13

The slothful man dreads the way, the streets, the place where work is to be done and a journey to be gone. He dreams of, and pretends to dread—a lion in the way. When he is pressed to be diligent, either in his worldly affairs or in religion, this is his excuse: There is a lion in the way, some insuperable difficulty or danger which he cannot pretend to grapple with. It is a foolish thing to frighten ourselves from real duties by fancied difficulties, Eccles. xi. 4.

Verse 14

Having seen the slothful man in fear of his work, here we find him in love with his ease; he lies in his bed on one side till he is weary of that, and then turns to the other, but still in his bed, when it is far in the day and work is to be done, as the door is moved, but not removed. The sluggard is one that does not care to get out of his bed, but seems to be hung upon it, as the door upon the hinges. He does not care to get forward with his business; in that he stirs to and fro a little, but to no purpose; he is where he was.

Verse 15

The sluggard has now, with much ado, got out of his bed, but he might as well have lain there still. He hides his hand in his bosom for fear of cold; next to his warm bed is his warm bosom. Or he pretends that he is lame, as some do that make a trade of begging; something ails his hand; he would have it thought that it is blistered with yesterday's hard work. He himself is the loser by it, for he starves himself: It grieves him to bring his hand to his mouth, that is, he cannot find in his heart to feed himself. It is an elegant hyperbole, aggravating his sin, that he cannot endure to take the least pains. Those that are slothful in religion will not be at pains to feed their own souls with the word of God, the bread of life, nor to fetch in promised blessings by prayer.

Verse 16

The sluggard thinks himself wiser than seven men, than seven wise men, for they are such as can render a reason. He that takes pains in religion can render a good reason for it; he knows that he is working for a good Master and that his labour shall not be in vain. But the sluggard thinks himself wiser than seven such. It is the sluggard, above all men, that is thus self-conceited. His good opinion of himself is the cause of his slothfulness; he will not take pains to get wisdom because he thinks he is wise enough already. His slothfulness is the cause of his good opinion of himself. If he would but take pains to examine himself he would have other thoughts of himself.

Verse 17

That which is here condemned is meddling with strife that belongs not to us. If we can be instrumental to make peace between those that are at variance we must do it; but to make ourselves busy in other men's matters, and parties in other men's quarrels, is to court trouble. It is like taking a snarling cur by the ears, that will snap at you and bite you.

Verses 18–19

Those that make no scruple of deceiving their neighbours are as madmen that cast firebrands, arrows, and death. They value themselves as cunning men, but really they are as madmen. There is not a greater madness in the world than a wilful sin. The excuse which men commonly make for the mischief they do is that they did it in jest; Am I not in sport? But it will prove dangerous playing with fire and jesting with edge-tools. He that sins in jest must repent in earnest, or his sin will be his ruin. Truth is too valuable a thing to be sold for a jest, and so is the reputation of our neighbour.

Verses 20–22

Contention is as a fire; it heats the spirit, burns up all that is good, and puts families and societies into a flame. We must not give ear to tale-bearers, for they feed the fire of contention with fuel; nay, they spread it with combustible matter; the tales they carry are fireballs. Those who by insinuating base characters, revealing secrets, and misrepresenting words and actions, are to be banished, and then strife will as surely cease as the fire will go out when it has no fuel. Whisperers and backbiters are incendiaries not to be suffered. They wound love and charity and give a fatal stab to friendship and Christian fellowship. We must not associate with peevish passionate people. These are contentious men that kindle strife, v. 21. The less we have to do with such the better, for it will be very difficult to avoid quarrelling with those that are quarrelsome.

Verse 23

This may be meant either, 1. Of a wicked heart showing itself in burning lips, furious words, burning in malice; ill words and ill-will agree as well together as a potsherd and the dross of silver, which, now that the pot is broken and the dross separated from the silver, are fit to be thrown to the dunghill. Or 2. Of a wicked heart disguising itself with burning lips, burning with professions of love and friendship. This is like a potsherd covered with the scum or dross of silver, but a wise man is soon aware of the cheat.

Verses 24–26

The want of sincerity in men's profession of friendship, and the making of it subservient to the most malicious intentions is here spoken of as a common thing (v. 24): He that hates his neighbour, and is contriving to do him a mischief, yet dissembles with his lips, talks kindly with him, as Cain with Abel, this man lays up deceit within him, that is, he keeps in his mind the mischief he intends to do his neighbour. Remember to distrust when a man speaks fair; be not too forward to believe him unless you know him well, for it is possible there may be seven abominations in his heart. Though the fraud may be carried on plausibly awhile, it will be brought to light, v. 26. He whose hatred is covered by deceit will one time or other be discovered. Love (says one) is the best armour, but the worst cloak and will serve dissemblers as the disguise which Ahab put on and perished in.

Verse 27

What pains men take to do mischief to others, concealing their design with a profession of friendship! It is digging a pit, it is rolling a stone, hard work, and yet men will stick at it to gratify their passion and revenge. Their violent dealing will return upon their own heads; they shall themselves fall into the pit they digged, and the stone they rolled will return upon them, Ps. vii. 15, 16; ix. 15, 16.

Verse 28

There are two sorts of lies equally detestable: 1. A slandering lie: A lying tongue hates those that are afflicted by it; it afflicts them by calumnies and reproaches because it hates them. The mischief of this is obvious; it afflicts, it hates, and owns it, and everybody sees it. 2. A flattering lie secretly works ruin. It is little suspected, and men betray themselves by being credulous of the compliments that are passed upon them. A wise man therefore will be more afraid of a flatterer that kisses and kills than of a slanderer that proclaims war.

CHAP. XXVII

Verse 1

Boast not thyself, no, not of tomorrow, much less of many days or years to come. This does not forbid preparing for tomorrow, but presuming upon tomorrow. We must not put off the great work of conversion, that one thing needful, till tomorrow, as if we were sure of it, but today, while it is called today, hear God's voice. We know not what a day may bring forth, what event may be in the teeming womb of time. God has wisely kept us in the dark concerning future events, that he may train us up in a dependence upon himself and a continued readiness for every event, Acts i. 7.

Verse 2

Let our own works be such as will praise us, even in the gates, Phil. iv. 8. When we have done it we must not commend ourselves, for that is an evidence of pride. There may be a just occasion for us to vindicate ourselves, but it does not become us to applaud ourselves.

Verses 3–4

The wrath of a fool, who when he is provoked cares not what he says and does, is more grievous than a great stone or a load of sand. Those who have no command of their passions sink under the load of them. The wrath of a fool lies heavily upon those he is enraged at. It is therefore our wisdom not to give provocation to a fool, but, if he be in a passion, to get out of his way. Rooted malice is much worse. Wrath is cruel, and does many a barbarous thing, but secret enmity of another, envy at his prosperity, and a desire of revenge for some affront, are much more mischievous. One may avoid a sudden heat, as David escaped Saul's javelin, but when it grows, as Saul's did, to a settled envy, there is no standing before it.

Verses 5–6

It is good for us to be reproved, and told of our faults, by our friends. Faithful are the reproofs of a friend, though for the present they are painful as wounds. The physician's care is to cure the patient's disease, not to please his palate. It is dangerous to be caressed and flattered by an enemy, whose kisses are deceitful. Joab's kiss and Judas's were deceitful. Some read it: The Lord deliver us from an enemy's kisses, from lying lips, and from a deceitful tongue.

Verse 7

Solomon here, as often in this book, shows that the poor have in some respects the advantage of the rich; for, 1. They have a better relish of their enjoyments. Hunger is the best sauce. Coarse fare, with a good appetite to it, has a sensible pleasantness in it. Those that fare sumptuously every day nauseate even delicate food. Those that have no more than their necessary food, though it be such as the full soul would call bitter, to them it is sweet; they eat it with pleasure, digest it, and are refreshed by it. They are more thankful: The hungry will bless God for bread and water, while those that are full think the greatest dainties scarcely worth giving thanks for.

Verse 8

There are many that do not know when they are well off; they love to wander, they are glad of a pretence to go abroad, and do not care for staying long at a place. Those that thus desert the post assigned to them are like a bird that wanders from her nest. They are always wavering, like the wandering bird that hops from bough to bough and rests nowhere. When the bird wanders from her nest the eggs and young ones there are neglected. Those that love to be abroad leave their work at home undone.

Verses 9–10

A charge given to be faithful and constant to our friends, our old friends. It is good to have a bosom-friend, whom we can be free with. It is good also to have a special respect to those who have been friends to our family: "Thy own friend, especially if he have been thy father's friend, forsake not. He is a tried friend; he knows thy affairs; therefore be advised by him." It is a duty we owe to our parents, when they are gone, to love their friends. Solomon's son undid himself by forsaking the counsel of his father's friends. There is a great deal of sweetness in conversing with a cordial friend. It is like ointment and perfume, which exhilarate the spirits. It rejoices the heart; the burden of care is made lighter by unbosoming ourselves to our friend. The sweetness of friendship lies not in hearty mirth, but in hearty counsel, faithful advice, sincerely given and without flattery, by counsel of the soul (so the word is). We are here advised not to go into a brother's house, not to expect relief from a kinsman merely for kindred-sake, but rather to apply ourselves to our neighbours, who are at hand, and will be ready to help us at an exigence. It is wisdom to oblige them by being neighbourly.

Verse 11

Children may be a comfort to their parents and may make their hearts glad, even when the evil days come, and so recompense them for their care, ch. xxiii. 15. They may be a credit to them: "That I may answer him that reproaches me with having been over-strict and severe in bringing up my children." Those that have been blessed with a religious education should conduct themselves so as to silence those who say, A young saint, an old devil; and to prove the contrary, A young saint, an old angel.

Verse 12

Evil may be foreseen. Where there is temptation, it is easy to foresee that if we thrust ourselves into it there will be sin, and there will follow the evil of punishment; and, commonly, God warns before he wounds. The prudent man, foreseeing the evil, forecasts accordingly, and hides himself, but the simple is either so dull that he does not foresee it or so wilful and slothful that he will take no care to avoid it.

Verse 13

Those are hastening to poverty that have so little consideration as to be bound for everybody that will ask them and those that are given to women. Such as these will take up money as far as ever their credit will go, but they will certainly cheat their creditors at last, nay, they are cheating them all along.

Verse 14

It is our duty to give everyone his due praise, to applaud those who excel in knowledge, virtue, and usefulness, and to acknowledge the kindnesses we have received with thankfulness; but not to do this with a loud voice, rising early in the morning, to be always harping on this string, in all companies, even to our friend's face, to magnify the merits of our friend above measure. It is a greater folly to be fond of being ourselves extravagantly praised. Modest praises invite such as are present to add to the commendation, but immoderate praises tempt them to detract rather and to censure one that they hear over-commended. Over-praising a man makes him the object of envy. And the greatest danger of all is that it is a temptation to pride, 2. Cor. xii. 6.

Verses 15–16

Here, as before, Solomon laments the case of him that has a peevish passionate wife. It is a grievance that there is no avoiding, for it is like a continual dropping in a very rainy day. The contentions of a neighbour may be like a sharp shower, troublesome for the time, yet, while it lasts, one may take shelter; but the contentions of a wife are like a constant soaking rain, for which there is no remedy but patience. See ch. xix. 13. A wise man would hide it if he could, but he cannot, any more than he can conceal the noise of the wind when it blows or the smell of a strong perfume. Those that are froward and brawling will proclaim their own shame, even when their friends, in kindness to them, would cover it.

Verse 17

Wise and profitable discourse sharpens men's wits; and those that have ever so much knowledge may by conference have something added to them. Good men's graces are sharpened by converse with those that are good, and bad men's lusts and passions are sharpened by converse with those that are bad, as iron is sharpened by its like, especially by the file. Men are filed, made smooth, and bright, and fit for business (who were rough, and dull, and inactive), by conversation.

Verse 18

Though the calling be laborious and despicable, yet those who keep to it will find there is something to be got by it. Let not a poor gardener, who keeps the fig-tree, be discouraged; though it require constant care and attendance to nurse up fig-trees, and, when they have grown to maturity, to keep them in good order, and gather the figs in their season, yet he shall be paid for his pains: He shall eat the fruit of it, 1 Cor. ix. 7. A poor servant if he be diligent in waiting on his master, if he keep his master (so the word is), if he do all he can that his estate be not wasted, such a one shall be honoured, be preferred and rewarded. God is a Master who has engaged to put an honour on those that serve him faithfully, John xii. 26.

Verse 19

As the water is a looking-glass in which we may see our faces by reflection, so there are mirrors by which the heart of a man is discovered to a man, that is, to himself. Let a man examine his own conscience, his thoughts, affections, and intentions. Let him behold his natural face in the glass of the divine law (Jas. i. 23), and he may discern what kind of man he is and what is his true character, which it will be of great use to every man rightly to know. As there is a similitude between the face of a man and the reflection of it in the water, so there is between one man's heart and another's; for God has fashioned men's hearts alike.

Verse 20

Two things are insatiable, and near of kin—death and sin. Men labour for that which surfeits, but satisfies not. Those whose eyes are ever towards the Lord in him are satisfied, and shall for ever be so.

Verse 21

Silver and gold are tried by putting them into the furnace and fining-pot; so is a man tried by praising him. If a man be made, by the applause that is given him, proud and scornful,—if he take the glory to himself which he should transmit to God, thereby it will appear that he is a vain foolish man, and has nothing in him truly praise-worthy. If, on the contrary, a man is made by his praise more thankful to God, more respectful to his friends, more diligent to do good to others, by this it will appear that he is a wise and good man, 2 Cor. vi. 8.

Verse 22

Solomon had said (ch. xxii. 15), The foolishness which is bound in the heart of a child may be driven out by the rod of correction, for then the mind is to be moulded, the vicious habits not having taken root. Here he shows that, if it be not done then, it will be next to impossible to do it afterwards. Some are so bad that rough and severe methods must be used with them, after gentle means have been tried in vain; they must be brayed in a mortar. God will take this way with them by his judgments; the magistrates must take this way with them by the rigour of the law. Force must be used with those that will not be ruled by reason, and love, and their own interest.

Verses 23–27

A command given us to be diligent in our callings is directed to husbandmen and shepherds, but it is to be extended to all other lawful callings. We ought not to live in idleness. We ought to understand our business, and not meddle with that which we do not understand. We should, with our own eyes, inspect the state of our flocks; it is the master's eye that makes them fat. Riches are not for ever. "Look well to thy flocks and herds, thy estate in the country and the stock upon that, for these are staple commodities, which, in a succession, will be for ever, whereas riches in trade and merchandise will not be so; the crown itself may perhaps not be so sure to thy family as thy flocks and herds." The hay appears. In taking care of the flocks and herds, "There needs no great labour, no ploughing or sowing; the food for them is the spontaneous product of the ground; thou hast nothing to do but to turn them into it in the summer, when the grass shows itself, and to gather the herbs of the mountains for them against winter. God has done his part; thou art ungrateful to him, and unjustly refusest to serve his providence, if thou dost not do thine." Good husbandry is profitable in a family: "Keep thy sheep, and thy sheep will help to keep thee; thou shalt have food for thy children and servants, goats' milk enough (v. 27); and enough is as good as a feast. Thou shalt have raiment likewise: the lambs' wool shall be for thy clothing. Thou shalt have money to pay thy rent; the goats thou shalt have to sell shall be the price of thy field"; nay, as some understand it, "Thou shalt become a purchaser, and buy land to leave to thy children," v. 26. Plain food and plain clothing, if they be but competent, are all we should aim at. "Reckon thyself well done to if thou be clothed with home-spun cloth, with the fleece of thy own lambs, and fed with goats' milk; let that serve for thy food which serves for the food of thy household and the maintenance of thy maidens. Be not desirous of dainties, far-fetched and dear-bought."

CHAP. XXVIII

Verse 1

Guilt in the conscience makes men a terror to themselves, so that they are ready to flee when none pursues; like one that absconds for debt, who thinks everyone he meets a bailiff. Sin makes men cowards. The righteous are bold as a lion, as a young lion; in the greatest dangers they have a God of almighty power to trust to. Therefore will not we fear though the earth be removed.

Verse 2

National sins bring national disorders. For the transgression of a land, and a general defection from God and religion to idolatry, profaneness, or immorality, many are the princes thereof, many at the same time pretending to the sovereignty, by which the people are crumbled into parties and factions, one cutting off another, or soon cut off by the hand of God or of a foreign enemy. The government sometimes suffers for the sins of the people. Wisdom will prevent or redress these grievances: By a man or by a people, of understanding, that come again to their right mind, things are kept in a good order. We cannot imagine what a great deal of service one wise man may do to a nation in a critical juncture.

Verse 3

Those who know by experience the miseries of poverty should be compassionate to those who suffer the like, but they are inexcusably barbarous if they be injurious to them. How imperious those commonly are who, being indigent and necessitous, get into power. If a prince promote a poor man, he forgets that ever he was poor, and none shall be so oppressive to the poor as he, nor squeeze them so cruelly. He is like a sweeping rain, which washes away the corn in the ground, and lays and beats out that which has grown, so that it leaves no food.

Verse 4

Those that praise the wicked make it to appear that they do themselves forsake the law, and go contrary to it, for that condemns the wicked. Wicked people will speak well of one another, and so strengthen one another's hands in their wicked ways, hoping thereby to silence the clamours of their own consciences and to serve the interests of the devil's kingdom. Those that do indeed make conscience of the law of God themselves will, in their places, vigorously oppose sin.

Verse 5

As the prevalency of men's lusts is owing to the darkness of their understandings, so the darkness of their understandings is very much owing to the dominion of their lusts. Men understand not judgment, because they are evil men. As men's seeking the Lord is a good sign that they do understand much, so it is a good means of their understanding more, even of their understanding all things needful for them. If a man do his will, he shall know his doctrine, John vii. 17.

Verse 6

It is maintained as a paradox to a blind world that an honest, godly, poor man, is better than a wicked, ungodly, rich man, has a better character, is in a better condition, has more comfort in himself, is a greater blessing to the world, and is worthy of much more honour and respect. It is not only certain that his case will be better at death, but it is better in life.

Verse 7

Religion is true wisdom, and it makes men wise in every relation. Wickedness is not only a reproach to the sinner himself, but to all that are akin to him.

Verse 8

That which is ill-got, though it may increase much, will not last long. A man may perhaps raise a great estate, in a little time, by usury and fraud, but it will not continue; he gathers it for himself, but another man's shall be raised out of the ruins of it. Sometimes God in his providence so orders it that that which one got unjustly another uses charitably.

Verse 9

God speaks to us by his law, and expects we should hear him and heed him; we speak to him by prayer, to which we wait for an answer of peace.

Verse 10

The seducers, who attempt to draw good people into sin and mischief, shall not gain their point; they shall fall themselves into their own pit; and having been not only sinners, but tempters, their condemnation will be so much the greater, Matt. xxiii. 14, 15. The sincere shall not only be preserved from the evil way which the wicked would decoy them into, but they shall have the graces and comforts of God's Spirit.

Verse 11

Those that are rich are apt to think themselves wise, because, whatever else they are ignorant of, they know how to get and save; and expect that all they say should be regarded as an oracle and a law. A poor man, who has taken pains to get wisdom, having no other way (as the rich man has) to get a reputation, searches him out, and makes it to appear that he is not such a scholar, nor such a politician, as he is taken to be.

Verse 12

The comfort of the people of God is the honour of the nation in which they live. There is a great glory dwelling in the land when the righteous do rejoice, when they have their liberty, the free exercise of their religion, and are not persecuted. The advancement of the wicked is the eclipsing of the beauty of a nation: When the wicked rise and get head they make head against all that is sacred, and then a man is hidden, a good man is thrust into obscurity.

Verse 13

The folly of indulging sin, of palliating and excusing it, denying or extenuating it, diminishing it, dissembling it, or throwing the blame of it upon others: He that thus covers his sins shall not prosper. David owns himself to have been in a constant agitation while he covered his sins, Ps. xxxii. 3, 4. While the patient conceals his distemper he cannot expect a cure. He that confesses his guilt to God, and is careful not to return to sin again, shall find mercy with God. His conscience shall be eased and his ruin prevented. See 1 John i. 9; Jer. iii. 12, 13.

Verse 14

Most people think that those are happy who never fear; but there is a fear which is so far from having torment in it that it has in it the greatest satisfaction. Happy is the man who always keeps up in his mind a holy awe and reverence of God, who is always afraid of incurring his displeasure, who keeps conscience tender and has a dread of the appearance of evil. He that hardens his heart, that mocks at fear, and sets God and his judgments at defiance, his presumption will be his ruin.

Verse 15

It is written indeed, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people; but if he be a wicked ruler, that oppresses the people, this scripture calls him a roaring lion and a ranging bear. He is brutish, barbarous, and blood-thirsty, to be put among the beasts of prey.

Verse 16

A ruler that is covetous will neither do justly nor love mercy, but the people under him shall be bought and sold. He that hates covetousness shall prolong his government and peace, shall be happy in the affections of his people and the blessing of his God.

Verse 17

This agrees with that ancient law, Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed (Gen. ix. 6). He that has committed murder, though he flees for his life, shall be continually haunted with terrors, shall himself flee to the pit, betray himself, and torment himself like Cain. Those that acquit the murderer, or do anything to help him off, come in sharers in the guilt of blood.

Verse 18

Those that are honest are always safe. He that acts with sincerity, that speaks as he thinks, has a single eye to the glory of God and the good of his brethren, shall be saved hereafter. They shall be safe now. Integrity and unrightness will give them a holy security in the worst of times. They may be injured, but they cannot be hurt. Those that are false and dishonest are never safe.

Verse 19

He that tills his land, and tends his shop, and minds his business, whatever it is, he shall have plenty of bread, of that which is necessary for himself and his family and with which he may be charitable to the poor; he shall eat the labour of his hands. Those that are idle, and careless, and company-keepers, though they indulge themselves in living (as they think) easily and pleasantly, they take the way to live miserably.

Verse 20

We are directed in the true way to be happy, and that is to be holy and honest. He that is faithful to God and man shall be blessed of the Lord. Usefulness shall be the reward of faithfulness, and it is a good reward. We are cautioned against a false way to happiness, and that is, right or wrong, raising an estate suddenly. He shall not be accounted innocent by his neighbours, but shall have their ill will and ill word. He does not say that he cannot be innocent, but there is probability that he will not prove so: He that hasteth with his feet sinneth, stumbleth, falleth.

Verse 21

It is a fundamental error in the administration of justice to consider the parties concerned more than the merits of the cause, so as to favour one because he is a gentleman, my countryman, my own acquaintance, or is of my party and persuasion, and to bear hard on the other party because he is a stranger, a poor man, or has been my rival, or has voted against me. Those that are partial will be paltry. Those that have once broken through the bonds of equity, though, at first, it must be some great bribe, when they have debauched their consciences, they will, at length, be so sordid that for a piece of bread they will give judgment against their consciences.

Verse 22

Solomon shows the sin and folly of those that will be rich; they will be so with all speed. They have an evil eye, that is, they are always grieving at those that have more than they. Poverty shall come upon them.

Verse 23

Flatterers may please those for a time who, upon second thoughts, will detest and despise them. Reprovers may displease those at first who yet afterwards, when the passion is over and the bitter physic begins to work well, will love and respect them. He that cries out against his surgeon for hurting him when he is searching his wound will yet pay him well, and thank him too, when he has cured it.

Verse 24

As Christ shows the wickedness of those children who think it is no duty to maintain their parents (Matt. xv. 5), so Solomon here shows the wickedness of those who think it is no sin to rob their parents, either by force or by wheedling them or threatening them, or by running into debt and leaving them to pay it. He that does it is the companion of a destroyer, no better than a robber on the highway.

Verse 25

Those make themselves lean, and continually unquiet, that are haughty and quarrelsome, for they are opposed to those that shall be made fat. Those make themselves fat, and always easy, that live in a continual dependence upon God and his grace: He who puts his trust in the Lord, who, instead of struggling for himself, commits his cause to God, shall be made fat.

Verse 26

A fool trusts to his own heart, to his own wisdom, his own strength, his own merit and righteousness, and the good opinion he has of himself. He that walks wisely, that trusts not to his own heart, but is humble and self-diffident, and goes on in the strength of the Lord God, he shall be delivered.

Verse 27

He that gives to the poor shall himself be never the poorer for so doing; he shall not lack. He that hides his eyes, that he may not see the miseries of the poor lest his eye should affect his heart and extort some relief from him, he shall have many a curse, both from God and man.

Verse 28

This is to the same purport with what we had, v. 12. When power is put into the hands of the wicked, men hide themselves; wise men retire into privacy, and decline public business, not caring to be employed under them; rich men get out of the way, for fear of being squeezed for what they have; and good men abscond, despairing to do good and fearing to be ill-treated. When bad men are disgraced, and their power taken from them, then the righteous increase; for, when they perish, good men will be put in their room.

CHAP. XXIX

Verse 1

The obstinacy of many wicked people is to be greatly lamented. They are often reproved by parents and friends, by magistrates and ministers, but they harden their necks. Perhaps they fling away, and will not so much as give the reproof a patient hearing. Those that go on in sin, in spite of admonition, shall be destroyed; if the rods answer not the end, expect the axes. They shall be destroyed, and no healing, so the word is.

Verse 2

This is what was said before, ch. xxviii. 12, 28. 1. The people will have cause to rejoice or mourn according as their rulers are righteous or wicked; for, if the righteous be in authority, sin will be punished and restrained; but, if the wicked get power, religion and religious people will be persecuted, and so the ends of government will be perverted. The people will actually rejoice or mourn according as their rulers are righteous or wicked.

Verse 3

A virtuous young man loves wisdom, he is a philosopher (a lover of wisdom), for religion is the best philosophy; he avoids bad company, and especially the company of lewd women. A vicious young man hates wisdom; he keeps company with scandalous women, who will be his ruin, both in soul and body.

Verse 4

A prince should establish the land, maintain its laws, settle the minds of his subjects, secure their liberties, and properties from hostilities and for posterity. This he must do by judgment and by the steady administration of justice, without respect of persons. A man of oblations (so it is in the margin) overthrows the land; a man that is either sacrilegious or superstitious, or a man that will, for a bribe, connive at the most guilty, and, in hope of one, persecute the innocent—such governors as these will ruin a country.

Verse 5

Those may be said to flatter their neighbours who applaud good in them, which really either is not or is not such as they represent it. These spread a net for their neighbours' feet. It has an ill effect on those who are flattered; it puffs them up with pride, and so proves a net that entangles them in sin. He that flatters others, in expectation that they will return his compliments and flatter him, does but make himself ridiculous and odious even to those he flatters.

Verse 6

One sin is a temptation to another, and there are troubles which, as a snare, come suddenly upon evil men in the midst of their transgressions. The snare that is in the transgression of evil men spoils all their mirth, but righteous men are kept from those snares, or delivered out of them; they walk at liberty, and therefore they sing and rejoice.

Verse 7

A righteous judge considers the cause of the poor. It is every man's duty to consider the poor (Ps. xli. 1), but the judgment of the poor is to be considered by those that sit in judgment. Sense of justice must make both judge and advocate as solicitous and industrious in the poor man's cause as if they hoped for the greatest advantage. A wicked man, because it is a poor man's cause, which there is nothing to be got by, regards not to know it, for he cares not which way it goes, right or wrong. See Job xxix. 16.

Verse 8

Scornful men employed in the business of the state do things with precipitation, because they scorn to deliberate. They scorn to be hampered by laws and constitutions; break their faith, because they scorn to be bound by their word. Thus they bring a city into a snare by their ill conduct, or (as the margin reads it) they set a city on fire; they sow discord among the citizens and run them into confusion. Wise men by promoting religion, which is true wisdom, turn away the wrath of God, and by prudent counsels, reconcile contending parties.

Verse 9

If a wise man contend with a wise man, he may hope to be understood, and, as far as he has reason and equity on his side, to carry his point and make it issue amicably; but, if he contend with a foolish man, there is no rest; he will see no end of it. Whether the foolish man take angrily or scornfully what is said to him, whether he rail at it or mock at it, there will be no rest. The wisest man must expect to be either scolded or ridiculed if he contend with a fool. Whether the wise man himself rage or laugh, whether he take the serious or the jocular way of dealing with the fool, no good is done.

Verse 10

Bad men hate their best friends: The bloodthirsty, all the seed of the old serpent, who was a murderer from the beginning, hate the upright. Bloody men do especially hate upright magistrates, who would restrain and reform them. The just, whom the bloody men hate, seek their soul, pray for their conversion, and would gladly do anything for their salvation. This Christ taught us. Father, forgive them.

Verse 11

He is a fool who utters all his mind, who, whatever is started in discourse, quickly shoots his bolt,—who, when he is provoked, will say anything that comes uppermost, whoever is reflected upon by it. A wise man will not utter all his mind at once, but will take time for a second thought, or reserve the present thought for a fitter time. He will not deliver himself in a continued speech, or starched discourse, but with pauses, that he may hear what is to be objected and answer it.

Verse 12

Lies will be told to those that will hearken to them; but the receiver, in this case, is as bad as the thief. Those that do so will have all their servants wicked, for they will have lies told of them; and they will be wicked, for they will tell lies to them.

Verse 13

This shows how wisely the great God serves the designs of his providence by persons of very different tempers. Some are poor, and honest, and laborious; others are rich, slothful, and deceitful. They meet together in the business of this world, and the Lord enlightens both their eyes. To some of both sorts he gives his grace. He enlightens the eyes of the poor by giving them patience, and of the deceitful by giving them repentance, as Zaccheus. The poor and the deceitful we are ready to look upon as blemishes of Providence, but God makes even them to display the beauty of Providence.

Verse 14

The rich will look to themselves, but the poor and needy the prince must defend (Ps. lxxxii. 3) and plead for, Prov. xxxi. 9. Those magistrates that do their duty shall be established for ever.

Verse 15

Parents must not only tell their children what is good and evil, but they must chide them, and correct them too, if need be. If a reproof will serve without the rod, it is well, but the rod must never be used without a rational and grave reproof; and then it will give wisdom. A child that is not restrained or reproved, but is left to himself, as Adonijah was, may do well if he will, but, if he take to ill courses, he proves a disgrace to his family, and brings his mother to shame.

Verse 16

The more sinners there are the more sin there is. In the old world, when men began to multiply, they began to degenerate and corrupt themselves and one another. The more sin there is the nearer is the ruin threatened. Let not the righteous have their faith and hope shocked by the increase of sin and sinners. Let them not say that God has forsaken the earth, but wait with patience; the transgressors shall fall into disgrace and destruction.

Verse 17

It is a pleasure to parents, which none know but those that are blessed with it, to see the happy fruit of the good education they have given their children, and to have a prospect of their well-doing for both worlds. Children must be trained and not suffered to do what they will and to go without rebuke when they do amiss.

Verse 18

Where there is no vision, no prophet to expound the law, no priest or Levite to teach the good knowledge of the Lord, no means of grace, the word of the Lord is scarce, there is no open vision (1 Sam. iii. 1), where it is so the people perish; the word has many significations. 1. The people are made naked, stripped of their ornaments and so exposed to shame, stripped of their armour and so exposed to danger. How bare does a place look without Bibles and ministers, and what an easy prey it is to the enemy of souls! 2. The people rebel, not only against God, but against their prince; good preaching would make people good subjects, but, for want of it, they are turbulent and factious. 3. The people are idle, or they play, as the scholars are apt to do when the master is absent. 4. They are scattered as sheep having no shepherd, for want of the masters of assemblies to call them and keep them together, Mark vi. 34. 5. They perish; they are destroyed for lack of knowledge, Hos. iv. 6.

Verse 19

Unprofitable, slothful, wicked servants serve not from conscience, or love, but purely from fear. No rational words will work upon them; they will not be corrected and reformed by fair means, no, nor by foul words. No rational words will be got from them. They are dogged and sullen; and, though they understand the questions you ask them, they will not give you an answer.

Verse 20

Seest thou a man that is hasty in his matters, that is of a light desultory wit, gallops over a book, but takes no time to digest it? There is more hope of making a scholar and a wise man of one that is dull and heavy, and slow in his studies, than of one that has such a mercurial genius and cannot fix. Seest thou a man that is forward to speak to every matter that is started, as if he were an oracle? There is more hope of a modest fool, who is sensible of his folly, than of such a self-conceited one.

Verse 21

It is an ungrateful thing in a servant to behave insolently because he has been used tenderly. The humble prodigal thinks himself unworthy to be called a son, and is content to be a servant; the pampered slave thinks himself too good to be called a servant, and will be a son at the length, will be on a par with his master, and perhaps pretend to the inheritance.

Verse 22

An angry, passionate, furious disposition makes men provoking to one another. It makes men provoking to God. Undue anger is a sin which is the cause of many sins.

Verse 23

Those that think to gain respect by lifting up themselves, talking big, appearing fine, and applauding themselves, will expose themselves to contempt, lose their reputation, and provoke God by humbling providences to bring them down and lay them low. Those who humble themselves shall be exalted, and shall be established in their dignity.

Verse 24

Those who are drawn away by the enticement of sinners incur guilt: He does so that goes partner with such as rob and defraud. The receiver is as bad as the thief; and, being drawn in to join with him in the commission of the sin, he cannot escape joining with him in the concealment of it, though it be with the most horrid perjuries and execrations. They even hate their own souls, for they wilfully do that which will be the inevitable destruction of them.

Verse 25

We are cautioned not to dread the power of man. Slavish fear brings a snake, that is, exposes men to many insults, or rather to many temptations. Abraham, for fear of man, denied his wife, and Peter his Master, and many a one his God and religion. Whoso puts his trust in the Lord shall be set on high, above the power of man and above the fear of that power.

Verse 26

Men, to advance and enrich themselves, seek the ruler's favour. Solomon was himself a ruler, and knew with what sedulity men made their application to him, some on one errand, others on another, but all for his favour. Haman had the ruler's favour, and yet it availed him nothing. Look up to God, and seek the favour of the Ruler of rulers; for every man's judgment proceeds from the Lord. It is not with us as the ruler pleases, it is as God pleases.

Verse 27

This expresses not only the innate contrariety that there is between virtue and vice, but the old enmity that has always been between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, Gen. iii. 15. All that are sanctified have a rooted antipathy to wickedness and wicked people. They have a good will to the souls of all, but they hate the ways and practices of those that are impious. Thus an unjust man makes himself odious to the just, and it is one part of his present shame and punishment that good men cannot endure him. All that are unsanctified have a like rooted antipathy to godliness and godly people.

CHAP. XXX

This and the following chapter are an appendix to Solomon's proverbs; but they are both expressly called prophecies, by which it appears that the penmen were divinely inspired. This chapter was penned by one that bears the name of "Agur Ben Jakeh". We have here, I. His confession of faith, ver. 1–6. II. His prayer, ver. 7–9. III. A caution against wronging servants, ver. 10. IV. Four wicked generations, ver. 11–14. V. Four things insatiable (ver. 15, 16), to which is added fair warning to undutiful children, ver. 17. VI. Four things unsearchable, ver. 18–20. VII. Four things intolerable, ver. 21–23. VIII. Four things little and wise, ver. 24–28. IX. Four things stately, ver. 29 to the end.

Verses 1–6

Agur was a collector (so it signifies), a gatherer, one that collected the wise sayings and observations of others (v. 3), "I have not learned wisdom myself, but have been a scribe, or amanuensis, to other wise and learned men." Ithiel and Ucal are mentioned: 1. As the names of his pupils, whom he instructed. Probably they wrote what he dictated, as Baruch wrote from the mouth of Jeremiah. Or, 2. As the subject of his discourse. Ithiel signifies God with me, the application of Immanuel, God with us. Ucal signifies the Mighty One, for it is upon one that is mighty that help is laid for us.

Three things the prophet here aims at:—

I. To abase himself. Before he makes confession of his faith he makes confession of his folly and the weakness and deficiency of reason, which make it so necessary that we be guided and governed by faith. Agur, when he was applied to by others as wiser than most, acknowledged himself more foolish than any. Whatever high opinion others may have of us, it becomes us to have low thoughts of ourselves. He speaks of himself as wanting a revelation to guide him in the ways of truth and wisdom. The natural man, the natural powers, perceive not, nay, they receive not, the things of the Spirit of God.

II. To advance Jesus Christ, and the Father in him (v. 4): Who hath ascended up into heaven, &c. Some understand this of God and of his works, which are both incomparable and unsearchable. Others refer it to Christ, to Ithiel and Ucal, the Son of God, for it is the Son's name, as well as the Father's, that is here enquired after, and a challenge given to any to vie with him. What is his Son's name, by whom he does all these things? The Old Testament saints expected the Messiah to be the Son of the Blessed, and he is here spoken of as a person distinct from the Father, but his name as yet secret.

III. To assure us of the truth of the word of God, and to recommend it to us, v. 5, 6. Agur's pupils expect to be instructed by him in the things of God. "Alas!" says he, "I cannot undertake to instruct you; go to the word of God. Every word of God is pure; there is not the least mixture of falsehood and corruption in it." God in his word, God in his promise, is a shield, a sure protection, to all those that put their trust in him. It is sufficient, and therefore we must not add to it (v. 6). We must be content with what God has thought fit to make known to us of his mind, and not covet to be wise above what is written.

Verses 7–9

After Agur's confession and creed, here follows his litany,

I. The preface to his prayer: Two things have I required (that is, requested) of thee, O God! Before we go to pray it is good to consider what we need, and what the things are which we have to ask of God.

II. The prayer itself. The two things he requires are grace sufficient and food convenient. 1. Grace sufficient for his soul: Remove from me vanity and lies. Some understand it as a prayer for the pardon of sin, for, when God forgives sin, he removes it, he takes it away. 2. Food convenient for his body. "Feed me with the bread of my allowance, such bread as thou thinkest fit to allow me." Our Saviour seems to refer to this when he teaches us to pray, Give us this day our daily bread. He prays against the extremes of abundance and want: Give me neither poverty nor riches. He hereby intends to express the value which wise and good men have for a middle state of life, and, with submission to the will of God, desires that that might be his state, neither great honour nor great contempt. He gives a pious reason for his prayer, v. 9. "Lest I be rich and sin, or poor and sin." Sin is that which a good man is afraid of in every condition and under every event. Prosperity makes people proud and forgetful of God, as if they had no need of him. A good man also dreads the temptations of a poor condition: Lest I be poor and steal. Poverty is a strong temptation to dishonesty. Agur dreads this lest he should dishonour God by it.

Verses 10–14

I. A caution not to abuse other people's servants any more than our own, nor to make mischief between them and their masters. Hurt not a servant with thy tongue (so the margin reads it); for it argues a sordid disposition to smite anybody secretly with the scourge of the tongue, especially a servant, who is not a match for us.

II. An account of some wicked generations of men, that are justly abominable to all that are virtuous and good. 1. Such as are abusive to their parents. There is a generation of such; young men of that black character commonly herd together, and irritate one another against their parents, because they cannot endure the yoke. 2. Such as are conceited of themselves, and yet are not cleansed from their filthiness, the filthiness of their hearts, which they pretend to be the best part of them. 3. Such as are haughty and scornful to those about them, v. 13. There is a generation of such, on whom he that resists the proud will pour contempt. 4. Such as are cruel to the poor and barbarous to all that lie at their mercy (v. 14); their teeth are iron and steel, swords and knives, instruments of cruelty, with which they devour the poor with the greatest pleasure imaginable, and as greedily as hungry men cut their meat and eat it.

He had spoken before of those that devoured the poor (v. 14), now here he speaks of their insatiableness in doing this. Now those are two daughters of the horse-leech, its genuine offspring, that still cry, "Give, give, give more blood, give more money"; for the bloody are still blood-thirsty; being drunk with blood, they add thirst to their drunkenness, and will seek it yet again.

I. He specifies four other things which are insatiable, 1. The grave, into which multitudes fall, and yet still more will fall, and it swallows them all up, and returns none. 2. The barren womb, which is impatient of its affliction in being barren, and cries, as Rachel did, Give me children. 3. The parched ground in time of drought (especially in those hot countries), which still soaks in the rain that comes in abundance upon it and in a little time wants more. 4. The fire, which, when it has consumed abundance of fuel, yet still devours all the combustible matter that is thrown into it. So insatiable are the corrupt desires of sinners, and so little satisfaction have they even in the gratification of them.

II. He adds a terrible threatening to disboedient children (v. 17). Those that dishonour their parents shall be hanged in chains, as it were, for the birds of prey to pick out their eyes, those eyes with which they looked so scornfully on their good parents. The dead bodies of malefactors were not to hang all night, but before night the ravens would have picked out their eyes.

Verses 18–23

I. An account of four things that are too wonderful to be fully known,

1. The first three are natural things, and are only designed as comparisons for the illustration of the last. We cannot trace An eagle in the air. Which way she has flown cannot be discovered, nor can we account for the wonderful swiftness of her flight. A serpent upon a rock. The way of a serpent in the sand we may find by the track, but not of a serpent upon the hard rock. A ship in the midst of the sea leaves no mark behind it. The kingdom of nature is full of wonders past finding out.

2. The fourth is a mystery of iniquity, more accountable than any of these; it belongs to the depths of Satan. The cursed arts which a vile adulterer has to debauch a maid, and to persuade her to yield to his wicked and abominable lust. The cursed arts which a vile adulteress has to conceal her wickedness; so close are her intrigues that it is as impossible to discover her as to track an eagle in the air. She eats the forbidden fruit, and then wipes her mouth, that it may not betray itself, and with a bold and impudent face says, I have done no wickedness. To her own conscience she denies the fault. Thus multitudes ruin their souls by calling evil good and out-facing their convictions with a self-justification.

II. An account of four things that are intolerable, that is, four sorts of persons that are very troublesome. 1. A servant when he is entrusted with power is most insolent and imperious. 2. A fool, a silly, rude, boisterous, vicious man, when he has grown rich, and is partaking of the pleasures of the table, will disturb all the company with his extravagant talk. 3. An ill-natured, cross-grained, woman, when she gets a husband, having made herself odious by her pride and sourness, so that one would not have thought anybody would ever love her, yet, if at last she be married, that honourable estate makes her more intolerably scornful and spiteful than ever. A gracious woman, when she is married, will be yet more obliging. 4. An old maid-servant that has prevailed with her mistress to leave her what she has will be intolerably proud and malicious, and think herself wronged if anything be left from her. Let those therefore whom Providence has advanced to honour from mean beginnings carefully watch against pride and haughtiness.

I. Agur, having specified four things that seem great and yet are really contemptible, here specifies four things that are little and yet are very admirable, great in miniature. They teach us, 1. Not to admire bodily bulk, or beauty, or strength, but to judge of men by their wisdom and conduct, their industry and application to business. 2. To admire the wisdom and power of the Creator in the smallest and most despicable animals, in an ant as much as in an elephant. 3. To blame ourselves who do not act so much for our own true interest as the meanest creatures do for theirs. 4. Not to despise the weak things of the world; there are those that are little upon the earth, and yet are exceedingly wise. Margin, They are wise, made wise by the special instinct of nature. All that are wise to salvation are made wise by the grace of God.

II. Those he specifies are, 1. The ants, minute and very weak, and yet they are very industrious in gathering proper food in the summer, the proper time. This is so great a piece of wisdom that we may learn of them to be wise for futurity, ch. vi. 6. 2. The conies, the Arabian mice, weak creatures, and very timorous, have so much wisdom as to make their houses in the rocks, where they are well guarded. Sense of our own indigence and weakness should drive us to him that is a rock higher than we for shelter and support. 3. The locusts are little also, and have no king, as the bees have, but they go forth all of them by bands, like an army in battle-array (Joel ii. 25). They go forth all of them gathered together (so the margin); sense of weakness should engage us to keep together, that we may strengthen the hands of one another. 4. The spider. Spiders are very ingenious in weaving their webs with a fineness and exactness such as no art can pretend to come near: They take hold with their hands, and spin a fine thread out of their own bowels, with a great art; and they are not only in poor men's cottages, but in kings' palaces.

Verses 29–33

I. An enumeration of four things which are majestic and stately in their going: 1. A lion, the king of beasts, because strongest among beasts. The lion turns not away, nor alters his pace, for fear of any pursuers. 2. A greyhound that is girt in the loins and fit for running; or (as the margin reads it) a horse. 3. A he-goat, the comeliness of whose going is when he goes first and leads the flock. It is the comeliness of a Christian's going to go first in a good work and to lead others in the right way. 4. A king, who, when he appears in his majesty, is looked upon with reverence and awe, and there is no rising up against him. And, if there is no rising up against an earthly prince, woe to him then that strives with his Maker. It is intended that we should learn courage and fortitude in all virtuous actions from the lion and not to turn away for any difficulty we meet with; from the greyhound we may learn quickness and despatch, from the he-goat the care of our family and those under our charge, and from a king to have our children in subjection with all gravity, and from them all to go well, so that we may not only be safe, but comely, in going.

II. A caution to us to keep our temper at all times and under all provocations. We must take shame to ourselves, whenever we are justly charged with a fault, and not insist upon our own innocency: If we have lifted up ourselves in peevish opposition, we have therein done foolishly. If we have but thought evil, if we are conscious to ourselves that we have harboured an ill design in our minds, we must lay our hand upon our mouth, that is humble ourselves for what we have done amiss. We must keep the evil thought we have conceived in our minds from breaking out in evil speeches. It is bad to think ill, but it is much worse to speak it, for that implies a consent to the evil thought. We must not irritate the passions of others. Some are so very provoking in their words and conduct that they even force wrath, and where that is there is confusion and every evil work. As the violent agitation of the cream fetches all the good out of the milk, and the hard wringing of the nose will extort blood from it, so this forcing of wrath wastes both the body and spirits of a man, and robs him of all the good that is in him. The spirit is heated by degrees with strong passions; one angry word begets another, and so it goes on till it ends in irreconcilable feuds.

CHAP. XXXI

This chapter is added to Solomon's proverbs, some think because it is of the same author, supposing king Lemuel to be king Solomon; others only because it is of the same nature, though left in writing by another author, called Lemuel; however it be, it is a prophecy, given by inspiration and direction of God, which Lemuel was under in the writing of it, as his mother was in dictating to him the matter of it. I. An exhortation to Lemuel, a young prince, to take heed of the sins he would be tempted to and to do the duties of the place he was called, to ver. 1–9. II. The description of a virtuous woman, a wife and the mistress of a family, which Lemuel's mother drew up, either as an instruction to her daughters, as the foregoing verses were to her son, or as a direction to her son in the choice of a wife, ver. 10–31.

Verses 1–9

Most interpreters are of opinion that Lemuel is Solomon; the name signifies one that is for God, or devoted to God. Lemuel is supposed to be a fond, endearing name, by which his mother used to call him. One would the rather incline to think it is Solomon that here tells us what his mother taught him because he tells us (ch. iv. 4) what his father taught him. But some think that Lemuel was a prince of some neighbouring country, whose mother was a daughter of Israel. It is the duty of mothers, as well as fathers, to teach their children what is good, that they may do it, and what is evil, that they may avoid it; when they are young and tender they are most under the mother's eye, and she has then an opportunity of moulding their minds well.

I. Her expostulation with the young prince, by which she speaks as one considering what advice to give him: "Thou art descended from me; thou art the son of my womb, and therefore what I say comes from the authority and affection of a parent. Thou art a piece of myself. Be wise and good, and then I am well paid. Thou art the son of my vows, the son I prayed to God to give me and promised to give back to God." Our children that by baptism are dedicated to God, for whom and in whose name we covenanted with God, may well be called the children of our vows.

II. The caution she gives him against those two destroying sins of uncleanness and drunkenness: Give not thy strength unto women, unto strange women. He must not be soft and effeminate. It lessens the honour of kings and makes them mean. Are those fit to govern others that are themselves slaves to their own lusts? If they would preserve their people from the unclean spirit, they must themselves be patterns of purity. The king must not drink wine or strong drink to excess; it is not for kings, to allow themselves that liberty; it is a disparagement to their dignity, and profanes their crown, by confusing the head that wears it. All Christians are made to our God kings and priests. It is not for Christians to drink to excess; it ill becomes the heirs of the kingdom and the spiritual priests, Lev. x. 9. It is a sad complaint which is made of the priests and prophets (Isa. xxviii. 7), that they have erred through wine, and through strong drink they are out of the way; and tumble in judgment.

III. The counsel she gives him to do good with his wealth. "Thou hast wine or strong drink at command; instead of doing thyself hurt with it, do others good with it; let those have it that need it, through sickness or pain. We must deny ourselves in the gratifications of sense, that we may have to spare for the relief of the miseries of others. Wine is a cordial, and therefore to be used for want and not for wantonness, by those only that need cordials, as Timothy, who is advised to drink a little wine, only for his stomach's sake and his often infirmities, 1 Tim. v. 23. He must do good with his power, his knowledge, and must administer justice with care, courage, and compassion, v. 8, 9. He must judge righteously, and, without fear of the face of man, boldly pass sentence according to equity: Open thy mouth, which denotes the liberty of speech that princes and judges ought to use in passing sentence. He must especially look upon himself as obliged to be the patron of oppressed innocency, especially of those that were dumb, and knew not how to speak for themselves, either through fear, or being over-talked by the prosecutor or over-awed by the court.

Verses 10–31

This description of the virtuous woman is designed to show what wives the women should make and what wives the men should choose; it consists of twenty-two verses, each beginning with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet in order, which makes some think it was a poem by itself, written by some other hand, and perhaps commonly repeated for the ease of which it was made alphabetical. We have the abridgment of it in the New Testament (1 Tim. ii. 9, 10, 1 Pet. iii. 1–6), where the duty prescribed to wives agrees with this description of a good wife.

I. A general enquiry after such a one (v. 10). A virtuous woman—a woman of strength (so the word is), though the weaker vessel, yet made strong by wisdom and grace, and the fear of God: it is the same word that is used in the character of good judges (Exod. xviii. 21). A virtuous woman is a woman of spirit, who has the command of her own spirit and knows how to manage other people's. A virtuous woman is a woman of resolution, who, having espoused good principles, is firm and steady to them. Who can find her? Good women are very scarce. But he that designs to marry ought to take heed that he be not biassed by beauty or gaiety, wealth or parentage, dressing well or dancing well; for all these may be and yet the woman not be virtuous. The more rare good wives are the more they are to be valued.

II. A particular description of her and of her excellent qualifications.

1. She is very industrious to recommend herself to her husband's esteem and affection. She conducts herself so that he may repose an entire confidence in her. He trusts in her chastity. He trusts in her conduct, that she will act in all affairs with prudence and discretion. He trusts in her fidelity to his interests. When he goes abroad, to attend the concerns of the public, he can confide in her to order all his affairs at home. She contributes so much to his content that he shall have no need of spoil; he need not be griping and scraping abroad, as those must be whose wives are proud and wasteful at home. He thinks himself so happy in her that he envies not those who have most of the wealth of this world; he needs it not, he has enough, having such a wife. She shows her love to him, not by a foolish fondness, but by prudent endearments, giving him good words, and not bad ones, no, not when he is out of humour, studying to provide what is fit for him both in health and sickness. And this is her care all the days of her life; not at first only, or now and then, when she is in a good humour, but perpetually. If she survive him, still she is doing him good in her care of his children, his estate, and good name. She adds to his reputation in the world (v. 23): Her husband is known in the gates, known to have a good wife. By his cheerful countenance and pleasant humour it appears that he has an agreeable wife at home. One may know he has a good wife at home, that takes care of his clothes.

2. She is one that takes pains in the duty of her place and takes pleasure in it. She hates to sit still and do nothing: She eats not the bread of idleness, v. 27. She is careful to fill up time, that none of that be lost. When daylight is done her business lying within-doors, and her work worth candle-light, with that she lengthens out the day; and her candle goes not out by night, v. 18. She rises early, while it is yet night (v. 15), to give her servants their breakfast, that they may be ready to go cheerfully about their work. She is none of those who sit up playing cards, or dancing, till midnight, till morning, and then lie in bed till noon. She applies herself to the business that is proper for her. It is not in scholar's business, or statesman's business, or husbandman's business, that she employs herself, but in woman's business. She seeks wool and flax, where she may have the best of each, cheapest; she has a stock of both, and with this she does not only set the poor on work, which is a very good office, but does herself work willingly with her hands. She lays her own hands to the spindle, or spinning-wheel, and her hands hold the distaff (v. 19), and she does not reckon it an abridgment of her liberty. The spindle and the distaff are here mentioned as her honour, while the ornaments of the daughters of Zion are reckoned up to their reproach, Isa. iii. 18, &c. She does not employ herself in sitting work only, or in that which is only the nice performance of the fingers (there are works that are scarcely one remove from doing nothing); but, if there be occasion, she will go through with work that requires all the strength she has, which she will use as one that knows it is the way to have more.

3. She is one that makes what she does to turn to a good account. She perceives that she can make things herself better and cheaper than she can buy them. She brings in provisions of all things necessary and convenient for her family, v. 14. She purchases lands, and enlarges the demesne of the family (v. 16): She considers a field, and buys it. She considers what an advantage it will be to the family. Though she have ever so much mind to it she will not buy it till she has first considered whether it be worth her money, whether the ground will answer the character given of it, and whether she has money at command to pay for it. She also plants a vineyard, but it is with the fruit of her hands. She furnishes her house well and has good clothing for herself and her family (v. 22): She makes herself coverings of tapestry to hang her rooms, and they are of her own making. Her own clothing is rich and fine: it is silk and purple. She has rich clothes and puts them on well. The senator's robes which her husband wears are of her own spinning, and they look better and wear better than any that are bought. She also gets good warm clothing for her children. She needs not fear the cold of the most pinching winter, for she and her family are well provided with clothes. All her household are clothed in scarlet, strong cloth and fit for winter, and yet making a good appearance. She makes more than she and her household have occasion for; and therefore, when she has sufficiently stocked her family, she sells fine linen and girdles to the merchants (v. 24), who carry them to Tyre, the mart of the nations, or some other trading city. She lays up for hereafter: She shall rejoice in time to come, having laid in a good stock for her family.

4. She takes care of her family and all the affairs of it, gives meat to her household (v. 15). She looks well to the ways of her household (v. 27).

5. She is charitable to the poor, v. 20. She is as intent upon giving as she is upon getting. She reaches forth her hands to the needy that are at a distance.

6. She is discreet, not talkative, censorious, nor peevish. When she does speak, it is with prudence and very much to the purpose. In her tongue is the law of kindness. The law of love and kindness is written in the heart, but it shows itself in the tongue. She is full of religious discourse, which shows how full her heart is of another world even when her hands are most busy about this world.

7. That which completes and crowns her character is that she fears the Lord, v. 30. With all those good qualities she lacks not that one thing needful. The fear of God reigning in the heart is the beauty of the soul; it recommends those that have it to the favour of God, and is, in his sight, of great price; it will last for ever, and bid defiance to death itself, which consumes the beauty of the body, but consummates the beauty of the soul.

III. The happiness of this virtuous woman.

1. She has the comfort and satisfaction of her virtue in her own mind (v. 25). She enjoys a firmness and constancy of mind, has spirit to bear up under many crosses and disappointments, and this is her clothing, for defence as well as decency. She deals honourably with all, and shall rejoice in time to come; she shall reflect upon it with comfort, when she comes to be old, that she was not idle or useless when she was young. Nay, she shall rejoice with fulness of joy and pleasures for evermore.

2. She is a great blessing to her relations, v. 28. Her children grow up in her place, and they call her blessed. Her husband thinks himself so happy in her that he takes all occasions to speak well of her.

3. She gets the good word of all her neighbours. A woman that fears the Lord, shall have praise of God (Rom. ii. 29). She shall be highly praised (v. 29): Many have done virtuously, she excels them all. Those ought to be praised the fruit of whose hands is praise-worthy. If her children be dutiful and respectful to her, they then give her of the fruit of her hands; she reaps the benefit of all the care she has taken of them. Her own works will praise her; if her relations and neighbours hold their peace, her good works will proclaim her praise. Thus is shut up this looking-glass for ladies, which they are desired to open and dress themselves by; and, if they do so, their adorning will be found to praise and honour, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ.

Twenty chapters of the book of Proverbs (beginning with ch. x and ending with ch. xxix), consisting mostly of entire sentences in each verse, could not well be reduced to proper heads, and the contents of them gathered; I have therefore here put the contents of all these chapters together, which may be of some use to those who desire to see all that is said on any one head in these chapters.

1. Of the comfort, or grief, parents have in their children, according as they are wise or foolish, godly or ungoldly, ch. x. 1; xv. 20; xvii. 21, 25; xix. 13, 26; xxiii. 15, 16, 24, 25; xxvii. 11; xxix. 3.
2. Of the world's insufficiency, and religion's sufficiency, to make us happy (ch. x. 2, 3; xi. 4) and the preference to be therefore given to the gains of virtue above those of this world, ch. xv. 16, 17; xvi. 8, 16; xvii. 1; xix. 1; xxviii. 6, 11.
3. Of slothfulness and diligence, ch. x. 4, 26; xii. 11, 24, 27; xiii. 4, 23; xv. 19; xvi. 26; xviii. 9; xix. 15, 24; xx. 4, 13; xxi. 5, 25, 26; xxii. 13, 29; xxiv. 30–34; xxvi. 13–16; xxvii. 18, 23; xxviii. 19; xxxi, 27. Particularly the improving or neglecting opportunities, ch. vi. 6; x. 5.
4. The happiness of the righteous, and the misery of the wicked, ch. x. 6, 9, 16, 24, 25, 27–30; xi. 3, 5–8, 18–21, 31; xii. 2, 3, 7, 13, 14, 21, 26, 28; xiii. 6, 9, 14, 15, 21, 22, 25; xiv. 11, 14, 19, 32; xv. 6, 8, 9, 24, 26, 29; xx. 7; xxi. 12, 15, 16, 18, 21; xxii. 12; xxviii. 10, 18; xxix. 6.
5. Of honour and dishonour, ch. x. 7; xii. 8, 9; xviii. 3; xxvi. 1; xxvii. 21. And of vain-glory, ch. xxv. 14, 27; xxvii. 2.
6. The wisdom of obedience, and folly of disobedience, ch. x. 8, 17; xii. 1, 15; xiii. 1, 13, 18; xv. 5, 10, 12, 31, 32; xix. 16; xxviii. 4, 7, 9.
7. Of mischievousness and usefulness, ch. x. 10, 23; xi. 9–11, 23, 27; xii. 5, 6, 12, 18, 20; xiii. 2; xiv. 22; xvi. 29, 30; xvii. 11; xxi. 10; xxiv. 8; xxvi. 23, 27.
8. The praise of wise and good discourse, and the hurt and shame of an ungoverned tongue, ch. x. 11, 12, 14, 20, 21, 31, 32; xi. 30; xiv. 3; xv. 2, 4, 7, 23, 28; xvi. 20, 23, 24; xvii. 7; xviii. 4, 7, 20, 21; xx. 15; xxi. 23; xxiii. 9; xxiv. 26; xxv. 11.
9. Of love and hatred, peaceableness and contention, ch. x. 12; xv. 17; xvii. 1, 9, 14, 19; xviii. 6, 17–19; xx. 3; xxv. 8; xxvi. 17, 21; xxix. 9.

10. Of the rich and poor, ch. x. 15, 22; xi. 28; xiii. 7, 8; xiv. 20, 24; xviii. 11, 23; xix. 1, 4, 7, 22; xxii. 2, 7; xxviii. 6, 11; xxix. 13.
11. Of lying, fraud, and dissimulation, and of truth and sincerity, ch. x. 18; xii. 17, 19, 22; xiii. 5; xvii. 4; xx. 14, 17; xxvi. 18, 19, 24–26, 28.
12. Of slandering, ch. x. 18; xvi. 27; xxv. 23.

77. The necessity of the means of grace, ch. xxix. 18.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE BOOK OF ECCLESIASTES

The account we have of Solomon's apostasy from God, in the latter end of his reign (1 Kings xi. 1), is the tragical part of his story; we may suppose that he spoke his Proverbs in the prime of his time, while he kept his integrity, but delivered his Ecclesiastes when he had grown old (for of the burdens and decays of age he speaks feelingly, ch. xii), and was, by the grace of God, recovered from his backslidings. There he dictated his observations; here he wrote his own experiences; this is what days speak and wisdom which the multitude of years teaches.

I. It is a sermon in print; the text is (ch. i. 2), Vanity of vanities, all is vanity; that is the doctrine too; it is proved at large by many arguments and divers objections are answered, and in the close we have the application, by way of exhortation, to remember our Creator, to fear him, and to keep his commandments. There are indeed many things in this book which are dark and hard to be understood, and some things which men wrest to their own destruction, for want of distinguishing between Solomon's arguments and the objections of atheists; but there is enough easy and plain to convince us of the vanity of the world, and its utter insufficiency to make us happy, the vileness of sin, and its certain tendency to make us miserable, and of the wisdom of being religious, and the solid comfort and satisfaction that are to be had in doing our duty both to God and man.

II. It is a penitential sermon; it is a recantation sermon, in which the preacher sadly laments his own folly in promising himself satisfaction in the things of this world, and even in the forbidden pleasures of sense, which now he finds more bitter than death. His fall is a proof of the weakness of man's nature: Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, when Solomon himself, the wisest of men, played the fool so egregiously; nor let the rich man glory in his riches, since Solomon's wealth was so great a snare to him, and did him a great deal more hurt than Job's poverty did him. His recovery is a proof of the power of God's grace, in bringing one back to God that had gone so far from him.

III. It is a practical profitable sermon. Solomon, being brought to repentance, resolves, like his father, to teach transgressors God's way (Ps. li. 13). The fundamental error of the children of men is the same with that of our first parents, hoping to be as gods by entertaining themselves with that which seems good for food, pleasant to the eyes, and desirable to make one wise. Now the scope of this book is to show that this is a great mistake, that our happiness consists not in being as gods to ourselves to have what we will and do what we will, but in having him that made us to be a God to us. Solomon, in this book, assures us that to fear God and to keep his commandments is the whole of man. He shows the vanity of those things in which men commonly look for happiness, as human learning and policy, sensual delight, honour and power, riches and great possessions. He prescribes remedies. Though we cannot cure them of their vanity, we may prevent the trouble they give us, by sitting loose to them, but laying our expectations low from them, and acquiescing in the will of God, especially by remembering God in the days of our youth, and continuing in his fear and service all our days.

CHAP. I

In this chapter we have, I. The inscription, or title of the book, ver. 1. II. The general doctrine of the vanity of the creature laid down (ver. 2) and explained, ver. 3. III. The proof of this doctrine, taken, 1. From the shortness of human life, ver. 4. 2. From the inconstant nature of all the creatures, and the perpetual flux and reflux they are in, the sun, wind, and water, ver. 5–7. 3. From the abundant toil man has about them, ver. 8. 4. From the return of the same things again, which shows the end of all perfection, ver. 9, 10. 5. From the oblivion to which all things are condemned, ver. 11. IV. The first instance of the vanity of men's knowledge. 1. The trial Solomon made of these, ver. 12, 13, 16, 17. 2. His judgment of them, that all is vanity, ver. 14. There is no satisfaction in it, ver. 18. And, if this is vanity and vexation, all other things in this world, being much inferior to it in dignity and worth, must needs be so too.

Verses 1–3

I. An account of the penman of this book; it was Solomon, for no other son of David was king of Jerusalem; but he conceals his name Solomon, peaceable, because by his sin he had brought trouble upon himself and his kingdom, had broken his peace with God, and therefore was no more worthy of that name. Call me not Solomon, call me Marah, for, behold, for peace I had great bitterness. But he calls himself,

1. The preacher, which intimates his present character. He is Koheleth, which comes from a word which signifies to gather.

(1) Koheleth is a penitent soul, or one gathered, one that had gone astray like a lost sheep, but was now gathered in from his wanderings. The spirit that was dissipated after a thousand vanities is now collected and made to centre in God. It is only the penitent soul that God will accept, the heart that is broken, not the head that is bowed down like a bulrush only for a day. And it is only the gathered soul that comes back from its by-paths.

(2) A preaching soul is one gathering. Being himself gathered, and being reconciled to the church, he endeavours to gather others to it that had gone astray like him. God by his Spirit made him a preacher, in token of his being reconciled to him; a commission is a tacit pardon. Christ sufficiently testifies his forgiving Peter by committing his lambs and sheep to his trust.

2. The son of David. He looked upon it as a great aggravation of his sin that he had such a father. His being the son of David encouraged him to repent and hope for mercy, for David had fallen into sin, but repented, and therein he took example from him and found mercy as he did.

3. King of Jerusalem. God had done much for him, in raising him to the throne, and yet he had so ill requited him. He thought it no disparagement to him, as a king, to be a preacher; but the people would regard him the more as a preacher because he was a king.

II. The general scope and design of the book is, for the making of us truly religious, to take down our esteem of and expectation from the things of this world. In order to this, he shows,

1. That they are all vanity, v. 2. It is all vanity, not only in the abuse of it, when it is perverted by the sin of man, but even in the use of it. It is expressed here very emphatically; not only, All is vain, but in the abstract, All is vanity; as if vanity were the proprium quarto modo—property in the fourth mode, of the things of this world, that which enters into the nature of them. They are not only vanity, but vanity of vanities, the vainest vanity, vanity in the highest degree. Many speak contemptuously of the world because they are hermits, and know it not, or beggars, and have it not; but Solomon knew it. He had dived into nature's depths (1 Kings iv. 33), and he had it, more of it perhaps than ever any man had. He spoke in God's name, and was divinely inspired to say it, deliberately, and laid it down as a fundamental principle, on which he grounded the necessity of being religious. One main thing he designed was to show that the everlasting throne and kingdom must be of another world; for all things in this world are subject to vanity, and therefore have not in them sufficient to answer the extent of that promise.

2. That they are insufficient to make us happy. What profit has a man of all the pains he takes? v. 3. The business of this world is labour; the word signifies both care and toil. It is work that wearies men. What profit has a man of all that labour? Solomon says (Prov. xiv. 23), In all labour there is profit; and yet here he denies that there is any profit. As to our present condition in the world, it is true that by labour we get that which we call profit; we eat the labour of our hands; but here he determines that it is not a real benefit. In short, the wealth and pleasure of this world, if we had ever so much of them, are not sufficient to make us happy. As goods are increased care about them is increased, and those are increased that eat of them, and a little thing will embitter all the comfort of them; and then what profit has a man of all his labour? As to the soul, and the life that is to come, we may much more truly say, What profit has a man of all his labour? All he gets by it will not supply the wants of the soul, will not atone for the sin of the soul, nor cure its diseases.

Verses 4–8

To prove the vanity of all things under the sun Solomon here shows the time of our enjoyment of these things is very short. We continue in the world but for one generation, which is continually passing away to make room for another, and we are passing with it. While the stream of mankind is continually flowing, how little enjoyment has one drop of that stream of the pleasant banks between which it glides! We may give God the glory of that constant succession of generations, but as to our own happiness, let us not expect it within such narrow limits, but in an eternal rest and consistency. It is well for mankind in general that the earth endures to the end of time, when it and all the works in it shall be burnt up; but what is that to particular persons, when they remove to the world of spirits? Man abides upon the earth but a little while. The sun sets indeed every night, yet it rises again in the morning, as bright and fresh as ever. But man lies down and rises not, Job xiv. 7, 12. All things in this world are movable and mutable, constant in nothing but inconstancy, still going, never resting. And can we expect rest in a world where all things are thus full of labour (v. 8), on a sea that is always ebbing and flowing, and her waves continually working and rolling? Man's mind is as restless in its pursuits as the sun, and wind, and rivers, but never satisfied, never contented; the more it has of the world the more it would have; and it would be no sooner filled with the streams of outward prosperity, than the sea is with all the rivers that run into it; it is still as it was, a troubled sea that cannot rest. The earth is where it was; the sun, and winds, and rivers, keep the same course. We must therefore look above the sun for satisfaction, and for a new world. Our senses are unsatisfied, and the objects of them unsatisfying. Curiosity is still inquisitive, because still unsatisfied, and the more it is humoured the more nice and peevish it grows, crying, Give, give.

Verses 9–11

How grateful it is to think that none ever made such advances in knowledge, and such discoveries by it, as we, that none ever made such improvements. We boast of new fashions, new hypotheses, new methods, new expressions, which jostle out the old, and put them down. But this is all a mistake. What is there in the kingdom of nature of which we may say, This is new? The powers of nature and the links of natural causes are still the same that ever they were. Men's hearts, and the corruptions of them, are still the same; their desires, and pursuits, and complaints, are still the same. Tatianus the Assyrian, showing the Grecians how all the arts which they valued themselves upon owed their original to those nations which they counted barbarous, thus reasons with them: "For shame, do not call those things εὑρήσεις—inventions, which are but μίμησεις—imitations." What reason have we to think that the world should be any kinder to us than it has been to those that have gone before us, since there is nothing in it that is new, and our predecessors have made as much of it as could be made? If we would be entertained with new things, we must acquaint ourselves with the things of God, get a new nature; then old things pass away, and all things become new, 2 Cor. v. 17. The gospel puts a new song into our mouths. Many think they have found satisfaction that their names shall be perpetuated, that posterity will celebrate the actions they have performed. How many former things and persons were there, which in their day looked very great and made a mighty figure, and yet there is no remembrance of them. Here and there one person or action that was remarkable met with a kind historian, and had the good hap to be recorded, when at the same time there were others, no less remarkable, that were dropped.

Verses 12–18

That which bids fairest to be the happiness of a reasonable creature is knowledge and learning; if this be vanity, everything else must needs be so. Now as to this,

I. Solomon tells us here what trial he had made of it, and that with such advantages that, if true satisfaction could have been found in it, he would have found it. He had his royal seat in Jerusalem, which then deserved, better than Athens ever did, to be called the eye of the world. Solomon's great wealth and honour put him into a capacity of making his court the centre of learning and the rendezvous of learned men. He made it his business to acquaint himself with all the things that are done under the sun, that are done by the providence of God or by the art and prudence of man. Though he was a prince, he made himself a drudge to learning, was not discouraged by its knots, nor took up short of its depths. And this he did not merely to gratify his own genius, but to qualify himself for the service of God and his generation, and to make an experiment how far the enlargement of the knowledge would go towards the settlement and repose of the mind. He saw all the works that were done under the sun (v. 14), works of nature in the upper and lower world, works of art, the product of men's wit, in a personal or social capacity. He had as much satisfaction in the success of his searches as ever any man had. Solomon must be acknowledged a competent judge of this matter, for he had not only got his head full of notions, but his heart had great experience of wisdom and knowledge, of the power and benefit of knowledge, as well as the entertainment of it; what he knew he had digested, and knew how to use. So industrious was Solomon to improve himself in knowledge that he gained instruction both by the wisdom of prudent men and by the madness of foolish men, by the field of the slothful, as well as of the diligent.

II. He tells us what was the result of this trial, to confirm what he had said, that all is vanity. He found that his searches after knowledge were very toilsome, and a weariness to the mind (v. 13). As bread for the body, so that for the soul, must be got and eaten in the sweat of our face. "I have seen all the works of a world full of business, have observed what the children of men are doing; and behold, whatever men think of their own words, I see all is vanity and vexation of spirit." The more we see of the world the more we see to make us uneasy, and, with Heraclitus, to look upon all with weeping eyes. Solomon especially perceived that the knowledge of wisdom and folly was vexation of spirit, v. 17. It vexed him to see many that had wisdom not use it, and many that had folly not strive against it. He found that when he had got some knowledge he could neither gain that satisfaction to himself, nor do that good to others with it which he expected, v. 15. The minds and manners of men are crooked and perverse. Solomon thought, with his wisdom and power together, thoroughly to reform his kingdom, but he was disappointed. All the philosophy and politics in the world will not restore the corrupt nature of man. Learning will not alter men's natural tempers, nor cure them of their sinful distempers. That which is wanting in our knowledge is so much that it cannot be numbered. The more we know the more we see of our own ignorance. Upon the whole, therefore, he concluded that great scholars do but make themselves great mourners; for in much wisdom is much grief, v. 18. Those that increase knowledge have so much the more quick and sensible perception of the calamities of this world. Let us not therefore be driven off from the pursuit of any useful knowledge, but put on patience to break through the sorrow of it; but let us despair of finding true happiness in this knowledge, and expect it only in the knowledge of God and the careful discharge of our duty to him.

CHAP. II

Solomon having pronounced all vanity goes on to show what reason he has to be tired of this world, and with what little reason most men are fond of it. I. He shows that there is no true happiness and satisfaction to be had in the delights of sense, ver. 1–11. II. He reconsiders wisdom, and allows it to be excellent and useful, and yet sees it insufficient to make a man happy, ver. 12–16. III. He enquires how far wealth will go towards making men happy, and concludes, from his own experience, that, to those who set their hearts upon it, "it is vanity and vexation of spirit" (ver. 17–23), and that, if there be any good in it, it is only to those that sit loose to it, ver. 24–26.

Verses 1–11

Solomon here, in pursuit of the summum bonum—the felicity of man, adjourns out of his study, where he had in vain sought for it, into the park and his garden; he exchanges the company of the philosophers and grave senators for that of the wits and gallants, to try if he could find true satisfaction and happiness among them. Here he takes a great step downward, from the noble pleasures of the intellect to the brutal ones of sense.

I. He resolved to try what mirth would do and the pleasures of wit. "Enjoy pleasure, and take thy fill of it; cast away care, and resolve to be merry." Many that are poor are very merry; beggars in a barn are so to a proverb. Mirth comes short of the solid delights of the rational powers, yet it is to be preferred before those that are merely carnal and sensual. Some distinguish man from the brutes, not only as animal rationale—a rational animal, but as animal risibile—a laughing animal. "Try therefore," says Solomon, "to laugh and be fat, to laugh and be happy." The judgment he passed upon this experiment: I said of laughter, It is mad, or, Thou art mad, and of mirth, What doeth it? Innocent mirth, soberly, seasonably, and moderately used, is a good thing, fits for business, and helps to soften the toils of human life; but, when it is excessive and immoderate, it is foolish and fruitless. It is but a palliative cure to the grievances of this present time.

II. Finding himself not happy in that which pleased his fancy, he resolved next to try that which would please the palate, v. 3. I sought in my heart to give myself unto wine, that is, to good meat and good drink. Solomon applied himself to it critically, and only to make an experiment. He sought to lay hold on folly, to see the utmost that that folly would do towards making men happy. He resolved that the folly should not take hold of him, not get the mastery of him. He took care at the same time to acquaint himself with wisdom, to manage himself wisely in the use of his pleasures, so that they should not do him any prejudice nor disfit him to be a competent judge of them. This Solomon proposed to himself, but he found it vanity. Wine is a mocker; and it will be impossible for any man to say that thus far he will give himself to it and no further. That which he aimed at was not to gratify his appetite, but to find out man's happiness. Observe the description he gives of man's happiness—it is that good for the sons of men which they should do under the heaven all their days. Good Master, what good thing shall I do? Our happiness consists not in being idle, but in doing aright, in being well employed. But that any man should give himself to wine, in hopes to find out in that the best way of living in this world, was an absurdity which Solomon here, in the reflection, condemns.

III. Perceiving quickly that it was folly to give himself to wine, he next tried the most costly entertainments and amusements.

1. He gave himself much to building, both in the city and in the country; and, having been at such vast expense in the beginning of his reign to build a house for God, he was the more excusable if afterwards he pleased his own fancy in building for himself. In building, he had the pleasure of employing the poor and doing good to posterity. We read of Solomon's buildings (1 Kings ix. 15–19), and they were all great works. See his mistake; he enquired after the good works he should do (v. 3), and, in pursuit of the enquiry, applied himself to great works. Good works indeed are truly great, but many are reputed great works which are far from being good.

2. He took to love a garden, which is to some as bewitching as building. He planted himself vineyards; he made himself fine gardens and orchards (v. 5). He had not only forests of timber-trees, but trees of all kinds of fruit, which he himself had planted.

3. He laid out a great deal of money in waterworks, ponds, and canals, not for sport and diversion, but for use, to water the wood that brings forth trees (v. 6); he not only planted, but watered, and then left it to God to give the increase.

4. When he proposed to himself to do great works he must employ many hands, and therefore procured servants and maidens, and of those he had servants born in his house, v. 7.

5. He had large possessions of great and small cattle, herds and flocks, as his father had before him (1 Chron. xxvii. 29, 31).

6. He grew very rich, and was not at all impoverished by his building and gardening.

7. He had all sorts of melody and music, vocal and instrumental. These are called the delights of the sons of men.

8. He enjoyed, more than ever any man did, a composition of rational and sensitive pleasures at the same time. In the midst of these entertainments his wisdom remained with him, v. 9. Yet his judgment and conscience gave no check to his pleasures, nor hindered him from extracting the very quintessence of the delights of sense, v. 10. He had as much pleasure in his business as ever any man had: My heart rejoiced in all my labour. It sweetened his business that he enjoyed the success of it, and it sweetened his enjoyments that they were the product of his business; so that, upon the whole, he was certainly as happy as the world could make him.

9. We have, at length, the judgment he deliberately gave of all this, v. 11. When Solomon reviewed all his works that his hands had wrought with the utmost cost and care, and the labour that he had laboured to do in order to make himself easy and happy, nothing answered his expectation; behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit; there was no profit under the sun, neither by the employments nor by the enjoyments of this world.

Verses 12–16

Solomon having tried what satisfaction was to be had in learning, and in the pleasures of sense, here compares them and passes judgment upon them.

I. He sets himself to consider both wisdom and folly. He here turns himself again to behold them, to see if, upon a second view and second thoughts, he could gain more satisfaction. Let us acquiesce in Solomon's judgment of the things of this world, and not think of repeating the trial; for we can never have such advantages as he had to make the experiment nor be able to make it with equal application of mind.

II. He gives the preference to wisdom far before folly. I soon saw (says he) that there is an excellency in wisdom more than in folly, as much as there is in light above darkness. The pleasures of wisdom, though they suffice not to make men happy, yet vastly transcend the pleasures of wine. Wisdom enlightens the soul with surprising discoveries and necessary directions for the right government of itself; but sensuality clouds the mind, and is as darkness to it. The wise man's eyes are in his head (v. 14), where they should be, ready to discover both the dangers that are to be avoided and the advantages that are to be improved. The fool walks in darkness, and is ever and anon either at a loss, or at a plunge.

III. Yet he maintains that, in respect of lasting happiness and satisfaction, the wisdom of this world gives a man very little advantage. The same sickness, the same sword, devours wise men and fools. Solomon applies this mortifying observation to himself (v. 15). Why should I take so much pains to get wisdom, when, as to this life, it will stand me in so little stead? Then I said in my heart that this also is vanity. Wise men and fools are forgotten alike (v. 16): There is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool. It is promised to the righteous that they shall be had in everlasting remembrance, and their memory shall be blessed, and they shall shortly shine as the stars; but there is no such promise made concerning the wisdom of this world, that that shall perpetuate men's names, for those names only are perpetuated that are written in heaven. Between the death of a godly and a wicked man there is a great difference, but not between the death of a wise man and a fool.

Solomon after a contemplative life and a voluptuous life, betook himself to an active life, and found no more satisfaction in it than in the other; still it is all vanity and vexation of spirit.

I. The business of which he made trial was business under the sun (v. 17–20), about the things of this world; it was the business of a king. It is labour under the sun, labour for the meat that perishes (John vi. 27; Isa. lv. 2), that Solomon here speaks of with so little satisfaction. It was the better sort of business in wisdom, and knowledge, and equity, v. 21. It was rational business, which related to the government of his kingdom. It was labour wherein he showed himself wise (v. 19), which many people have in their eye more than anything else in the prosecution of their worldly business.

II. He soon grew weary of it. He hated all his labour. After he had had his fine houses, and gardens, awhile, he began to look upon them with contempt. This expresses not a gracious hatred of these things, which is our duty, to love them less than God and religion (Luke xiv. 26), nor a sinful hatred of them, which is our folly, to be weary of the place God has assigned us and the work of it, but a natural hatred of them, arising from a surfeit and a sense of disappointment in them. Have we so often bored into this earth for some rich mine of satisfaction, and found not the least sign of it, but been always frustrated in the search, and shall we not at length despair of ever finding it? At length he hated life itself (v. 17), because it is subject to so many toils and troubles, and a constant series of disappointments.

III. Two things made him weary:

1. His business was so great a toil to himself: The work that he had wrought under the sun was grievous unto him, v. 17. A man of business is described to be uneasy both in his going out and his coming in, v. 23. He is deprived of his pleasure by day. He is disturbed in his repose by night. See what fools those are that make themselves drudges to the world, and do not make God their rest; night and day they cannot but be uneasy. So that, upon the whole matter, it is all vanity, v. 17.

2. The gains of his business must all be left to others. To a gracious soul this is no uneasiness at all; why should we not rather be pleased that, when we are gone, those that come after us shall fare the better for our wisdom and industry? He knows not what he will prove to whom he leaves it, whether a wise man or a fool, a wise man that will make it more or a fool that will bring it to nothing. It is probable that Solomon wrote this very feelingly, being afraid what Rehoboam would prove.

IV. The best use which is therefore to be made of the wealth of this world is to use it cheerfully and do good with it. With this he concludes the chapter, v. 24–26. That good which is here recommended to us is the utmost pleasure and profit we can expect or extract from the business of this world, and the furthest we can go to rescue it from its vanity and vexation. We must be more in care to use an estate well, for the ends for which we were entrusted with it, than how to increase it. He would not have us to give up business, and take our ease, that we may eat and drink; we must enjoy good in our labour; we must use these things, not to excuse us from, but to make us diligent and cheerful in, our worldly business. We must herein acknowledge God; we must see that it is from the hand of God. A heart to enjoy them is the gift of God's grace. Solomon himself, with all his possessions, could aim at no more and desire no better (v. 25). Yet Solomon could not obtain it by his own wisdom, without the special grace of God, and therefore directs us to expect it from the hand of God and pray to him for it. Riches are a blessing or a curse to a man according as he has or has not a heart to make good use of them. God makes them a reward to a good man, if with them he give him wisdom, and knowledge, and joy, to enjoy them cheerfully himself and to communicate them charitably to others. He makes them a punishment to a bad man if he denies him a heart to take the comfort of them, for they do but tantalize him and tyrannize over him. Godliness, with contentment, is great gain. Ungodliness is commonly punished with discontent and an insatiable covetousness, which are sins that are their own punishment.

CHAP. III

Solomon having shown the vanity of studies, pleasures, and business, and made it to appear that happiness is not to be found in the schools of the learned, nor in the gardens of Epicurus, nor upon the exchange, therefore we should cheerfully content ourselves with, and make use of, what God has given us, by showing, I. The mutability of all human affairs, ver. 1–10. II. The immutability of the divine counsels, ver. 11–15. III. The vanity of worldly honour and power, ver. 16. For a check to proud oppressors, and to show them their vanity, he reminds them, 1. That they will be called to account for it in the other world, ver. 17. 2. That their condition, in reference to this world, is no better than that of the brutes, ver. 18–21.

Verses 1–10

We live in a world of changes. The several events of time, and conditions of human life, are vastly different from one another, and we are continually passing and repassing between them. In the wheel of nature (James iii. 6) sometimes one spoke is uppermost and by and by the contrary; there is a constant ebbing and flowing, waxing and waning from one extreme to the other. When we are in prosperity, we should be easy, and yet not secure—not to be secure because we live in a world of changes, and yet to be easy, and, as he had advised (ch. ii. 24), to enjoy the good of our labour, in a humble dependence upon God, neither lifted up with hopes, nor cast down with fears, but with evenness of mind.

I. A general proposition is laid down: To everything there is a season, v. 1. Those things which seem most contrary the one to the other will, in the revolution of affairs, each take their turn and come into play. The day will give place to the night and the night again to the day. Is it summer? It will be winter. Is it winter? Stay a while, and it will be summer. Every purpose has its time.

II. Some of these changes are purely the act of God, others depend more upon the will of man. Everything under heaven is thus changeable, but in heaven there is an unchangeable state. 1. There is a time to be born and a time to die. But, as there is a time to be born and a time to die, so there will be a time to rise again. 2. There is a time for men to plant, a time of the year, a time of their lives; but, when that which was planted has grown fruitless and useless, it is time to pluck it up. 3. A time to kill, when the judgments of God are abroad in a land and lay all waste; but, when he returns in ways of mercy, then is a time to heal what he has torn (Hos. vi. 1, 2), to comfort a people after the time that he has afflicted them, Ps. xc. 15. 4. A time to break down a family, an estate, a kingdom, when it has ripened itself for destruction; but God will find a time, if they return and repent, to rebuild what he has broken down. 5. A time when God's providence calls to weep and mourn, but, on the other hand, there is a time when God calls to cheerfulness, a time to laugh and dance, and then he expects we should serve him with joyfulness and gladness of heart. 6. A time to cast away stones, by breaking down fortifications, when God gives peace in the borders, but there is a time to gather stones together, for the making of strongholds, v. 5. 7. A time to embrace a friend when we find him faithful, but a time to refrain from embracing when we find he is unfair or unfaithful. It is commonly applied to conjugal embraces, and explained by 1 Cor. vii. 3–5; Joel ii. 16. 8. A time to get money, preferment, good bargains, when opportunity smiles, a time when a wise man will seek (so the word is); when he is setting out in the world and has a growing family, when he is in his prime, then it is time for him to be busy and make hay when the sun shines. There will come a time to lose, when what has been soon got will be soon scattered. 9. A time to keep, when we have use for what we have got, but there may come a time to cast away, when love to God may oblige us to cast away what we have, because we must deny Christ and wrong our consciences if we keep it (Matt. x. 37, 38). 10. A time to rend the garments, as upon occasion of some great grief, and a time to sew them again, in token that the grief is over. 11. A time when it is our duty to keep silence, when it is an evil time (Amos v. 13), or when we are in danger of speaking amiss (Ps. xxxix. 2); but there is also a time to speak for the glory of God when silence would be the betraying of a righteous cause. 12. A time to love, and to show ourselves friendly, to be free and cheerful, but there may come a time to hate, when we shall see cause to break off all familiarity with some that we have been fond of, and to be upon the reserve. 13. A time of war, when God draws the sword for judgment, when men draw the sword for justice, but we may hope for a time of peace, when the sword of the Lord shall be sheathed and he shall make wars to cease (Ps. xlvi. 9). War shall not last always, nor is there any peace to be called lasting on this side the everlasting peace.

III. If our present state be subject to such vicissitude, What profit has he that works? We must look upon ourselves as upon our probation in it. There is indeed no profit in that wherein we labour; the thing itself, when we have it, will do us little good; but, if we make a right use of the disposals of Providence about it, there will be profit in that (v. 10): I have seen the travail which God has given to the sons of men, not to make up a happiness by it, but to be exercised in it, to have various graces exercised by the variety of events, to have their dependence upon God tried by every change, and to be trained and taught. Every change cuts us out some new work, which we should be more solicitous about, than about the event.

Solomon shows the hand of God in all those changes.

I. We must make the best of that which is, and must believe it best for the present, and accommodate ourselves to it: He has made everything beautiful in his time (v. 11). Cold is as becoming in winter as heat in summer; and the night, in its turn, is a black beauty, as the day, in its turn, is a bright one. There is a wonderful harmony in the divine Providence and all its disposals, so that events considered in their relations and tendencies, together with the seasons of them, appear very beautiful, to the glory of God and the comfort of those that trust in him. Though we see not the complete beauty of Providence, yet we shall see it, and a glorious sight it will be, when the mystery of God shall be finished. Deut. xxxii. 4; Ezek. i. 18.

II. We must wait with patience for the full discovery of that which to us seems intricate and perplexed, acknowledging that we cannot find out the work that God makes from the beginning to the end, and therefore must judge nothing before the time. While the picture is in drawing, and the house in building, we see not the beauty of either; but when the artist has given them their finishing strokes, then all appears very good. We see but the middle of God's works, not from the beginning of them (then we should see how admirably the plan was laid in the divine counsels), nor to the end of them, which crowns the action (then we should see the product to be glorious); but we must wait till the veil be rent. Those words, He has set the world in their hearts, are differently understood. 1. Some make them to be a reason why we may know more of God's works than we do. If men did but give themselves to the exact observation of things, they might in most of them perceive an admirable order and contrivance. 2. Others make them to be a reason why we do not know so much of God's works as we might: "We have the world so much in our hearts, are so taken up with thoughts and cares of worldly things, that we have neither time nor spirit to eye God's hand in them."

III. There is no certain lasting, good in these things (v. 12, 13). All the good there is in them is to do good with them, to our families, to our neighbours, to the poor, to the public, to its civil and religious interests. What have we our beings, capacities, and estates for, but to be some way serviceable to our generation? It is in this life, where we are in a state of trial and probation for another life. Every man's life is his opportunity of doing that which will make for him in eternity. Let us make ourselves easy, rejoice, and enjoy the good of our labour, as it is the gift of God, and so enjoy God in it, and return him thanks.

IV. We must be satisfied in the disposals of the divine Providence, both as to personal and public concerns. "Let it be as God wills", for, how cross soever it may be to our designs and interests, God's will is his wisdom. That counsel needs not to be altered. If we could see it altogether at one view, we should see it so perfect that nothing can be put to it, for there is no deficiency in it, nor anything taken from it, for there is nothing in it unnecessary, or that can be spared.

V. We must study to answer God's end in all his providences. Whatever changes we see or feel in this world, we must acknowledge the inviolable steadiness of God's government. With the events of Providence (v. 15): That which has been is now. The world, as it has been, is and will be constant in inconstancy; for God requires that which is past, that is, repeats what he has formerly done. There has no change befallen us, but such as is common to men.

Solomon is still showing that everything in this world, without piety and the fear of God, is vanity. In these verses he shows that power and life itself are nothing without the fear of God.

I. Here is the vanity of man, mighty upon the throne, man upon the judgment-seat, where, if he be governed by the laws of religion, he is God's viceregent. But without the fear of God it is vanity, for, set that aside, and,

1. The judge will not judge aright. Solomon perceived that there was wickedness in the place of judgment. Man being in honour, and not understanding what he ought to do, becomes like the beasts that perish, like the beasts of prey. It would have been better for the people to have had no judges than to have had such. It would have been better for the judges to have had no power than to have used it to such ill purposes.

2. The judge will himself be judged for not judging aright. I said in my heart that this unrighteous judgment is not conclusive, for there will be a review of the judgment; God shall judge between the righteous and the wicked, shall judge for the righteous and plead their cause. It is an unspeakable comfort to the oppressed that their cause will be heard over again. Let them therefore wait with patience, for there is another Judge that stands before the door. There is a time for the re-hearing of causes, redressing of grievances, and reversing of unjust decrees, though as yet we see it not here, Job xxiv. 1.

II. Here is the vanity of man as mortal. He now comes to speak more generally concerning the estate of the sons of men in this world, and shows that their reason, without religion and the fear of God, advances them but little above the beasts. Lay no blame on God; let them not say that he made this world to be man's prison and life to be his penance. God made man little lower than the angels; if he be mean and miserable, it is his own fault. It is no easy matter to convince proud men that they are but men (Ps. ix. 20), much more to convince bad men that they are beasts, being destitute of religion. A worldly, carnal, earthly-minded man, has no pre-eminence above the beast, for all that which he sets his heart upon is vanity, v. 19. That which befalls the sons of men is no other than that which befalls beasts; death makes much the same change with a beast that it does with a man. As to their bodies, the change is altogether the same, except the different respects that are paid to them by the survivors. Solomon here observes that all go unto one place; the dead bodies of men and beasts putrefy alike; all turn to dust again in their corruption. As to their spirits there is indeed a vast difference, but not a visible one, v. 21. It is certain that the spirit of the sons of men at death goes upwards to the Father of spirits, who made it; it dies not with the body, but is redeemed from the power of the grave, Ps. xlix. 15. The soul of a man is then like a candle taken out of a dark lantern, which leaves the lantern useless indeed, but does itself shine brighter. Those that live by sense, as all carnal sensualists do, that walk in the sight of their eyes, have no pre-eminence above the beasts. It is not strange that those live like beasts who think they shall die like beasts, but on such the noble faculties of reason are lost. An inference drawn from it (v. 22): There is nothing better, as to this world, than that a man should rejoice in his own works, that is, Keep a clear conscience, and never admit iniquity into the place of righteousness. Live a cheerful life. If God has prospered the work of our hands unto us, let us rejoice in it, and not make it a burden.

CHAP. IV

Solomon shows, I. The temptation which the oppressed feel to discontent and impatience, ver. 1–3. II. The temptation which those that love their ease feel to take their ease, ver. 4–6. III. The folly of hoarding up abundance of worldly wealth, ver. 7, 8. IV. A remedy against that folly, in being made sensible of the benefit of mutual assistance, ver. 9–12. V. The mutability even of royal dignity, not only through the folly of the prince himself (ver. 13, 14), but through the fickleness of the people, ver. 15, 16.

Verses 1–3

Solomon had a large soul (1 Kings iv. 29) and it appeared by this, among other things, that he had a very tender concern for the miserable and the afflicted. He had taken the oppressors to task (ch. iii. 16, 17); now he observes the oppressed and here he does it as a preacher:

I. The troubles of their condition (v. 1) grieved him. Servants and labourers were oppressed by their masters, debtors by cruel creditors and creditors too by fraudulent debtors, tenants by hard landlords and orphans by treacherous guardians, and, worst of all, subjects oppressed by arbitrary princes and unjust judges. He beheld the tears of such as were oppressed, unable to help themselves: On the side of their oppressors there was power, when they had done wrong, to stand to it and make good what they had done, so that the poor were born down with a strong hand and had no way to obtain redress.

II. Being thus hardly used, they are tempted to envy those that are dead and in their graves, and to wish they had never been born (v. 2, 3); and Solomon is ready to agree with them. "I praised the dead that are already dead before they had well begun to live. I concluded that it is better with them than with the living that are yet alive, and that is all, dragging the long and heavy chain of life, and wearing out its tedious minutes." Better never to have been born than be born to see the evil work that is done under the sun, and not only to be in no capacity to mend the matter, but to suffer ill for doing well. A good man, how calamitous a condition soever he is in in this world, cannot have cause to wish he had never been born, since he is glorifying the Lord even in the fires.

I. If a man be acute, and dexterous, and successful in his business, he gets the ill-will of his neighbours (v. 4), and the more for the reputation he has got by his honesty. Cain envied Abel, Esau Jacob and Saul David, and all for their right works. This is downright diabolism. Those that excel in virtue will always be an eye-sore to those that exceed in vice, which should not discourage us from any right work, but drive us to expect the praise of it, not from men, but from God.

II. If a man be stupid and blundering in his business, he does ill for himself (v. 5): The fool that goes about his work as if his hands were muffled and folded together, that does everything awkwardly, the sluggard that loves his ease and folds his hands together to keep them warm, eats his own flesh, is a cannibal to himself, brings himself into such a poor condition that he has nothing to eat but his own flesh. The following words (v. 6), Better is a handful with quietness than both the hands full with travail and vexation of spirit, may be taken either, 1. As the sluggard's excuse of himself in his idleness, as if a little with idleness is better than abundance with honest labour. But, 2. I rather take it as Solomon's advice to keep the mean between travail and slothfulness. Let us by honest industry lay hold on the handful, that we may not want necessaries, but not grasp at both the hands full, which will but create us vexation of spirit. Moderate pains and moderate gains will do best.

Verses 7–12

Solomon fastens upon another instance of the vanity of this world, that frequently the more men have of it the more they would have; and on this they are so intent that they have no enjoyment of what they have.

I. Selfishness is the cause of this evil (v. 7, 8): There is one alone, that minds none but himself, cares for nobody; there is not a second, nor does he desire there should be: one mouth he thinks enough in a house. He makes himself a slave to his business. Though he has neither child nor brother, none to take care of but himself, nor dares he marry, for fear of the expense of a family, yet is there no end to his labour. He never thinks he has enough: His eye is not satisfied with riches. He has enough for his back, for his belly, for his calling, for his family, for his living decently in the world, but he has not enough for his eyes. He denies himself the comfort of what he has: He bereaves his soul of good. He has no excuse for doing this: He has neither child nor brother, none that are poor or dear to him. It is wisdom for those that take pains about this world to consider whom they take all this pains for, and whether it be really worth while. If men do not consider this, it is vanity, and a sore travail; they shame and vex themselves to no purpose.

II. Sociableness is the cure of this evil. Men are thus sordid because they are all for themselves. Solomon shows, by divers instances, that it is not good for man to be alone (Gen. ii. 18); he designs to recommend to us both marriage and friendship. Two are better than one, and more happy jointly than either of them could be separately. They have a good reward of their labour. He that serves himself has himself only for his paymaster. But he that is kind to another has a good reward; the pleasure and advantage of holy love will be an abundant recompence for all the work and labour of love. He proves it by divers instances of the benefit of friendship and good conversation. It is good for two to travel together, for if one happen to fall, the other will be ready to help him up. If a man fall into sin, his friend will help to restore him with the spirit of meekness. Virtuous and gracious affections are excited by good society, and Christians warm one another by provoking one another to love and to good works. If an enemy find a man alone, he is likely to prevail against him; but, if he have a second, he may do well enough: two shall withstand him. As was said of the ancient Britons, when the Romans invaded them, Dum singuli pugnant, universi vincuntur—While they fight in detached parties, they sacrifice the general cause. In our spiritual warfare we may be helpful to one another as well as in our spiritual work; next to the comfort of communion with God, is that of the communion of saints. He concludes with this proverb, A threefold cord is not easily broken, any more than a bundle of arrows, though each single thread, and each single arrow, is. Two together he compares to a threefold cord; for where two are closely joined in holy love and fellowship, Christ will by his Spirit come to them, and make the third, as he joined himself to the two disciples going to Emmaus, and then there is a threefold cord that can never be broken.

Verses 13–16

I. A king is not happy unless he have wisdom, v. 13, 14. If he be foolish he will not suffer any counsel or admonition to be given him. Folly and wilfulness commonly go together, and those that most need admonition can worst bear it; but neither age nor titles will secure men respect if they have not true wisdom and virtue to recommend them; while wisdom and virtue will gain men honour even under the disadvantages of youth and poverty.

II. A king is not likely to continue if he have not a confirmed interest in the affections of the people. He that is king must have a successor, a second, a child that shall stand up in his stead, his own, suppose, or perhaps that poor and wise child spoken of, v. 13. People are never long easy and satisfied: There is no end, no rest, of all the people; they are continually fond of changes, and know not what they would have. As it has been, so it is likely to be still: Those that come after will be of the same spirit, and shall not long rejoice in him whom at first they seemed extremely fond of. To-day, Hosanna—tomorrow, Crucify. This is vanity and vexation of spirit.

CHAP. V

Solomon, in this chapter, discourses, I. Concerning the worship of God, prescribing that as a remedy against all those vanities which he had already observed to be in wisdom, learning, pleasure, honour, power, and business. If our religion be a vain religion, how great is that vanity! Let us therefore take heed of vanity, 1. In hearing the word, and offering sacrifice, ver. 1. 2. In prayer, ver. 2, 3. 3. In making vows, ver. 4–6. 4. In pretending to divine dreams, ver. 7. II. Concerning the wealth of this world and the vanity and vexation that attend it. The fruits of the earth indeed are necessary to the support of life (ver. 9), but 1. Silver, and gold, and riches, are unsatisfying, ver. 10. 2. They are unprofitable, ver. 11. 3. They are disquieting, ver. 12. 4. They often prove hurtful and destroying, ver. 13. 5. They are perishing, ver. 14. 6. They must be left behind when we die, ver. 15, 16. 7. If we have not a heart to make use of them, they occasion a great deal of uneasiness, ver. 17. We can learn out of this chapter how to manage the business of religion, and the business of this world (which two take up most of our time), so that both may turn to a good account.

Verses 1–3

Solomon's design, in driving us off from the world, by showing us its vanity, is to drive us to God and to our duty.

I. He here sends us to the house of God, to the place of public worship. Let our disappointments in the creature turn our eyes to the Creator. In the word and prayer there is a balm for every wound.

II. He charges us to behave ourselves well there. Religious exercises are not vain things, but, if we mismanage them, they become vain to us. "Keep thy foot, not keep it back from the house of God (as Prov. xxv. 17), but look well to thy goings, ponder the path of thy feet, lest thou take a false step. Address thyself to the worship of God with a solemn pause, and take time to compose thyself, not going about it with precipitation, which is called hasting with the feet, Prov. xix. 2. Keep thy thoughts from roving and wandering; keep thy affections from running out towards wrong objects." Some think it alludes to the charge given to Moses and Joshua to put off their shoes (Exod. iii. 5, Joshua v. 15). We must take heed that the sacrifice we bring be not the sacrifice of fools—that we rest not in the sign and ceremony, and the outside of the performance, without regarding the sense and meaning of it, for that is the sacrifice of fools. Men may be doing evil even when they do not know it, when they do not consider it. Wicked minds cannot choose but sin, even in the acts of devotion. We must be ready to hear; must diligently attend to the word of God read and preached. Hearing is often put for obeying, and that is it that is better than sacrifice, 1 Sam. xv. 22; Isa. i. 15, 16. Let the word of the Lord come (said a good man), and if I had 600 necks I would bow them all to the authority of it. We must be very cautious in all approaches to God (v. 2): Be not rash with thy mouth, in making prayers, or protestations, or promises; let not thy heart be hasty to utter anything before God. If we come without an errand, we shall go away without any advantage. What we utter before God must come from the heart, and therefore we must never let our tongue outrun our thoughts in our devotions. Thoughts are words to God. It is not enough that what we say comes from the heart, but it must come from a composed heart, and not from a sudden heat or passion. God is in heaven, where he is far exalted above all our blessing and praise. We are on earth, the footstool of his throne, unworthy to have any communion with him. Therefore we must be grave, humble, serious, and reverent in speaking to him.

Verses 4–8

Four things we are exhorted to in these verses:

I. To be conscientious in paying our vows.

1. A vow is a bond upon the soul (Num. xxx. 2). When, under the sense of some affliction (Ps. lxvi. 14), or in the pursuit of some mercy (1 Sam. i. 11), thou hast vowed a vow unto God, know that thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord and thou canst not go back; therefore perform what thou hast promised. Pay that which thou hast vowed; pay it in full and keep not back any part of the price. Have we vowed to give our own selves unto the Lord? Let us then be as good as our word. Defer not to pay it.

2. Two reasons are here given why we should speedily and cheerfully pay our vows: (1) Because otherwise we affront God; we play the fool with him, as if we designed to put a trick upon him; and God has no pleasure in fools. (2) Because otherwise we wrong ourselves, we incur the penalty for the breach of it; so that it would have been better a great deal not to have vowed. Not to have vowed would have been but an omission, but to vow and not pay incurs the guilt of treachery, and perjury; it is lying to God, Acts v. 4.

II. To be cautious in making our vows. We must take heed that we never vow anything that is sinful, or that may be an occasion of sin, for such a vow is ill-made and must be broken. Suffer not thy mouth, by such a vow, to cause thy flesh to sin, as Herod's rash promise caused him to cut off the head of John the Baptist. "When thou hast made a vow, do not seek to evade it; say not before the priest, who is called the angel or messenger of the Lord of hosts, that, upon second thoughts, thou hast changed thy mind, and desirest to be absolved from the obligation of thy vow; but stick to it, and do not seek a hole to creep out at." If we treacherously cancel the words of our mouths, and revoke our vows, God will justly overthrow our projects.

III. To keep up the fear of God, v. 7. Many, of old, pretended to know the mind of God by dreams, and almost made God's people forget his name by their dreams (Jer. xxiii. 25, 26); and many now perplex themselves with their frightful or odd dreams, as if they foreboded disaster. Those that heed dreams shall have a multitude of them; but in them all there are divers vanities. Therefore never heed them; instead of repeating them lay no stress upon them, draw no disquieting conclusions from them, but fear thou God.

IV. Every good man that has a sense of justice and a concern for mankind, is angry to see the oppression of the poor, and the violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, oppression under colour of law and backed with power. The kingdom in general may have a good government, and yet it may so happen that a particular province may be committed to a bad man. When things look thus dismal we may satisfy ourselves that, though oppressors be high, God is higher than the highest of creatures, than the highest of princes. God is the Most High over all the earth, and his glory is above the heavens. Though oppressors be secure, God has his eye upon them, and will reckon for all their violent perverting of judgment.

Verses 9–17

Solomon shows that there is as much vanity in great riches, and the lust of the eye about them, as there is in the lusts of the flesh and the pride of life, and a man can make himself no more happy by hoarding an estate than by spending it.

I. He grants that the products of the earth, for the support and comfort of human life, are valuable things (v. 9). There is profit to be got out of the earth, and it is for all; all need it; it is appointed for all; there is enough for all. The earth is our storehouse and the beasts are fellow-commoners with us. The king himself is served of the field, and would be starved, without its products. This puts a great honour upon the husbandman's calling, that it is the most necessary of all to the support of man's life.

II. He maintains that the riches that are more than these, that are for hoarding, not for use, are vain things, and will not make a man easy or happy. The more men have the more they would have, v. 10. Natural desires are at rest when that which is desired is obtained, but corrupt desires are insatiable. There are bodily desires which silver itself will not satisfy; if a man be hungry ingots of silver will do no more to satisfy his hunger than clods of clay. Much less will worldly abundance satisfy spiritual desires. When goods increase, they are increased that eat them, v. 11. The more meat the more mouths. Does the estate thrive? And does not the family at the same time grow more numerous and the children grow up to need more? The more men have the better house they must keep. The owner sees that as his own, which those about him enjoy as much of the real benefit of as he; only he has the satisfaction of doing good to others, which indeed is a satisfaction to one who believed what Christ said, that it is more blessed to give than to receive. The more men have the more care they have about it, which perplexes them and disturbs their repose, v. 12. Refreshing sleep is as much the support and comfort of this life as food is. Those commonly sleep best that work hard and have but what they work for: The sleep of the labouring man is sweet. Those that have everything else often fail to secure a good night's sleep. The more men have the more danger they are in both of doing mischief and of having mischief done them (v. 13): There is an evil, a sore evil, riches kept for the owners thereof (who have been industrious to hoard them and keep them safely) to their hurt; they would have been better without them. They do hurt with their riches, which not only put them into a capacity of gratifying their own lusts but give them an opportunity of oppressing others and dealing hardly with them. Often they sustain hurt by their riches. They would not be envied, would not be robbed, if they were not rich. Those riches that have been laid up with a great deal of pains perish by evil travail, by the very pains and care which they take to secure and increase them. Many a one has lost all by catching at all. How much soever men have when they die, they must leave it all behind them (v. 15, 16): As he came forth of his mother's womb naked, so shall he return. In respect of the body we must go as we came; the dust shall return to the earth as it was. But sad is our case if the soul return as it came, unsanctified. This is a sore evil; he thinks it so whose heart is glued to the world, that he shall take nothing of his labour which he may carry away in his hand; his riches will not go with him into another world nor stand him in any stead there. If we labour in religion, the grace and comfort we get by that labour we may carry away in our hearts, and shall be the better for it to eternity; that is meat that endures. Men will see that they have laboured for the wind when at death they find the profit of their labour is all gone, gone like the wind, they know not whither. Those that have much, if they set their hearts upon it, have not only uncomfortable deaths, but uncomfortable lives too, v. 17. This covetous worldling, that is so bent upon raising an estate, all his days eats in darkness and much sorrow, and it is his sickness and wrath; he has not only no pleasure of his estate, nor any enjoyment of it himself, for he eats the bread of sorrow (Ps. cxxvii. 2), but a great deal of vexation to see others eat of it.

Solomon, from the vanity of riches hoarded up, here infers that the best course we can take is to use well what we have, to serve God with it, to do good with it, and take the comfort of it to ourselves and our families; this he had pressed before, ch. ii. 24; iii. 22. Life is God's gift, and he has appointed us the number of the days of our life (Job xiv. 5); let us therefore spend those days in serving the Lord our God with joyfulness and gladness of heart. We must not do the business of our calling as a drudgery, and make ourselves slaves to it, but we must rejoice in our labour, not grasp at more business than we can go through without perplexity and disquiet. Those that cheerfully use what God has given them thereby honour the giver, answer the intention of the gift, act rationally and generously, do good in the world, and make what they have turn to the best account, and this is both their credit and their comfort; it is good and comely; there is duty and decency in it. A heart to do thus is such a gift of God's grace as crowns all the gifts of his providence. This is the way to relieve ourselves against the many toils and troubles which our lives on earth are incident to (v. 20): He shall not much remember the days of his life, the days of his sorrow and sore travail, his working days, his weeping days. He shall either forget them or remember them as waters that pass away; he shall not much lay to heart his crosses, nor long retain the bitter relish of them, because God answers him in the joy of his heart, balances all the grievances of his labour with the joy of it and recompenses him for it by giving him to eat the labour of his hands.

CHAP. VI

In this chapter, I. The royal preacher goes on further to show the vanity of worldly wealth. Riches, in the hands of a man that is wise and generous, are good for something, but in the hands of a sordid, sneaking, covetous miser, they are good for nothing. He takes an account of the possessions and enjoyments which such a man may have. He has wealth (ver. 2), he has children to inherit it (ver. 3), and lives long, ver. 3, 6. He describes his folly in not taking the comfort of it; he has no power to eat of it, lets strangers devour it, and at last has no burial, ver. 2, 3. He prefers the condition of a still-born child before the condition of such a one, ver. 3. The still-born child's infelicity is only negative (ver. 4, 5), but that of the covetous worldling is positive, ver. 6. He shows the vanity of riches as pertaining only to the body, and giving no satisfaction to the mind (ver. 7, 8), and of those boundless desires with which covetous people vex themselves (ver. 9), which, if they be gratified ever so fully, leave a man but a man still, ver. 10. II. He concludes this discourse of the vanity of the creature with this plain inference from the whole, That it is folly to think of making up a happiness for ourselves in the things of this world, ver. 11, 12. Our satisfaction must be in another life, not in this.

Verses 1–6

Solomon now shows the evil of having and not using. This is an evil which Solomon himself saw under the sun, v. 1. Solomon, as a king, took notice of this evil as a prejudice to the public, who are damaged not only by men's prodigality on the one hand, but by their penuriousness on the other. As it is with the blood in the natural body, so it is with the wealth of the body politic, if, instead of circulating, it stagnates, it will be of ill consequence. Solomon as a preacher observed the evils that were done that he might reprove them and warn people against them.

I. The abundant reason the miser has to serve God. Riches and wealth commonly gain people honour among men. Riches, wealth, and honour, are God's gifts, the gifts of his providence. Yet they are given to many that do not make a good use of them. He wants nothing for his soul of all that he desires. He does not desire grace for his soul, the better part; all he desires is enough to gratify the sensual appetite, and that he has. He is supposed to have a numerous family, to beget a hundred children, which are the stay and strength of his house and in whom he has the prospect of having his name built up. To complete his happiness, he is supposed to live many years, a thousand years twice told.

II. The little heart he has to use this which God gives him, for the ends and purposes for which it was given him. This is his fault. He cannot find in his heart to take the comfort of what he has himself. He has meat before him, but he has not power to eat thereof. His sordid niggardly temper will not suffer him to lay it out, no, not upon himself. Because he has not the will to serve God with it, God denies him the power to serve himself with it. God orders it so that a stranger eats it. This may be well called vanity, and an evil disease. Our worst diseases are those that arise from the corruption of our own hearts. He deprives himself of the good that he might have had of his worldly possessions. His soul is not filled with good, v. 3. He has no burial, none agreeable to his rank, no decent burial, but the burial of an ass.

III. An untimely birth, a child that is carried from the womb to the grave, is better than he. Solomon here pronounces an untimely birth, upon many accounts, to be very sad (v. 4, 5): He comes in with vanity and he departs in darkness; little or no notice is taken of him; being an abortive, he has no name, or, if he had, it would soon be forgotten and buried in oblivion; it would be covered with darkness, as the body is with the earth. Nay (v. 5), he has not seen the sun, but from the darkness of the womb he is hurried immediately to that of the grave, and, which is worse than not being known to any, he has not known anything.

Verses 7–10

The preacher here further shows the vanity and folly of heaping up worldly wealth and expecting happiness in it.

I. How much soever we toil about the world, and get out of it, we can have for ourselves no more than a maintenance (v. 7). A little will serve to sustain us comfortably and a great deal can do no more.

II. Those that have ever so much are still craving; let a man labour ever so much for his mouth, yet the appetite is not filled. The desires of the soul find nothing in the wealth of the world to give them any satisfaction. The soul is not filled, so the word is.

III. A fool may have as much worldly wealth, and may enjoy as much of the pleasure of it, as a wise man; nay, and perhaps not be so sensible of the vexation of it: What has the wise more than the fool? (v. 8). A fool can fare as well, can dress as well, and make as good a figure in any public appearance, as a wise man; so that if there were not pleasures and honour peculiar to the mind, which the wise man has more than the fool, as to this world they would be upon a level.

IV. Even a poor man, who has business, and is discreet, diligent, in the management of it, may get as comfortably through this world as he that is loaded with an overgrown estate. Why, he is better beloved and more respected among his neighbours, and has a better interest than many a rich man that is griping and haughty.

V. The enjoyment of what we have cannot but be acknowledged more rational than a greedy grasping at more (v. 9): Better is the sight of the eyes, making the best of that which is present, than the wandering of the desire. He is much happier that is always content, though he has ever so little, than he that is always coveting, though he has ever so much. We cannot say, Better is the sight of the eyes than the fixing of the desire upon God, and the resting of the soul in him.

VI. Whatever we attain to in this world, still we are but men, and the greatest possessions cannot set us above the common accidents of human life. That busy animal that makes such a stir and such a noise in the world, is named already. He that made him gave him his name, and it is known that it is man; and it is a humbling name, Gen. v. 2. He called their name Adam; and all theirs have the same character, red earth. It is good for rich and great men to know and consider that they are but men, Ps. ix. 20.

Verses 11–12

There be many things that increase vanity; even that which pretends to increase wealth and pleasure does but increase vanity and make it more vexatious. We do not know what to wish for, because that which we promise ourselves most satisfaction in often proves most vexatious to us. Thoughtful people are in care to do everything for the best, if they knew it; but it is an instance of the corruption of our hearts that we are apt to desire that as good for us which is really hurtful. Since everything is vanity, Who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun? He can no more please himself with the hopes of what shall be after him, to his children and family, than with the relish of what is with him, since he can neither foresee himself, nor can anyone else foretell to him, what shall be after him.

CHAP. VII

Solomon had given many proofs of the vanity of this world. In this chapter, I He recommends to us some good means to be used for the redress of these grievances, that we may make the best of the bad, as, 1. Care of our reputation, ver. 1. 2. Seriousness, ver. 2–6. 3. Calmness of spirit, ver. 7–10. 4. Prudence in the management of all our affairs, ver 11, 12. 5. Submission to the will of God in all events, ver. 13–15. 6. A conscientious avoiding of all dangerous extremes, ver. 16–18. 7. Mildness and tenderness towards those that have been injurious to us, ver. 19–22. In short, to keep our temper and to maintain a strict government of our passions. II. He laments his own iniquity, the having of many wives, by which he was drawn away from God and his duty, ver. 23–29.

Verses 1–6

In these verses Solomon lays down some great truths which seem paradoxes.

I. That the honour of virtue is really more valuable and desirable than all the wealth and pleasure in this world (v. 1): A good name is before good ointment (so it may be read). Good ointment is here put for all the profits of the earth (among the products of which oil was reckoned one of the most valuable), for all the delights of sense (it is called the oil of gladness), and for the highest titles of honour, for kings are anointed. A good name is better than all riches (Prov. xxii. 1). Christ paid Mary for her ointment with a good name, a name in the gospels (Matt. xxvi. 13).

II. If we have lived so as to merit a good name, the day of our death, which will put a period to our cares, and toils, and sorrows, and remove us to rest, and joy, and eternal satisfaction, is better than the day of our birth.

III. That it will do us more good to go to a funeral than to go to a festival (v. 2). We may possibly glorify God, and do good, and get good, in the house of feasting; but, considering how apt we are to be vain and frothy, proud and secure, and indulgent of the flesh, it is better for us to go to the house of mourning, not to see the pomp of the funeral, but to share in the sorrow of it. The uses to be gathered from the house of mourning are by way of information: That is the end of all men. By way of admonition: The living will lay it to his heart. Nothing is more easy and natural than by the death of others to be put in mind of our own. Some perhaps will lay that to heart, and consider their latter end, who would not lay a good sermon to heart. The house of mourning is the wise man's school, where he has learned many a good lesson. It is the character of a fool that his heart is in the house of mirth. If he be at any time in the house of mourning, he is under a restraint; his heart at the same time is in the house of mirth.

IV. The common proverb says, "An ounce of mirth is worth a pound of sorrow"; but the preacher teaches us a contrary lesson: Sorrow is better than laughter. By the sadness that appears in the countenance, the heart is often made better.

V. It is much better for us to have our corruptions mortified by the rebuke of the wise than to have them gratified by the song of fools, v. 5. And what an absurd thing it is for a man to dote so much upon such a transient pleasure as the laughter of a fool, which may fitly be compared to the burning of thorns under a pot, which makes a great noise and a great blaze, for a little while, but presently scatters its ashes, and contributes scarcely anything to the production of a boiling heat, for that requires a constant fire! The laughter of a fool is noisy and flashy, and is not an instance of true joy. This is also vanity.

Verses 7–10

Solomon had often complained before of oppressions which were a great discouragement to virtue and piety.

I. He grants the temptation to be strong (v. 7): Surely it is often too true that oppression makes a wise man mad. If a wise man be much and long oppressed, he is apt to speak and act unlike himself, to break out into indecent complaints against God and man. It destroys the heart of a gift (so the latter clause may be read); even the generous heart is destroyed by being oppressed. We should therefore make great allowances to those that are abused; we know not what we should do if it were our own case.

II. The character of oppressors is very bad, so some understand, v. 7. If he that had the reputation of a wise man becomes an oppressor, he becomes a madman; and the gifts he takes do but destroy his heart and extinguish the poor remains of sense and virtue in him, and he is rather to be pitied than envied; let him alone, and in a little time he will ruin himself. The issue, at length, will be good: Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof. Better was the end of Moses's treaty with Pharaoh, that proud oppressor, when Israel was brought forth with triumph, than the beginning of it, when the tale of bricks was doubled, and everything looked discouraging.

III. If we would not be driven mad by oppression, we must be clothed with humility; for the proud in spirit are those that grow outrageous when they are hardly bestead. We must put on patience, bearing patience, to submit to the will of God in the affliction, and waiting patience to expect the issue in God's due time. We must govern our passion with wisdom and grace (v. 9): Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry; those that cannot brook delays are apt to be angry if they be not immediately gratified. "Be not long angry"; for though anger may come into the bosom of a wise man, and pass through it as a wayfaring man, it rests only in the bosom of fools. We must make the best of that which is (v. 10): "Take it not for granted that the former days were better than these, nor enquire what is the cause that they were so, for therein thou does not enquire wisely; thou art so much a stranger to the times past, and such an incompetent judge even of the present times, that thou canst not expect a satisfactory answer to the enquiry. It is folly to cry up the goodness of former times, so as to derogate from the mercy of God to us in our own times; as if God had been unjust and unkind to us in casting our lot in an iron age, compared with the golden ages that went before us; this arises from nothing but fretfulness and discontent, and an aptness to pick quarrels with God himself. We are not to think there is any universal decay in nature, or degeneracy in morals. God has been always good, and men always bad; and if, in some respects, the times are now worse than they have been, perhaps in other respects they are better.

I. The praises of wisdom. Wisdom is necessary to the managing and improving of our worldly possessions: Wisdom is good with an inheritance, that is, an inheritance is good for little without wisdom. Wisdom is not only good for the poor, but it is good for the rich too, good with riches to keep a man from getting hurt by them, and to enable a man to do good with them. Wisdom is good of itself, and makes a man useful; but, if he have a good estate with it, that will put him into a greater capacity of being useful, and with his wealth he may be more serviceable to his generation than he could have been without it. Wisdom contributes to our safety, and is a shelter to us from the storms of trouble and its scorching heat; it is a shadow (so the word is), as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. Wisdom is a defence, and money (that is, as money) is a defence. As a rich man makes his wealth, so a wise man makes his wisdom, a strong city. It is joy and true happiness to a man. This is the excellency of knowledge, divine knowledge, not only above money, but above wisdom too, human wisdom, the wisdom of this world, that it gives life to those that have it. The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and that is life; it prolongs life. It will put strength into a man, and be his stay and support (v. 19): Wisdom strengthens the wise, strengthens their spirits, and makes them bold and resolute, by keeping them always on sure grounds.

II. Some of the precepts of wisdom.

1. Consider the work of God. To silence our complaints concerning cross events, let us consider the hand of God in them and not open our mouths against that which is his doing. Consider that every work of God is wise, just, and good, and there is an admirable beauty and harmony in his works, and all will appear at last to have been for the best. Who can make that straight which he has made crooked? Who can change the nature of things from what is settled by the God of nature.

2. We must accommodate ourselves to the various dispensations of Providence that respect us, and do the work and duty of the day in its day, v. 14. Day and night, summer and winter, are set the one over-against the other, that in prosperity we may rejoice as though we rejoiced not, and in adversity may weep as though we wept not, and it is to the end that man may find nothing after him, that he may live in a dependence upon Providence and be ready for whatever happens. Our religion, in general, must be the same in all conditions, but the particular instances and exercises of it must vary, as our outward condition does. In a day of prosperity we must be joyful, be doing good, and getting good, maintain a holy cheerfulness, and serve the Lord with gladness of heart. In a day of adversity consider. We cannot answer God's end in afflicting us unless we consider why and wherefore he contends with us.

3. We must not be offended at the greatest prosperity of wicked people, nor at the saddest calamities that may befall the godly in this life, v. 15. Wisdom will teach us how to construe those dark chapters of Providence so as to reconcile them with the wisdom, holiness, goodness, and faithfulness of God. All things have I seen in the days of my vanity. Though Solomon was so wise a man, he calls the days of his life the days of his vanity, for the best days on earth are so, in comparison with the days of eternity. The calamities of the righteous are preparing them for their future blessedness, and the wicked are but ripening for ruin. There is a judgment to come, which will rectify this seeming irregularity, and we must wait with patience till then.

4. Wisdom will be of use both for caution to saints in their way, and for a check to sinners in their way. A just man may perish in his righteousness, but let him not, by his own imprudence and rash zeal, pull trouble upon his own head, and then reflect upon Providence as dealing hardly with him. "Be not righteous overmuch," v. 16. Self-denial and mortification of the flesh are good; but if we prejudice our health by them, and unfit ourselves for the service of God, we are righteous overmuch. Be not opinionative, and conceited of thy own abilities. Set not up for a critic, to find fault with everything that is said and done. As to sinners: It is true there is a wicked man that prolongs his life in his wickedness (v. 15); but let none say that therefore they may safely be as wicked as they will; no, be not overmuch wicked (v. 17); "be not so foolish as to lay thyself open to the law, why shouldst thou die before thy time?"

5. Wisdom will direct us in the mean between two extremes, and keep us always in the way of our duty, which we shall find a plain and safe way (v. 18): "It is good that thou shouldst take hold of this, this wisdom, this care, not to run thyself into snares. Yea, also from this withdraw not thy hand. Take hold of the bridle by which thy headstrong passions must be held in, as the horse and mule that have no understanding; and, having taken hold of it, keep thy hold. Be conscientious, and yet be cautious, and to this exercise thyself.

6. Wisdom will teach us how to conduct ourselves in reference to others. Wisdom teaches us not to expect that those we deal with should be faultless; we ourselves are not so, none are so. This wisdom strengthens the wise and arms them against provocation (v. 19), so that they are not put into any disorder by it. Those they have dealings with are not incarnate angels, but sinful sons and daughters of Adam: even the best are so, insomuch that there is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good and sinneth not, v. 20. Wisdom teaches us not to be quick-sighted in resenting affronts, but to wink at many of the injuries that are done us, and act as if we did not see them (v. 21): "Take no heed to all words that are spoken; set not thy heart to them. Be not solicitous or inquisitive to know what people say of thee. Approve thyself to God and thy own conscience, and then heed not what men say of thee. If thou heed every word that is spoken, perhaps thou wilt hear thy own servant curse thee when he thinks thou dost not hear him. It is easier to pass by twenty such affronts than to avenge one. Wisdom puts us in mind of our own faults (v. 22): "Be not enraged at those that speak ill of thee, for oftentimes, if thou retire into thyself, thy own conscience will tell thee that thou thyself hast cursed others, spoken ill of them, and thou art paid in thy own coin." If we be truly angry with ourselves, as we ought to be, for backbiting and censuring others, we shall be the less angry with others for backbiting and censuring us.

Verses 23–29

Solomon had hitherto been proving the vanity of the world and its utter insufficiency to make men happy; now here he comes to show the vileness of sin, and its certain tendency to make men miserable; and this, as the former, he proves from his own experience, and it was a dear-bought experience. He is here, more than anywhere in all this book, putting on the habit of a penitent.

I. He owns and laments the deficiencies of his wisdom.

1. His searches were industrious. God had given him a capacity for knowledge above any. He resolved, if it were possible, to gain his point: I said, I will be wise. He resolved to spare no pains (v. 25): "I applied my heart. I set myself to know, and to search, and to seek out wisdom, to accomplish myself in all useful learning, philosophy, and divinity."

2. Yet his success was not answerable or satisfying: "I said, I will be wise, but it was far from me; I could not compass it. After all the more I know the more I see there is to be known, and the more sensible I am of my own ignorance. That which is far off, and exceedingly deep, who can find it out?" He means God himself, his counsels and his works; when he searched into these he presently found himself puzzled and run aground. Blessed be God, there is nothing which we have to do which is not plain and easy; the word is nigh us (Prov. viii. 9); but there is a great deal which we would wish to know which is far off.

II. He owns and laments the instances of his folly in which he had exceeded, as, in wisdom, he came short.

1. His enquiry concerning the evil of sin. He applied his heart to know the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness. Sin has many disguises, as being loth to appear sin, and it is very hard to strip it of these and to see it in its true nature and colours. It is necessary to our repentance for sin that we be acquainted with the evil of it, as it is necessary to the cure of a disease to know its nature, causes, and malignity. Solomon, who, in the days of his folly, had set his wits on work to invent pleasures and was ingenious in making provision for the flesh, now that God had opened his eyes is as industrious to find out the aggravations of sin and so to put an edge upon his repentance. Ingenious sinners should be ingenious penitents. Solomon lays the greatest stress upon the wickedness of folly, by which perhaps he means his own iniquity, the sin of uncleanness, for that was commonly called folly in Israel, Gen. xxxiv. 7; Deut. xxii. 21; Judges xx. 6; 2 Sam. xiii. 12. When he indulged himself in it, he made a light matter of it; but now he desires to see the wickedness of it. As there is a wickedness in folly, so there is a folly in wickedness, even foolishness and madness.

2. The result of this enquiry. He now discovered the evil of that great sin which he himself had been guilty of, the loving of many strange women, 1 Kings xi. 1. He found the remembrance of the sin very grievous. I find it more bitter than death. The heart of the adulterous woman is snares and nets. The unwary souls are enticed into them by the bait of pleasure. Her hands are as bands, with which, under colour of fond embraces, she holds those fast that she has seized. He that pleases God shall escape from her. He now endeavoured to find out the number of his actual transgressions (v. 27). He desired to find them out as a penitent, that he might the more particularly acknowledge them. He soon found himself at a loss, and perceived that they were innumerable (v. 28): Which yet my soul seeks; I am still counting, but I cannot count them all. I still make new discoveries of the wickedness that there is in my own heart, Jer. xvii. 9, 10. This he illustrates by comparing the corruption of his own heart and life with the corruption of the world, where he scarcely found one good man among a thousand. He found (v. 20) that he had sinned even in doing good. The source of all the folly and madness that are in the world is in man's apostasy from God and his degeneracy from his primitive rectitude (v. 29). Man, as he came out of God's hands, was (as we may say) a little picture of his Maker, who is good and upright. He was marred, and in effect unmade, by his own folly and badness: They have sought out many inventions—they, our first parents, or the whole race, all in general and every one in particular. Instead of being for God's institutions, he was for his own inventions.

CHAP. VIII

Solomon, in this chapter, comes to recommend wisdom to us as the most powerful antidote. I. The benefit and praise of wisdom, ver. 1. II. Some particular instances of wisdom prescribed to us. 1. We must keep in due subjection to the government God has set over us, ver. 2–5. 2. We must get ready for sudden evils, and especially for sudden death, ver. 6–8. 3. We must arm ourselves against the temptation of an oppressive government, ver. 9, 10. The impunity of oppressors makes them more daring (ver. 11), but in the issue it will be well with the righteous and ill with the wicked (ver. 12, 14). 4. We must cheerfully use the gifts of God's providence, ver. 15. 5. We must with an entire satisfaction acquiesce in the will of God. ver. 16, 17.

Verses 1–5

I. An encomium of wisdom (v. 1), that is, of true piety, guided in all its exercises by prudence and discreation. The wise man is the good man, that knows God and glorifies him. Who is as the wise man? Heavenly wisdom will make a man an incomparable man. No man without grace, though he be learned, or noble, or rich, is to be compared with a man that has true grace and is therefore accepted of God. It makes him useful among his neighbours: Who but the wise man knows the interpretation of a thing, that is, understands the times and events. It makes his face to shine, as Moses's did when he came down from the mount; it puts honour upon a man and a lustre on his whole conversation. The strength of his face, the sourness and severity of his countenance (so some understand the last clause), shall be changed by it into that which is sweet and obliging. Even those whose natural temper is rough and morose, by wisdom are strangely altered. It emboldens a man against his adversaries. The boldness of his face shall be doubled by wisdom; it will add to his courage when he not only has an honest cause to plead, but by his wisdom knows how to manage it.

II. A particular instance of wisdom is subjection to authority. We must be observant of the laws. In all those things wherein the civil power is to interpose, whether legislative or judicial, we ought to submit to its order. I counsel thee; I charge thee, not only as a prince but as a preacher: "I recommend it to thee as a piece of wisdom; I say, whatever those say that are given to change, keep the king's commandment. Observe the mouth of a king" (so the phrase is). Some understand the following clause as a limitation of this obedience: Keep the king's commandment, yet so as to have a regard to the oath of God, that is, so as to keep a good conscience and not to violate thy obligations to God, which are prior and superior to thy obligations to the king. We must not be forward to find fault with the public administration (v. 3): "Be not hasty to go out of his sight, when he is displeased at thee (ch. x. 4), or when thou art displeased at him; fly not off in a passion, nor forsake the kingdom." "Stand not in an evil thing; in any offence thou hast given to thy prince humble thyself, and do not justify thyself, for that will make the offence much more offensive." We must prudently accommodate ourselves to our opportunities, both for our own relief, if we think ourselves wronged, and for the redress of public grievances: A wise man's heart discerns both time and judgment (v. 5). We must needs be subject, for conscience-sake. "Keep the king's commandments, for he has sworn to rule thee in the fear of God, and thou hast sworn, in that fear, to be faithful to him." It is called the oath of God because he is a witness to it and will avenge the violation of it.

Verses 6–8

Solomon here shows that even the wisest may yet be surprised by a calamity which they had not any foresight of, and therefore it is our wisdom to expect and prepare for sudden changes. Man knows not that which shall be himself; and who can tell him when or how it shall be? (v. 7). The stars cannot foretell a man what shall be, or any of the arts of divination. God has, in wisdom, concealed from us the knowledge of future events, that we may be always ready for changes. Because to every purpose there is but one way, one method, one proper opportunity, therefore the misery of man is great upon him. Men are miserable because they are not sufficiently sagacious and attentive. Whatever other evils may be avoided, we are all under a fatal necessity of dying (v. 8). When the soul is required it must be resigned. There is no man that has power over his own spirit, to retain it, when it is summoned to return to God who gave it. Death is an enemy that we must all enter the lists with, sooner or later: There is no discharge in that war. Men's wickedness, by which they often evade or outface the justice of the prince, cannot secure them from the arrest of death, nor can the most obstinate sinner harden his heart against those terrors.

Verses 9–13

Solomon, in these verses, encourages us, in reference to the mischief of tyrannical and oppressive rulers. He had observed that many a time one man rules over another to his hurt. It is sad with a people when those that should protect their religion and rights aim at the destruction of both. To the hurt of the rulers (so we render it), to their own hurt. What hurt men do to others will return, in the end, to their own hurt. He had observed them to prosper and flourish in the abuse of their power (v. 10): I saw those wicked rulers come and go from the place of the holy, go in state to and return in pomp from the place of judicature (which is called the place of the Holy One because the judgment is the Lord's, Deut. i. 17), and they continued all their days in office, were never reckoned with for their maladministration, but died in honour and were buried magnificently. And they were forgotten in the city where they had so done; their wicked practices were not remembered against them when they were gone. He had observed that their prosperity hardened them in their wickedness, v. 11. It is true of all sinners in general, and particularly of wicked rulers, that, because sentence against their evil works is not executed speedily, they think it will never be executed, and therefore they set the law at defiance and their hearts are full in them to do evil; they venture to do more mischief, and commit iniquity with a high hand. Sentence is passed against evil works and evil workers by the righteous Judge of heaven and earth, even against the evil works of princes and great men. The execution of this sentence is often delayed, and the sinner goes on, not only unpunished, but prosperous and successful. Sinners herein deceive themselves, for, though the sentence be not executed speedily, it will be executed the more severely at last. We should not be discouraged. "It shall be well with those that fear God, I say with all those, and those only, who fear before him." When they lie at the mercy of proud oppressors they fear God more than they fear them. And therefore "surely I know, I know it by the promise of God, and the experience of all the saints, that, however it goes with others, it shall go well with them." A good man's days have some substance in them; he lives to a good purpose. A wicked man's days are all as a shadow, empty and worthless. These days shall not be prolonged to what he promised himself. Though they may be prolonged (v. 12) beyond what others expected, yet his day shall come to fall. He shall fall short of everlasting life, and then his long life on earth will be worth little.

Verses 14–17

Wise and good men, have, of old, been perplexed with this difficulty, how the prosperity of the wicked and the troubles of the righteous can be reconciled with the holiness and goodness of the God that governs the world. Concerning this Solomon here gives us his advice.

I. He would not have us to be surprised at it, as though some strange thing happened, for he himself saw it in his days, v. 14. 1. He saw just men to whom it happened according to the work of the wicked, who, notwithstanding their righteousness, suffered very hard things. He saw wicked men to whom it happened according to the work of the righteous, who prospered as remarkably as if they had been rewarded for some good deed. We see the just troubled and perplexed in their own minds, the wicked easy, fearless, and secure.

II. He would have us not to charge God with iniquity, but to charge the world with vanity. No fault is to be found with God; but, as to the world, This is vanity upon the earth, and again, This is also vanity, that is, it is a certain evidence that the things of this world are not the best things nor were ever designed to make happiness for us, for, if they had, God would not have allotted so much of this world's wealth to his worst enemies and so much of its troubles to his best friends; there must therefore be another life after this the joys and griefs of which must be real and substantial.

III. He would have us not to fret ourselves about it, but cheerfully to enjoy what God has given us in the world, and make the best of it, though it be much better with others, and such as we think very unworthy (v. 15): Then I commended joy, a holy security and serenity of mind, arising from a confidence in God, and his power, and promise, because a man has no better thing under the sun than to eat and drink, that is, soberly and thankfully to make use of the things of this life, and to be cheerful, whatever happens, for that shall abide with him of his labour. Our present life is a life under the sun, but we look for the life of the world to come, which will commence and continue when the sun shall be turned into darkness and shine no more.

IV. He would not have us undertake to give a reason for that which God does, for his way is in the sea and his path in the great waters, past finding out, v. 16, 17. Both he himself and many others had very closely studied the point, and searched far into the reasons of the prosperity of the wicked and the afflictions of the righteous. It was all labour in vain, v. 17. When we look upon all the works of God and his providence, and compare one part with another, we cannot find that there is any certain method by which the work that is done under the sun is directed. God's ways are above ours, nor is he tied to his own former ways, but his judgments are a great deep.

CHAP. IX

Solomon, for a further proof of the vanity of this world, gives us four observations. I. He observed that commonly, as to outward things, good and bad men fare much alike, ver. 1–3. II. That death puts a final period to all our employments and enjoyments in this world (ver. 4–6), whence he infers that it is our wisdom to enjoy the comforts of life and mind the business of life, while it lasts, ver. 7–10. III. That great calamities often surprise men ere they are aware, ver. 11, 12. IV. That wisdom often makes men very useful, and yet persons of great merit are slighted, ver. 13–18. And what is there then in this world that should make us fond of it?

Verses 1–3

It has been observed concerning those who have pretended to search for the philosophers' stone that, though they could never find what they sought for, yet in the search they have hit upon many other useful discoveries and experiments. Thus Solomon, when, in the close of the foregoing chapter, he applied his heart to know the work of God, he found out that which abundantly recompensed him for the search, and therefore he considered all this in his heart, and weighed it deliberately, that he might declare it for the good of others.

The great difficulty which Solomon met with in studying providence was the little difference that is made between good men and bad in the distribution of comforts and crosses. This has perplexed the minds of many wise men. Solomon says that which may prevent its being a stumbling-block to us.

I. Before he describes the temptation in its strength he lays down a great and unquestionable truth. Job lays down the doctrine of God's omniscience (Job xxiv. 1), Jeremiah the doctrine of his righteousness (Jer. xii. 1), another prophet that of his holiness (Hab. i. 13), the psalmist that of his goodness and peculiar favour to his own people (Ps. lxxiii. 1), and that is it which Solomon here resolves to abide by, that, though good and evil seem to be dispensed promiscuously, yet God has a particular care of and concern for his own people: The righteous and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of God, under his special protection and guidance; all their affairs are managed by him for their good; to be recompensed in the other world, though not in this. Whatever happens all God's saints are in his hand, Deut. xxxiii. 3; John x. 29; Ps. xxxi. 15.

II. He lays this down for a rule, that the love and hatred of God are not to be measured and judged of by men's outward condition. No man knows either love or hatred by those things that are the objects of sense. These we may know by that which is within us if we love God with all our heart. These will be known by that which shall be hereafter, by men's everlasting state.

III. Having laid down these principles, he acknowledges that all things come alike to all. Some make this, and all that follows to v. 13, to be the perverse reasoning of the atheists against the doctrine of God's providence; but I rather take it to be Solomon's concession, when he had fixed those truths which are sufficient to guard against any ill use that may be made of what he grants.

1. The great difference that there is between the characters of the righteous and the wicked. (1) The righteous are clean, have clean hands and pure hearts; the wicked are unclean, under the dominion of unclean lusts. God will certainly put a difference between the clean and the unclean in the other world, though he does not seem to do so in this. (2) The righteous sacrifice both with inward and outward worship: the wicked sacrifice not, that is, they neglect God's worship and grudge to part with any thing for his honour. (3) The righteous do good in the world. (4) The wicked man swears, has no veneration for the name of God; but the righteous man fears an oath with great reverence.

2. The little difference there is between the conditions of the righteous and the wicked in this world: There is one event to both. Is David rich? So is Nabal. Is Ahab killed in a battle? So is Josiah. There is a vast difference between the nature of the same event to the one and to the other; the effects of it are likewise vastly different; the same providence to the one is a savour of life unto life, to the other of death unto death, though, to outward appearance, it is the same.

IV. He owns this to be a grievance to those that are wise and good: "This is an evil, the greatest perplexity, among all things that are done under the sun" (v. 3). It hardens atheists, and strengthens the hands of evildoers. When they see that there is one event to the righteous and the wicked they wickedly infer thence that it is all one to God whether they are righteous or wicked.

V. For the further clearing of this great difficulty he concludes with the doctrine of the misery of the wicked; however they may prosper, madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead.

Verses 4–10

Solomon, in a fret, had praised the dead more than the living (ch. iv. 2); but here, considering the advantages of life to prepare for a better life, he seems to be of another mind.

I. He shows the advantages which the living have above those that are dead, v. 4–6. If a man's condition be, upon any account, bad, there is hope it will be amended. If the heart be full of evil, and madness be in it, yet while there is life there is hope that by the grace of God there may be a blessed change wrought. The living know they shall die; it is a thing yet to come, and therefore provision may be made for it. The dead know not anything. They have no more a reward for their toils about the world, but all they got must be left to others; they have a reward for their holy actions, but not for their worldly ones. The things of this world will not be a portion for the soul. The world can only be an annuity for life, not a portion for ever. There is an end of their affections, their friendships and enmities: Their love, and their hatred, and their envy have now perished.

II. Hence he infers that it is our wisdom to make the best use of life while it does last. Solomon, having been ensnared by the abuse of delights, warns others of the danger, not by a total prohibition of them, but by directing to the moderate use of them. "Let thy spirit be easy and pleasant; then let there be joy and a merry heart within." We must enjoy ourselves, enjoy our friends, enjoy our God, and be careful to keep a good conscience. We must serve God with gladness, in the use of what he gives us, and be liberal in communicating it to others, and not suffer ourselves to be oppressed with inordinate care about the world. "Make use of the comforts and enjoyments which God has given thee. Evidence thy cheerfulness (v. 8): Let thy garments be always white. Be neat, wear clean linen, and be not slovenly." "Make thyself agreeable to thy relations: Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest. Do not engross thy delights, not caring what becomes of those about thee, but let them share with thee and make them easy too. Keep to thy wife, to one, and do not multiply wives. Live joyfully with her, and be most cheerful when thou art with her. Take pleasure in thy family, thy vine and thy olive plants." Those whose works God has accepted have reason to be cheerful and ought to be so. God loves to have his servants sing at their work. "Live joyfully. Let a gracious serenity of mind be a powerful antidote against the vanity of the world." That is thy portion in the things of this life. In God, and another life, thou shalt have a better portion. "Therefore eat with joy and a merry heart that thy soul may take the more pains and the joy of the Lord may be its strength and oil to its wheels," v. 10. This is the world of service; that to come is the world of recompence. This is the world of probation and preparation for eternity. Harvest-days are busy days; and we must make hay while the sun shines. Serving God and working out our salvation must be done with all that is within us, and all little enough.

Verses 11–12

The preacher had exhorted us (v. 10) to do what we have to do with all our might; but here he reminds us that, when we have done all, we must leave the issue with God.

I. We are often disappointed of the good we had great hopes of, v. 11. Events, both in public and private affairs, do not always agree even with the most rational prospects and probabilities. One would think that the lightest of foot should, in running, win the prize; and yet the race is not always to the swift; some accident happens to retard them, or they are too secure, and let those that are slower get the start of them. One would think that, in fighting, the most numerous and powerful army should be always victorious, and, in single combat, that the mighty champion should win; but the battle is not always to the strong; a host of Philistines was once put to flight by Jonathan and his man; the goodness of the cause has often carried the day against the most formidable power. One would think that men of sense should always be men of substance, and get great estates; and yet it does not always prove so; even bread is not always to the wise, much less riches always to men of understanding. One would think that those who understand men, and have the art of management, should always get preferment; but many ingenious men have spent their days in obscurity. All these disappointments to us seem casual, and we call them chance, but really they are according to the counsel of God, here called time, in the language of this book, ch. iii. 1; Ps. xxxi. 15. Time and chance happen to them all.

II. We are often surprised with evils (v. 12): Man knows not his time, the time of his calamity. It is not for us to know the times, no, not our own time, when or how we shall die. God has, in wisdom, kept us in the dark, that we may be always ready. We may meet with trouble in that very thing wherein we promise ourselves satisfaction, as the fishes and the birds are drawn into the snare and net by the bait. Men often find their bane where they sought their bliss. Let us be always ready for changes, that, though they may be sudden, they may be no terror to us.

Verses 13–18

Solomon still recommends wisdom to us as necessary to the preserving of our peace. This wisdom which enables a man to serve his country out of pure affection, when he himself gains no advantage by it, is the wisdom which, Solomon says, seemed great unto him, v. 13.

I. Solomon here gives an instance, probably a case in fact, of a poor man who with his wisdom did great service in a time of public distress and danger (v. 14): There was a little city; there were but few men within it, and ready to give up their city as not tenable. Against this little city a great king came with a numerous army, and besieged it. Did victory and success attend the strong? No; there was found in this little city, among the few men that were in it, one poor wise man—not preferred to any place of profit or power in the city. Being wise, he served the city, though he was poor. In their distress they found him out (Judges xi. 7) and begged his advice and assistance; and he by his wisdom delivered the city, either by prudent instructions given to the besieged, directing them to some unthought-of stratagem for their own security, or by a prudent treaty with the besiegers, as the woman at Abel, 2 Sam. xx. 16. No man remembered that same poor man; no recompence was made him, no marks of honour put upon him, but he lived in as much poverty and obscurity as he had done before.

II. From this instance he draws some useful inferences. He observes: Wisdom is better than strength, v. 16, better than weapons of war, offensive or defensive, v. 18. The words of wise men are heard in quiet; what they speak, being rational and to the purpose, spoken calmly and with deliberation, will gain respect, and sway with men more than the imperious clamour of him that rules among fools, who chose him to be their ruler, for his noise and blustering. A few close arguments are worth a great many big words. Wise and good men, notwithstanding this, must often content themselves with the satisfaction of having done good when they cannot have the praise they should have. Wisdom capacitates a man to serve his neighbours. Many a man is buried alive in poverty and obscurity who, if he had but fit encouragement given him, might be a great blessing to the world; many a pearl is lost in its shell. But there is a day coming when wisdom and goodness shall be in honour, and the righteous shall shine forth. From what he had observed of the great good which one wise and virtuous man may do he infers what a great deal of mischief one wicked man may do. A sinful condition is a wasteful condition. How many of the good gifts both of nature and Providence does one sinner destroy. One sinner, who makes its his business to debauch others, may defeat and frustrate the intentions of a great many good laws.

CHAP. X

This chapter seems to be like Solomon's proverbs, a collection of wise sayings, but the preacher "set in order many proverbs", to be brought in in his preaching. The general scope is to recommend wisdom to us. I. He recommends wisdom to private persons in an inferior station. 1. It is our wisdom to preserve our reputation, in managing our affairs dexterously, ver. 1–3. 2. To be submissive to our superiors if at any time we have offended them, ver. 4. 3. To live quiet and peaceable lives, and not to meddle with those that are factious and seditious, ver. 8–11. 4. To govern our tongues, ver. 12–15. 5. To be diligent in our business and provide for our families, ver. 18, 19. 6. Not to speak ill of our rulers, ver. 20. II. He recommends wisdom to rulers; let them not think that, because their subjects must be quiet under them, therefore they may do what they please. 1. Let them be careful whom they prefer to places of trust and power, ver. 5–7. 2. Let them be generous and not childish, temperate and not luxurious, ver. 16, 17.

Verses 1–3

I. A little folly is a great blemish to him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour, and is as hurtful to his good name as dead flies are to a sweet perfume. True wisdom will gain a man a reputation, which is like a box of precious ointment. The reputation that is got by a great deal of wisdom, may be easily lost, by a little folly, because envy fastens upon eminency, and makes the worst of the mistakes of those who are cried up for wisdom.

II. A wise man's heart is at his right hand, so that he goes about his business with dexterity. But a fool's heart is at his left hand; it is always to seek when he has anything to do that is of importance, and therefore he goes awkwardly about it.

III. How apt fools are at every turn to proclaim their own folly, and expose themselves; he that is either silly or wicked says to everyone he meets that he is a fool (v. 3), that is, he discovers his folly as plainly as if he had told them so.

Verses 4–11

The scope of these verses is to keep subjects loyal and dutiful to the government.

I. Let not subjects carry on a quarrel with their prince upon any private personal disgust (v. 4): "If the spirit of the ruler rise up against thee, if he is displeased at thee, yet leave not thy place, forget not the duty of a subject, revolt not from thy allegiance, do not, in a passion, quit thy post in his service."

II. Let not subjects commence a quarrel with their prince. He grants there is an evil often seen under the sun, an evil which the king only can cure, for it is an error which proceeds from the ruler (v. 5); it is a mistake which rulers, consulting their personal affections, are too often guilty of, that men are not preferred according to their merit, but folly is set in great dignity. It is ill with a people when vicious men are advanced and men of worth are kept under hatches. This is illustrated v. 7. "I have seen servants upon horses, men not so much of mean extraction, but of sordid, servile, mercenary dispositions."

1. Let neither prince nor people violently attempt changes. Let not princes invade the rights and liberties of their subjects; let not subjects mutiny and rebel against their princes; for, (1) He that digs a pit for another, it is ten to one but he falls into it himself. If princes become tyrants, or subjects become rebels, all histories will tell both what is likely to be their fate. (2) Whoso breaks a hedge, an old hedge, that has long been a land-mark, let him expect that a serpent, or adder, such as harbour in rotten hedges, will bite him. (3) Whoso removes stones, to pull down a wall, or building, does but pluck them upon himself; he shall be hurt therewith. Those that go about to alter a well-modelled well-settled government, will quickly perceive that it is easier to find fault than to mend. (4) He that cleaves the wood, especially if, as it follows, he has sorry tools (v. 10), shall be endangered thereby; the chips, or his own axe-head, will fly in his face. If we meet with knotty pieces of timber, men of perverse and ungovernable spirits, and we think to master them by force and violence, the attempt may turn to our own damage.

2. Rather let both prince and people act towards each other with prudence, mildness, and good temper: Wisdom is profitable to direct the ruler how to manage a people that are inclined to be turbulent, so as neither, by a supine negligence to embolden them, nor by rigour and severity to provoke them to seditious practices. It is likewise profitable to direct the subjects how to act towards a prince that is inclined to bear hard upon them, so as not to alienate his affections, but to win upon him by humble remonstrances and peaceable expedients. Let wisdom direct to gentle methods and forbear violent ones. Wisdom will teach us to whet the tool we are to make use of, rather than, by leaving it blunt, oblige ourselves to exert so much the more strength, v. 10. Whet before we cut, that is, consider and premeditate what is fit to be said and done in every difficult case. The mower loses no time when he is whetting his scythe. Wisdom will teach us to enchant the serpent we are to contend with, rather than think to out-hiss it (v. 11): The serpent will bite if he be not by singing and music charmed. A babbler is no better. He that is lord of the tongue may say what he will, it is as dangerous dealing with him as with a serpent uncharmed. To those that may say anything it is wisdom to say nothing that is provoking.

I. Fools talk a great deal to no purpose, and they show their folly by the impertinence of their words: whereas the words of a wise man's mouth are gracious, and do good to all about him, the lips of a fool not only expose him to reproach, but will swallow up himself and bring him to ruin. A fool's talk takes rise from his own weakness and wickedness: The beginning of the words of his mouth is foolishness, the foolishness in his heart is the corrupt spring out of which all these polluted streams flow. The end of his talk is madness. A fool also is full of words, a passionate fool especially, that never knows when to leave off. He will have the last word, though it be but the same with that which was the first. Many who are empty of sense are full of words; and the least solid are the most noisy. He is full of words, for if he do but speak the most trite and common thing, a man cannot tell what shall be, because he loves to hear himself talk, he will say it again, what shall be after him who can tell him?

II. Fools toil a great deal to no purpose (v. 15); The labour of the foolish, to accomplish their designs, wearies everyone of them. All their labour is for the world and the body, and the meat that perishes. The foolish never bring anything to pass, because they know not how to go to the city, that is, because they have not capacity to apprehend the plainest thing, such as the entrance into a great city, where one would think it were impossible for a man to miss his road.

I. The happiness of a land depends upon the character of its rulers. 1. The people cannot be happy when their princes are childish and voluptuous (v. 16): Woe unto thee, O land! when thy king is a child, not so much in age as in understanding; when the prince is weak and foolish as a child, fickle, fretful and humoursome, it is ill with the people. Nor is it much better with a people when their princes eat in the morning, that is, make a god of their belly and make themselves slaves to their appetites. If the princes and privy-counsellors are wise the land may do the better; but if they addict themselves to their pleasures, before the despatch of the public business, by eating and drinking in a morning, when judges are epicures, and do not eat to live, but live to eat, what good can a nation expect! The people cannot but be happy when their rulers are generous and active, sober and temperate, and men of business, v. 17. Wisdom, virtue, and the fear of God, beneficence, and a readiness to do good to all mankind, these ennoble the royal blood. When the subordinate magistrates are more in care to discharge their trusts than to gratify their appetites; when they eat in due season, that is, when they have despatched their business, the land is blessed. Magistrates should eat for strength, that their bodies may be fitted to serve their souls in the service of God and their country. It is well with a people when their princes are examples of temperance, when those that have most to spend upon themselves know how to deny themselves.

II. Of what ill consequence slothfulness is both to private and public affairs (v. 18): By much slothfulness and idleness of the hands, the neglect of business, and the love of ease and pleasure, the building decays, drops through first, and by degrees drops down. If the king be a child and will take no care, if the princes eat in the morning and will take no pains, the affairs of the nation suffer loss, and all its foundations are out of course through the slothfulness and self-seeking of those that should be the repairers of its breaches.

III. How industrious generally all are, both princes and people, to get money, because that serves for all purposes, v. 19. He seems to prefer money before mirth: A feast is made for laughter, not the laughter of the fool, which is madness, but that of wise men, by which they fit themselves for business and severe studies. Money of itself answers nothing; it will neither feed nor clothe; but, as it is the instrument of commerce, it answers all the occasions of this present life. But it answers nothing to the soul; it will not procure the pardon of sin, the favour of God, the peace of conscience.

IV. How cautious subjects have need to be that they harbour not any disloyal purposes in their minds, nor keep up any factious cabals or consultations against the government. "Curse not the king, no, not in thy thought, do not wish ill to the government in thy mind." "Curse not the rich, the princes and governors, in thy bedchamber, in a conclave or club of persons disaffected to the government; associate not with such; come not into their secret; join not with them in plotting against it. Though the design be carried on ever so closely, a bird of the air shall carry the voice to the king, who has more spies about than thou art aware of, and that which has wings shall tell the matter, to thy confusion and ruin."

CHAP. XI

I. A pressing exhortation to works of charity and bounty to the poor, ver. 1–6. II. A serious admonition to prepare for death and judgment, ver. 7–10.

Verses 1–6

Solomon presses rich people to abound in liberality to the poor.

I. The duty itself is recommended to us, v. 1. Cast thy bread upon the waters, thy bread-corn upon the low places (so some understand it), alluding to the husbandman, who goes forth, bearing precious seed, sparing bread-corn from his family for the seed, knowing that without that he can have no harvest another year; thus the charitable man takes from his bread-corn for seed-corn, to supply the poor, that he may sow beside all waters (Isa. xxxii. 20), because as he sows so he must reap, Gal. vi. 7. Give freely to the poor, though it may seem thrown away and lost, as that which is cast upon the waters. Send it a voyage, send it as a venture, as merchants that trade by sea. Trust it upon the waters; it shall not sink. "Give a portion to seven and also to eight, that is, be free and liberal in works of charity." Give not a pittance, but a portion, a meal. Give to many, to seven, and also to eight; if thou meet with seven objects of charity, give to them all, and then, if thou meet with an eighth, give to that, and, if with eight more, give to them all too. God is rich in mercy to all, to us, though unworthy; he gives liberally, and upbraids not with former gifts.

II. The reasons with which it is pressed upon us. "Though thou cast it upon the waters, and it seem lost, yet thou shalt find it after many days, as the husbandman finds his seed again in a plentiful harvest. The return may be slow, but it is sure and will be so much the more plentiful." Wheat, the most valuable grain, lies longest in the ground. Our opportunity for well-doing is very uncertain: "Thou knowest not what evil may be upon the earth, which may deprive thee of thy estate, and put thee out of a capacity to do good. Many make use of this as an argument against giving to the poor, because they know not what hard times may come when they may want themselves; whereas we should therefore the rather be charitable, that, when evil days come, we may have the comfort of having done good while we were able.

III. The excuses of the uncharitable.

1. Some will say that what they have is their own, and will ask, Why should we cast it thus upon the waters? Look up, man, and consider how soon thou wouldest be starved in a barren ground, if the clouds over thy head should plead thus, that they have their waters for themselves. Are the heavens thus bountiful to the poor earth, that is so far below them, and wilt thou grudge thy bounty to thy poor brother, who is bone of thy bone?

2. Some will say that their sphere of usefulness is low and narrow; they cannot do the good that they see others can, who are in more public stations, and therefore they will sit still and do nothing. Nay, says he, in the place where the tree falls, or happens to be, there it shall be, for the benefit of those to whom it belongs; every man must labour to be a blessing to that place, whatever it is, where the providence of God casts him; wherever we are we may find good work to do if we have but hearts to do it.

3. Some will object to the many discouragements they have met with in their charity. They have been reproached for it as proud and pharisaical; they shall be despised if they do not give as others do; they have taxes to pay and they know not what use will be made of their charity; these, and a hundred such objections, he answers, in one word (v. 4): He that observes the wind shall not sow, which signifies doing good; and he that regards the clouds shall not reap, which signifies getting good. If we stand thus magnifying every little difficulty, starting objections and fancying hardship where there is none, we shall never go on with our work. If the husbandman should decline, or leave off, sowing for the sake of every flying cloud, and reaping for the sake of every blast of wind, he would make but an ill account of his husbandry at the year's end.

4. Some will say, "We do not see in which way what we expend in charity should ever be made up to us. To this he answers, "Thou knowest not the work of God, nor is it fit thou shouldst. Thou mayest be sure he will make good his word of promise, though he does not tell thee how." Our ignorance of the work of God he shows, in two instances:—(1) We know not what is the way of the Spirit, of the wind (so some), we know not whence it comes, or whither it goes, or when it will turn; yet the seamen lie ready waiting for it, till it turns about in favour of them; so we must do our duty, in expectation of the time appointed for the blessing. Or it may be understood of the human soul; we know that God made us, and gave us these souls, but how they entered into these bodies, animate them, and operate upon them, we know not; the soul is a mystery to itself, no marvel then that the work of God is so to us. (2) We know not how the bones are fashioned in the womb of her that is with child. We cannot describe the manner either of the formation of the body or of its information with a soul; both, we know, are the work of God, and we acquiesce in his work. Let him therefore that has done the greater for us be cheerfully depended upon to do the less.

5. Some say, "We have been charitable, and never yet saw any return for it; many days are past, and we have not found it again," to which he answers (v. 6), Yet go on, proceed and persevere in well-doing. In the morning sow thy seed and in the evening do not withhold thy hand. In the morning of youth lay out thyself to do good; give out of the little thou hast; and in the evening of old age yield not to the common temptation of old people to be penurious; even then withhold not thy hand, but do good to the last, for thou knowest not which work of charity shall prosper, both as to others and as to thyself, this or that, but hast reason to hope that both shall be alike good.

Having by many excellent precepts taught us how to live well, the preacher comes now to teach us how to die well.

I. He applies himself to the aged: Truly the light is sweet; the light of the sun is so; it is a pleasant thing for the eyes to behold it. It is pleasant to see the light; the heathen were so charmed with the pleasure of it that they worshipped the sun. It is pleasant by it to see other things. It cannot be denied that life is sweet. It is sweet to all men; nature says it is so; nor can death be desired for its own sake unless as a period to present evils or a passage to future good. If a man live many years, yet let him remember the days of darkness are coming. Here is, (1) A summer's day supposed to be enjoyed—that life may continue long, even many years, and that, by the goodness of God, it may be made comfortable and a man may rejoice in them all. However, some rejoice in their many years more than others; if these two things meet, a prosperous state and a cheerful spirit, these two indeed may do much towards enabling a man to rejoice in them all, and yet the most cheerful spirit has its damps; jovial sinners have their melancholy qualms, and cheerful saints have their gracious sorrows; so that it is but a supposition, not a case in fact, that a man should live many years and rejoice in them all. But, (2) Here is a winter's night to be expected after this summer's day: Yet let this hearty old man remember the days of darkness, for they shall be many. They are many, but they are not infinite. As the longest day will have its night, so the longest night will have its morning. The days of darkness will come with much the less terror if we have thought of them before.

II. He applies himself to the young to awaken them to think of death (v. 9, 10).

1. An ironical concession to the vanities and pleasures of youth: Rejoice, O young man! in thy youth. Solomon speaks thus ironically to the young man to expose his folly, and the absurdity of a voluptuous vicious course of life.

2. A powerful check given to these vanities and pleasures: Know thou that for all these things God shall bring thee into judgment.

3. A word of caution and exhortation inferred from all this, v. 10. Let young people look to themselves and manage well both their souls and their bodies. Let them take care that their minds be not lifted up with pride, nor disturbed with anger, or any sinful passion: Remove sorrow, or anger, from thy heart; the word signifies any disorder or perturbation of the mind. Young people are apt to be impatient of check and control, to fret at anything that is humbling, and their proud hearts rise against everything that crosses and contradicts them. Let them keep at a distance from everything which will be sorrow in the reflection. Let them take care that their bodies be not defiled by intemperance, uncleanness, or any fleshly lusts: Put away evil from the flesh, and let not the members of thy body be instruments of unrighteousness.

III. The preacher urges that which is the great argument of his discourse, the vanity of all present things, their uncertainty and insufficiency. 1. He reminds old people of this (v. 8): All that comes is vanity; yea, though a man live many years and rejoice in them all. 2. He reminds young people of this: Childhood and youth are vanity. The pleasures and advantages of childhood and youth are passing away; these flowers will wither, and these blossoms fall; let them therefore be knit into good fruit, which will continue and abound to a good account.

CHAP. XII

The wise and penitent preacher is here closing his sermon; and he closes it with that which was likely to make the best impressions, powerful and lasting upon his hearers. Here is, I An exhortation to young people to begin betimes to be religious and not to put it off to old age (ver. 1–7). II. A repetition of the great truth he had undertaken to prove in this discourse, the vanity of the world, ver. 8. III. A confirmation and recommendation of what he had written in this and his other books, as worthy to be duly weighed and considered, ver. 9–12. IV. The whole matter summed up and concluded, with a charge to all to be truly religious, ver. 13, 14.

Verses 1–7

I. A call to young people to think of God, and mind their duty to him, when they are young: Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth. "You that are young flatter yourselves with expectations of great things from the world, but it yields no solid satisfaction to a soul; therefore remember your Creator, and so guard yourselves against the mischiefs that arise from the vanity of the creature." It is the royal physician's antidote against the particular diseases of youth, the indulgence of sensual pleasures, the vanity which childhood and youth are subject to; to prevent and cure this, remember thy Creator. God is our Creator, he made us and not we ourselves, and is therefore our rightful Lord. We must pay him the honour and duty which we owe him as our Creator. Remember thy Creators; the word is plural, as it is Job xxxv. 10. For God said, Let us make man, us, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. "Begin in the beginning of thy days to remember him from whom thou hadst thy being. Call him to mind through all the days of thy youth, and never forget him. Guard thus against the temptations of youth, and thus improve the advantages of it."

II. A reason to enforce this command: While the evil days come not, and the years of which thou shalt say I have no pleasure in them.

1. Do it quickly, "Before sickness and death come." Before old age comes, years of which we shall say, We have no pleasure in them,—when our strength shall be labour and sorrow,—when there will be no pleasure but in the reflection of a good life on earth and the expectation of a better life in heaven.

2. These two arguments he enlarges upon in the following verses, only inverting the order. It is the greatest absurdity and ingratitude imaginable to give the cream and flower of our days to the devil, and reserve the bran, and refuse, and dregs of them for God. If the calamities of age will be such as are here represented, we shall have need of something to support and comfort us then, and nothing will be more effectual than the testimony of our consciences that we began betimes to remember our Creator. How can we expect God should help us when we are old, if we will not serve him when we are young? The infirmities of old age are here elegantly described in figurative expressions. Then the sun and the light of it, the moon and the stars, and the light which they borrow from it, will be darkened. They look dim to old people, in consequence of the decay of their sight; their intellectual powers and faculties, which are as lights in the soul, are weakened; their understanding and memory fail them. Then the clouds return after the rain; no sooner has one cloud blown over than another succeeds it, so it is with old people, when they have got free from one pain or ailment, they are seized with another. Then the keepers of the house tremble. The head, which is as the watch-tower, shakes, and the arms and hands, which are ready for the preservation of the body, shake too, and grow feeble. Then the strong men shall bow themselves; the legs cannot serve for travelling as they have done, but are soon tired. Then the grinders cease because they are few; the teeth cease to do their part, because they are few. Those that look out of the windows are darkened. Moses was a rare instance of one who, when 120 years old, had good eyesight. The doors are shut in the streets. Old people keep within doors, and care not for going abroad to entertainments. Old people rise up at the voice of the bird. They have no sound sleep as young people have, but a little thing disturbs them, even the chirping of a bird. With them all the daughters of music are brought low. Old people grow hard of hearing, and unapt to distinguish sounds and voices. They are afraid of that which is high, afraid to go to the top of any high place, either because, for want of breath, they cannot reach it, or, their heads being giddy, they dare not venture to it. The almond-tree flourishes. The old man's hair has grown white, so that his head looks like an almond-tree in the blossom. The grasshopper is a burden and desire fails. Old men can bear nothing; the lightest thing sits heavily upon them, both on their bodies and on their minds, a little thing sinks and breaks them. It is probable that Solomon wrote this when he was himself old, and could speak feelingly of the infirmities of age, which perhaps grew the faster upon him for the indulgence he had given himself in sensual pleasures. All this makes a good reason why we should remember our Creator in the days of our youth, that he may remember us when evil days come, and his comforts may delight our souls when the delights of sense are in a manner worn off. Death will fix us in an unchangeable state: Man shall then go to his long home. He has gone to his rest, to the place where he is to fix. He has gone to his house of eternity. This should make us willing to die, that, at death, we must go home; and why should we not long to go to our Father's house? Death will be an occasion of sorrow to our friends that love us. When man goes to his long home the mourners go about the streets—the real mourners, and the mourners for ceremony, that were hired to weep for the dead, both to express and to excite the real mourning. Death will dissolve the frame of nature and take down the earthly house of this tabernacle, which is elegantly described, v. 6. Then shall the silver cord, by which soul and body were wonderfully fastened together, be loosed, that sacred knot untied; the golden bowl, which held the waters of life for us, be broken; then shall the pitcher with which we used to fetch up water, for the constant support of life and the repair of its decays, be broken, even at the fountain, so that it can fetch up no more; and the wheel (all those organs that serve for the collecting and distributing of nourishment) shall be broken, and disabled to do their office any more. The body shall become like a watch when the spring is broken, the motion of all the wheels is stopped and they all stand still. Death will resolve us into our first principles, v. 7. Man is a strange sort of creature, a ray of heaven united to a clod of earth; at death these are separated, and each goes to the place whence it came. The body, that clod of clay, returns to its own earth. The soul, that beam of light, returns to that God who, when he made man of the dust of the ground, breathed into him the breath of life, to make him a living soul (Gen. ii. 7). The soul does not die with the body; it is redeemed from the power of the grave (Ps. xlix. 15); it can subsist without it and will in a state of separation from it, as the candle burns, and burns brighter, when it is taken out of the dark lantern.

Verses 8–12

Solomon is here drawing towards a close. He repeats his text (v. 8). He recommends what he had written upon this subject by divine direction and inspiration to our serious consideration.

1. They are the words of one that was a convert, a penitent, that could speak by dear-bought experience of the vanity of the world and the folly of expecting great things from it. He was Coheleth, one gathered in from his wanderings. Vanity of vanities, saith the penitent.

2. They are the words of one that was wise, endued with extraordinary measures of wisdom, famous for it among his neighbours, who all sought unto him to hear his wisdom, and therefore a competent judge of this matter.

3. He was one that made it his business to do good, and to use wisdom aright.

4. He took a great deal of pains and care to do good, designing to teach the people knowledge. He chose the most profitable way of preaching, by proverbs or short sentences.

5. He put what he had to say in such a dress as he thought would be most pleasing: He sought to find out acceptable words, words of delight (v. 10); that good matter might not be spoiled by a bad style.

6. That which was written was upright and sincere, even words of truth. Most are for smooth things, that flatter them, rather than right things, that direct them (Isa. xxx. 10), but to those that understand themselves, and their own interest, words of truth will always be acceptable words.

7. That which he and other holy men wrote will be of great advantage to us, especially by the exposition of it, v. 11. The words are as nails to those that are wavering and inconstant, to fix them to that which is good. They are as goads to such as are dull and draw back, and nails to such as are desultory and draw aside, that what good there is in us may be as a nail fastened in a sure place, Ezra ix. 8. Solemn assemblies for religious worship are an ancient divine institution, intended for the honour of God and the edification of his church. There must be masters of these assemblies, who are Christ's ministers. Their business is to fasten the words of the wise, and drive them as nails to the head, in order to which the word of God is likewise as a hammer, Jer. xxiii. 29.

8. That which is written, and thus recommended to us, is of divine origin. Though it comes to us through various hands (many wise men, and many masters of assemblies), yet it is given by one and the same shepherd, the shepherd of Israel, that leads Joseph like a flock, Ps. lxxx. 1.

9. The sacred inspired writings, if we will but make use of them, are sufficient to guide us in the way to true happiness. "And further, nothing now remains but to tell thee that of making many books there is no end." Let men write ever so many books for the conduct of human life, write till they have tired themselves with much study, they cannot give better instructions than those we have from the word of God.

Verses 13–14

The great enquiry which Solomon prosecutes in this book is, What is that good which the sons of men should do? ch. ii. 3. What is the true way to true happiness, the certain means to attain our great end? He had found it, by the help of that discovery which God anciently made to man (Job. xxviii. 28), that serious godliness is the only way to true happiness: Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter.

I. The summary of religion. Setting aside all matters of doubtful disputation, to be religious is to fear God and keep his commandments. 1. The root of religion is the fear of God reigning in the heart, a reverence of his majesty, a deference to his authority, and a dread of his wrath. 2. The rule of religion is the law of God revealed in the scriptures. Our fear towards God must be taught by his commandments (Isa. xxix. 13), and those we must keep and carefully observe.

II. The vast importance of it: This is the whole of man; it is all his business and all his blessedness; our whole duty is summed up in this and our whole comfort is bound up in this.

III. A powerful inducement to this, v. 14. We shall see of what vast consequence it is to us that we be religious if we consider the account we must every one of us shortly give of himself to God. God shall bring every work into judgment. The great thing to be then judged concerning every work is whether it be good or evil. It highly concerns us now to be very strict in our walking with God, that we may give up our account with joy.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE SONG OF SOLOMON

In our belief both of the divine extraction and of the spiritual exposition of this book we are confirmed by the concurring testimony both of the church of the Jews, and of the Christian church. This Song of Solomon's is very unlike the songs of his father David; there is not the name of God in it; it is never quoted in the New Testament; we find no expressions of natural religion or pious devotion, nor any of the marks of immediate revelation. It seems as hard as any part of scripture to be made a savour of life unto life, and to those who come to the reading of it with carnal minds and corrupt affections, it is in danger of being made a savour of death unto death; and therefore the Jewish doctors advised their young people not to read it till they were thirty years old, lest by the abuse of that which is most pure and sacred, the flames of lust should be kindled. But, on the other hand, with the help of the many faithful guides we have for the understanding of this book it appears to be a bright and powerful ray of heavenly light, admirably fitted to excite pious and devout affections in holy souls, and improve their acquaintance and communion with God. It is an allegory, the letter of which kills those who look no further, but the spirit of which gives life. It is a parable, which makes divine things more difficult to those who do not love them, but more plain and pleasant to those who do. Experienced Christians here find a counterpart of their experiences, and to them it is intelligible. It is an Epithalamium, or nuptial song, wherein, by the expressions of love between a bridegroom and his bride, are set forth and illustrated the mutual affections that pass between God and a remnant of mankind. It is a pastoral; the bride and bridegroom are brought in as a shepherd and his shepherdess. 1. This song might easily be taken in a spiritual sense by the Jewish church, for whose use it was first composed. God betrothed the people of Israel to himself; he entered into covenant with them, and it was a marriage-covenant. He had given abundant proofs of his love to them, and required of them that they should love him with all their heart and soul. Idolatry was often spoken of as spiritual adultery, to prevent which this song was penned. 2. It may be more easily taken in a spiritual sense by the Christian church, because the condescensions and communications of divine love appear more rich and free under the gospel than they did under the law, and the communion between heaven and earth more familiar. God sometimes spoke of himself as the husband of the Jewish church (Isa. liv. 5, Hos. ii. 16, 19), and rejoiced in it as his bride, Isa. lxii. 4, 5. But more frequently is Christ represented as the bridegroom of his church (Matt. xxv. 1, Rom. vii. 4, 2 Cor. xi. 2, Eph. v. 32), and the church as the bride, the Lamb's wife, Rev. xix. 7, xxi. 2, 9. The best key to this book is the 45th Psalm, which we find applied to Christ in the New Testament. It requires some pains to find out what is the meaning of the Holy Spirit in the several parts of this book; as David's songs are many of them level to the capacity of the meanest, and there are shallows in them in which a lamb may wade, so this of Solomon's will exercise the capacities of the most learned, and there are depths in it in which an elephant may swim.

CHAP. I

In this chapter, after the title of the book (ver. 1), we have Christ and his church, Christ and a believer, expressing their esteem for each other. I. The bride, the church, speaks to the bridegroom (ver. 2–4), to the daughters of Jerusalem (ver. 5, 6), and then to the bridegroom, ver. 7. II. Christ, the bridegroom, speaks in answer to the complaints and requests of his spouse, ver. 8–11. III. The church expresses the great value she has for Christ, and the delights she takes in communion with him, ver. 12–14. IV. Christ commends the church's beauty, ver. 15. V. The church returns the commendation, ver. 16, 17.

Verse 1

This book is a song to stir up the affections. It is evangelical; and gospel-times should be times of joy, for gospel-grace puts a new song into our mouths, Ps. xcviii. 1. The penman is Solomon. It is not the song of fools, as many of the songs of love are, but the song of the wisest of men; nor can any man give a better proof of his wisdom than to celebrate the love of God to mankind. Solomon's songs were a thousand and five (1 Kings iv. 32); those that were of other subjects are lost, but this of seraphic love remains. Solomon, like his father, was addicted to poetry, and, which way soever a man's genius lies, he should endeavour to honour God and edify the church with it. It is not certain when Solomon penned this sacred song. Some think that he penned it after he recovered himself by the grace of God from his backslidings. It is more probable that he penned it in the beginning of his time, while he kept close to God and kept up his communion with him. It is here fitly placed after Ecclesiastes; for when by that book we are thoroughly convinced of the vanity of the creature, and its insufficiency to satisfy us and make a happiness for us, we shall be quickened to seek for happiness in the love of Christ, and that transcendent pleasure which is to be found only in communion with God through him.

Verses 2–6

The spouse, in this dramatic poem, is here first introduced addressing herself to the bridegroom and then to the daughters of Jerusalem.

I. To the bridegroom, not giving him any name or title, but beginning abruptly: Let him kiss me. Two things the spouse desires,

1. The bridegroom's friendship (v. 2): "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth, that is, be reconciled to me, and let me know that he is so; let me have the tokens of his favour." Thus the Old Testament church desired Christ's manifesting himself in the flesh. "Let him no longer send to me, but come himself, no longer speak by angels and prophets, but let me have the word of his own mouth, those gracious words (Luke iv. 22), which will be to me as the kisses of his mouth, sure tokens of reconciliation, as Esau's kissing Jacob was." All gospel-grace is summed up in his kissing us, as the father of the prodigal kissed him when he returned a penitent. It is a kiss of peace. She gives several reasons for this desire. (1) Because of the great esteem she has for his love: Thy love is better than wine. Gracious souls take more pleasure in loving Christ and being beloved of him, in the fruits and gifts of his love, than any man ever took in the most exquisite delights of sense. (2) Because of the fragrancy of his love and the fruits of it (v. 3): "Because of the savour of thy good ointment (the agreeableness and acceptableness of thy graces and comforts to all that rightly understand both them and themselves), thy name is as ointment poured forth; thy very name is precious to all the saints; it is an ointment and perfume which rejoice the heart." (3) Because of the general affection that all holy souls have to him: Therefore do the virgins love thee. It is Christ's love shed abroad in our hearts that draws out all that are pure from the corruptions of sin. Those are the virgins that love Jesus Christ and follow him whithersoever he goes, Rev. xiv. 4. Christ is the darling of all the pure in heart.

2. The bridegroom's fellowship, v. 4.

(1) Her petition for divine grace: Draw me. "Draw me to thyself, draw me nearer, draw me home to thee." Christ has told us that none come to him but such as the Father draws, John vi. 44.

(2) Her promise to improve that grace: Draw me, and then we will run after thee. The flowing forth of the soul after Christ, and its ready compliance with him, are the effect of his grace; we could not run after him if he did not draw us, 2 Cor. iii. 5; Phil. iv. 13. When Christ pours out his Spirit upon the church in general, which is his bride, all the members of it do thence receive enlivening quickening influences.

(3) The immediate answer that was given to this prayer: The King has drawn me, has brought me into his chambers. It is not so much an answer fetched by faith from the word of Christ's grace as an answer fetched by experience from the workings of his grace. Those that are drawn to Christ are brought, not only into his courts, into his palaces (Ps. xlv. 15), but into his presence-chamber.

(4) Being brought into the chamber, "We have what we would have. Our desires are crowned with unspeakable delights; all our griefs vanish, and we will be glad and rejoice." All our joy shall centre in God: "We will rejoice, not in the ointments, or the chambers, but in thee. It is God only that is our exceeding joy, Ps. xliii. 4. We have no joy but in Christ."

(5) The communion which a gracious soul has with all the saints in this communion with Christ. In the chambers to which we are brought we not only meet with him, but meet with one another. Whatever differences of apprehension and affection there may be among Christians in other things, this they are all agreed in, Jesus Christ is precious to them.

II. To the daughters of Jerusalem, v. 5, 6. The believer speaks to those that were in the church, but not of it, or to weak Christians, babes in Christ, willing to be taught in the things of God. She observed these by-standers look disdainfully upon her because of her blackness, in respect both of sins and sufferings, upon account of which they thought she had little reason to expect the kisses she wished for (v. 2) or to expect that they should join with her in her joys, v. 4. She owns she is black. Guilt blackens; the heresies, scandals, and offences, that happen in the church, make her black; and the best saints have their failings. Sorrow blackens; that seems to be especially meant; the church is often mean, and poor, and despicable, her beauty sullied with weeping. She asserts her own comeliness notwithstanding (v. 5): I am black, but comely, black as the tents of Kedar, in which the shepherds lived, which were very coarse, and never whitened, weatherbeaten and discoloured by long use, but comely as the curtains of Solomon. The church is sometimes black with persecution, but comely in patience, constancy, and consolation. True believers are black in themselves, but comely in Christ, with the comeliness that he puts upon them, black outwardly, for the world knows them not, but all glorious within, Ps. xlv. 13.

The blackness was not natural, but contracted, and was owing to the hard usage that had been given her: Look not upon me so scornfully because I am black.

(1) I am black by reason of my sufferings: The sun has looked upon me. She was fair and comely; whiteness was her proper colour; but she got this blackness by the burden and heat of the day, which she was forced to bear. But what was the matter? She fell under the displeasure of those of her own house: My mother's children were angry with me. She was in perils by false brethren. The Samaritans, who claimed kindred to the Jews, were vexed at anything that tended to the prosperity of Jerusalem, Neh. ii. 10. They dealt very hardly with her: They made me the keeper of the vineyards, that is, "They seduced me to sin, drew me into false worships, to serve their gods, which was like dressing their vineyards." These are the grievances which good people complain most of in a time of persecution, that their consciences are forced. "They brought me into trouble, imposed that upon me which was toilsome, and very disgraceful." Keeping the vineyards was base servile work. Her mother's children made her the drudge of the family.

(2) "My sufferings are such as I have deserved; for my own vineyard have I not kept."

I. The humble petition which the spouse presents to her beloved, the shepherdess to the shepherd, the church and every believer to Christ, for a more free and intimate communion with him. She turns from the daughters of Jerusalem and looks up to heaven for relief, v. 7. 1. The title she gives to Christ: O thou whom my soul loveth. 2. The opinion she has of him as the good shepherd of the sheep; she doubts not but he feeds his flock and makes them rest at noon. Jesus Christ graciously provides both repast and repose for his sheep. Is it with God's people a noon-time of outward troubles, inward conflicts? Christ has rest for them. 3. Her request to him that she might be admitted into his society: Tell me, where thou feedest. "Tell me where to find thee, where I may have conversation with thee, where thou feedest and tendest thy flock, that there I may have some of thy company." 4. The plea she uses for the enforcing of this request: "For why should I be as one that turns aside by (or after) the flocks of thy companions, that pretend to be so, but are really thy competitors, and rivals with thee." Turning aside from Christ after other lovers is that which gracious souls dread. Good Christians will be afraid of giving any occasion to those about them to question their faith in Christ and their love to him.

II. The gracious answer which the bridegroom gives to this request, v. 8. See how ready God is to answer prayer. How affectionately he speaks to her: O thou fairest among women! Believing souls are fair, in the eyes of the Lord Jesus, above any other. How mildly he checks her for her ignorance, in these words, If thou know not. What! dost thou not know where to find me and my flock? Compare Christ's answer to a like address of Philip's (John xiv. 9), Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? With what tenderness he acquaints her where she might find him. Follow the track, ask for the good old way, observe the footsteps of the flock, and go forth by them. Sit under the direction of good ministers: "Feed thyself and thy kids beside the tents of the under-shepherds. Bring thy charge with thee; they shall all be welcome; the shepherds will be helpers, therefore abide by their tents." Those that would have acquaintance and communion with Christ must adhere to holy ordinances, must join themselves to his people. Those that have the charge of families must bring them with them to religious assemblies; let their kids, their children, their servants, have the benefit of the shepherds' tent.

III. The high encomiums which the bridegroom gives of his spouse. 1. He calls her his love (v. 9); it is an endearing compellation often used in this book:

"My friend, my companion, my familiar." 2. He compares her to a set of strong and stately horses in Pharaoh's chariots. Egypt was famous for the best horses. The church had complained of her own weakness, and the danger of being made a prey by her enemies: "Fear not," says Christ; "I have made thee like a company of horses; I have put strength into thee, so that thou shalt mock at fear. I have compared thee to my company of horses which triumphed over Pharaoh's chariots, the holy angels, horses of fire." 3. He admires the beauty and ornaments of her countenance (v. 10): Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, the attire of the head, curls of hair, or knots of ribbons; thy neck also with chains, such as persons of the first rank wear, chains of gold. The ordinances of Christ are the ornaments of the church. The graces, gifts, and comforts of the Spirit, are the adorning of every believing soul, and beautify it.

IV. His gracious purpose to add to her ornaments; for where God has given true grace he will give more grace. She shall be yet further beautified (v. 11): We will make thee borders of gold, inlaid, or enamelled, with studs of silver. The same that is the author will be the finisher of the good work; and it cannot miscarry.

Verses 12–17

Between Christ and his spouse endearments are exchanged.

I. Believers in communion with him.

1. The humble reverence believers have for Christ as their Sovereign, v. 12. He has fellowship with them and rejoices in them; he sits at his table to bid them welcome. When good Christians, in any religious duty, especially in the ordinance of the Lord's supper, where the King is pleased to sit with us at his own table, have their graces exercised, their hearts broken by repentance, healed by faith, and inflamed with holy love, then the spikenard sends forth the smell thereof.

2. The strong affection they have for Christ as their beloved, their well-beloved, v. 13. Christ is not only beloved by all believing souls, but is their well-beloved, their best-beloved, their only beloved. Christ is accounted a bundle of myrrh and a cluster of camphire, everything, that is pleasant and delightful. The doctrine of his gospel, and the comforts of his Spirit, are very refreshing to them, and they rest in his love. The word translated camphire is copher, the same word that signifies atonement or propitiation. Christ is a cluster of merit and righteousness to all believers; he is the propitiation for their sins. He shall lie all night between my breasts, near my heart. Christ lays the beloved disciples in his bosom; why then should not they lay their beloved Saviour in their bosoms?

II. Jesus Christ has a great love for his church and every true believer; they are amiable in his eyes (v. 15): Behold, thou art fair, my love; and again, Behold, thou art fair. He says this to show that there is a real beauty in holiness, that all who are sanctified are thereby beautified; they are truly fair. One instance of the beauty of the spouse is here mentioned, that she has doves' eyes, as ch. iv. 1. Those are fair, in Christ's account, who have, not the piercing eye of the eagle, but the pure and chaste eye of the dove, not like the hawk, who, when he soars upwards, still has his eye upon the prey on earth, but a humble modest eye, such an eye as discovers a simplicity and godly sincerity and a dove-like innocency, lightened and guided by the Holy Spirit.

III. The church expresses her value for Christ, and returns esteem for esteem (v. 16): Behold, thou art fair. Lord, saith the church, "Dost thou call me fair? I am fair no otherwise than as I have thy image stamped upon me. Thou art pleasant to all that are thine." Having expressed her esteem of her husband's person, she next, like a loving spouse, applauds the accommodations he had for her entertainment, his bed, his house, his rafters or galleries (v. 16), which may fitly be applied to those holy ordinances in which believers have fellowship with Jesus Christ, receive the tokens of his love and return their devout affections to him. These she calls ours, Christ and believers having a joint-interest in them. They are his institutions and their privileges; in them Christ and believers meet. All is ours if we are Christ's. Does the colour of the bed, and the furniture belonging to it, help to set it off? Our bed is green, a colour which, in a pastoral, is preferred before any other, because it is the colour of the fields and groves. The beams of our house are cedar (v. 17), which probably refers to the temple Solomon had lately built for communion between God and Israel, which was of cedar, a strong sort of wood, sweet, durable, and which will never rot, typifying the firmness and continuance of the church. The galleries for walking are of fir, or cypress, wood that was pleasing both to the sight and to the smell, intimating the delight which the saints take in walking with Christ. Everything in the covenant of grace is very firm, very fine, and very fragrant.

CHAP. II

In this chapter, I. Christ speaks both concerning himself and concerning his church, ver. 1, 2. II. The church speaks, 1. Remembering the pleasure and satisfaction she had in communion with Christ, ver. 3, 4. 2. Entertaining herself with the present tokens of his favour, ver. 5–7. 3. Triumphing in his approaches towards her, ver, 8, 9. 4. Repeating the gracious calls he had given her to go along with him walking, invited by the pleasures of the returning spring (ver. 10–13), out of her obscurity (ver. 14), and the charge he had given to the servants to destroy that which would be hurtful to his vineyard, ver. 15. 5. Rejoicing in her interest in him, ver. 16. 6. Longing for his arrival, ver. 17. Those whose hearts are filled with love to Christ, and hope of heaven, know best what these things mean.

Verses 1–2

I. He that is the Son of the Highest calls and owns himself the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys, to express his presence with his people in this world, the easiness of their access to him, and the beauty and sweetness which they find in him. The rose, for beauty and fragrancy, is the chief of flowers, and our Saviour prefers the clothing of the lily before that of Solomon in all his glory. Christ is the rose of Sharon, where the best roses grew, the rose of the field (so some), denoting that the gospel salvation lies open to all. He is not a rose locked up in a garden. He is a lily for whiteness, a lily of the valleys for sweetness. He is a lily of the valleys, or low places, in his humiliation. Humble souls see most beauty in him. To those that are in the valleys he is a lily.

II. His church is as a lily; he himself is the lily (v. 1). The beauty of believers consists in their resemblance to Jesus Christ. They are as lilies, for those are made like Christ in whose hearts his love is shed abroad. The church of Christ as far excels all other societies as a bed of roses excels a bush of thorns. As a lily, compassed with thorns. The wicked, the daughters of this world, such as have no love to Christ, are as thorns, worthless and useless, noxious and hurtful. God's people are as lilies among them, scratched and torn, shaded and obscured, by them; they are dear to Christ, and yet exposed to hardships and troubles.

Verses 3–7

I. The spouse commends her beloved and prefers him before all others: As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, useful and serviceable to man, yielding pleasant and profitable fruit, while the other trees are of little use, no, not the cedars themselves. till they are cut down, so is my beloved among the sons,

II. She remembers the abundant comfort she has had in communion with him: She sat down by him with great delight, as shepherds sometimes repose themselves. A double advantage she found in sitting down so near the Lord Jesus:—1. A refreshing shade: I sat down under his shadow. Christ is to believers as the shadow of a great tree. Those that are weary and heavily laden may find rest in Christ. We must sit down under this shadow with delight, must put an entire confidence in the protection of it. 2. Pleasing nourishing food. This tree drops its fruits to those that sit down under its shadow, and they will find them sweet unto their taste. Promises are sweet to a believer. Pardons are sweet, and peace of conscience is sweet, assurances of God's love, joys of the Holy Ghost, the hopes of eternal life, and the present foretastes of it are sweet, all sweet to those that have their spiritual senses exercised.

III. She owns herself obliged to Jesus Christ for all the benefit and comfort she had in communion with him (v. 4): " I sat down under the apple-tree, but he admitted me to a more intimate communion with him." He brought me to the house of wine. One of the rabbin by the banqueting-house understands the tabernacle of the congregation; surely then we may apply it to Christian assemblies, where the gospel is preached and gospel-ordinances are administered, particularly the Lord's supper, that banquet of wine. We should never have come into the banqueting-house, never have been acquainted with spiritual pleasures, if Christ had not brought us. His banner over me was love; he brought me in with a banner displayed over my head. The gospel is compared to a banner or ensign (Isa. xi. 12), and that which is represented in this banner is love, love; and this is the entertainment in the banqueting-house.

IV. She professes her strong affection and most passionate love to Jesus Christ (v. 5): I am sick of love, overcome, overpowered, by it. She cries out: "Oh stay me with flagons, or ointments, or flowers, anything that is reviving; comfort me with apples, with the fruits of that apple-tree, Christ (v. 3), with the merit and mediation of Christ and the sense of his love to my soul."

V. She experiences the power and tenderness of divine grace, relieving her in her present faintings, v. 6. Though he seemed to have withdrawn, yet he was even then a very present help. "His left hand is under my head, to bear it up, nay, as a pillow to lay it easy. For, in the meantime, his right hand embraces me, and thereby gives me an unquestionable assurance of his love." Believers owe all their strength and comfort to the supporting left hand and embracing right hand of the Lord Jesus.

VI. Finding her beloved thus nigh unto her she is in great care that her communion with him be not interrupted (v. 7): I charge you, O you daughters of Jerusalem. She gives them this charge by the roes and the hinds of the field, that is, by everything that is amiable in their eyes, and dear to them, as the loving hind and the pleasant roe. Those that experience the sweetness of communion with Christ cannot but desire the continuance of these blessed visits.

The church is here pleasing herself with the thoughts of her further communion with Christ.

I. She rejoices in his approach, v. 8. She hears him speak: "It is the voice of my beloved, calling to me to tell me he is coming." She sees him come. This may very well be applied to the prospect which the Old Testament saints had of Christ's coming in the flesh. Abraham saw his day at a distance, and was glad. Those that waited for the consolation of Israel with an eye of faith saw him come, and triumphed in the sight. He comes cheerfully; he comes leaping and skipping like a roe and like a young hart (v. 9), as one pleased and that had his delights with the sons of men. He comes surmounting all the difficulties that lay in his way; he comes leaping over the mountains, skipping over the hills, making nothing of discouragements. The curse of the law, the death of the cross, must be undergone, all the powers of darkness must be grappled with, but, before the resolutions of his love, these great mountains become plains. Whatever opposition is given at any time to the deliverance of God's church, Christ will break through it. He comes speedily, like a roe or a young hart; they thought the time long, but really he hastened.

II. She pleases herself with the glimpses she has of him: "He stands behind our wall; I know he is there, for sometimes he looks forth at the window, and displays himself through the lattice." Such was the state of the Old Testament church while it was in expectation of the coming of the Messiah. They had him near them; they had him with them, though they could not see him clearly. They saw him looking through the windows of the ceremonial institutions and smiling through those lattices; in their sacrifices and purifications Christ discovered himself to them, and gave them intimations and earnests of his grace. In the sacraments Christ is near us, but it is behind the wall of external signs, through those lattices he manifests himself to us; but we shall shortly see him as he is.

III. She repeats the gracious invitation he had given her to come walking with him, v. 10–13.

1. He called her his love and his fair one. Those that take Christ for their beloved, he will own as his; never was any love lost that was bestowed upon Christ.

2. He called her to rise and come away, v. 10, and again, v. 13.

3. He gave for a reason the return of the spring, and the pleasantness of the weather. The season is elegantly described. The winter is past, the dark, cold, and barren winter; they do not endure always. And the spring would not be so pleasant as it is if it did not succeed the winter, which is a foil to its beauty, Eccles. vii. 14. The rain is over and gone, the winter-rain, the cold stormy rain; it is over now, and the dew is as the dew of herbs. Thy flowers appear on the earth. All winter they are dead and buried in their roots, and there is no sign of them; but in the spring they revive, and show themselves in a wonderful variety and verdure. The time of the singing of birds has come. The little birds, which all the winter lie hid in their retirements and scarcely live, when the spring returns forget all the calamities of the winter, and to the best of their capacity chant forth the praises of their Creator. Doubtless he who understands the birds that cry for want (Ps. cxlvii. 9) takes notice of those that sing for joy, Ps. civ. 12. The voice of the turtle is heard in our land, which is one of the season-birds mentioned Jer. viii. 7, that observe the time of their coming and the time of their singing, and so shame us who understand not the times, nor sing in singing time. The fig-tree puts forth her green figs, by which we know that summer is nigh. Now this description of the returning spring, as a reason for coming away with Christ, is applicable to the introducing of the gospel in the room of the Old Testament dispensation, during which it had been winter time with the church. Christ's gospel warms that which was cold, makes that fruitful which before was dead and barren; when it comes to any place it puts a beauty and glory upon that place (2 Cor. iii. 7, 8). Spring-time is pleasant time, and so is gospel-time. The delivering of the church from the power of persecuting enemies is like spring after a winter of suffering and restraint. When the storms of trouble are over and gone, when the voice of the turtle, the joyful sound of the gospel of Christ, is again heard, and ordinances are enjoyed with freedom, then arise and come away, sing in the ways of the Lord. When the churches had rest, then were they edified, Acts ix. 31. The conversion of sinners from a state of nature to a state of grace is like the return of the spring, a universal change, a new creation; being born again. The soul that was hard, and cold, and frozen, and unprofitable, like the earth in winter, becomes fruitful, like the earth in spring, and by degrees, like it, brings its fruits to perfection. This blessed change is owing purely to the approaches and influences of the sun of righteousness. A child of God, under doubts and fears, is like the earth in winter, its nights long, its days dark. But comfort will return; the birds shall sing again, and the flowers appear. Arise therefore, poor drooping soul, and come away. The bones that lay in the grave, as the roots of plants in the ground during the winter, shall at the resurrection flourish as a herb, Isa. lxvi. 14; xxvi. 19. That will be an eternal farewell to winter and a joyful entrance upon an everlasting spring.

Verses 14–17

I. The invitation which Christ gives to the church, and every believing soul, to come into communion with him, v. 14.

1. David had called the church God's turtle-dove (Ps. lxxiv. 19), and so she is here called; a dove for beauty, for innocence and inoffensiveness; a gracious spirit is a dove-like spirit, loving quietness and cleanliness, and faithful to Christ, as the turtle to her mate. The Spirit descended like a dove on Christ, and so he does on all Christians, making them of a meek and quiet spirit.

2. This dove is in the clefts of the rock and in the secret places of the stairs. Christ is the rock, to whom she flies for shelter, as a dove in the hole of a rock, when struck at by the birds of prey, Jer. xlviii. 28. She retires into the secret places of the stairs, where she may be alone, and may the better commune with her own heart. Christ often withdrew to a mountain himself alone, to pray.

3. Christ calls her out of her retirements: Come, let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice.

4. For her encouragement, he tells her: Sweet is thy voice; thy praying voice is music in God's ears.

II. The charge which Christ gives to his servants to suppress that which is a terror to his church (v. 15): Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that creep in insensibly; for, though they are little, they spoil the vines, especially now when our vines have tender grapes that must be preserved, or the vintage will fail. Believers are as vines; their fruits are as tender grapes at first, which must have time to come to maturity. This charge to take the foxes is, 1. A charge to believers to mortify their own sinful appetites and passions, which are as foxes, little foxes, that destroy their graces, crush good beginnings, and prevent their coming to perfection. Seize the little foxes, the first risings of sin, those sins that seem little, for they often prove very dangerous. 2. A charge to all to oppose and prevent the spreading of such opinions and practices as tend to corrupt men's judgments, debauch their consciences, perplex their minds, and discourage their inclinations to virtue. Persecutors are foxes (Luke xiii. 32); false prophets are foxes, Ezek. xiii. 4. Those that sow the tares of heresy or schism, and obstruct the progress of the gospel, they are the foxes, the little foxes, which must be tamed, or restrained from doing mischief.

III. The profession which the church makes of her relation to Christ, and her interest in him and communion with him, v. 16. He had called her to rise and come away with him. Now this is her answer to that call:

1. She comforts herself with the thoughts of the relation between her and her beloved: My beloved is mine; this denotes propriety. Believers are partakers of Christ; they are taken not only into covenant, but into communion with him. All he has promised in the gospel, all he has prepared in heaven, all is yours.

2. She comforts herself with the thoughts of the communications of his grace to his people: He feeds among the lilies. He feeds among believers, that is, he takes pleasure in them and their assemblies.

IV. The church's hope and expectation of Christ's coming. 1. She doubts not but that the day will break and the shadows will flee away. The gospel-day will dawn, and the shadows of the ceremonial law will flee away. This was the comfort of the Old Testament church. Or it may refer to the second coming of Christ, and the eternal happiness of the saints. 2. She begs the presence of her beloved, in the meantime, to support and comfort her: "Turn, my beloved, come and visit me, be with me always to the end of the age. Come over even the mountains of division, with some gracious anticipations of that light and love."

CHAP. III

In this chapter, I. The church gives an account of a sore trial wherewith she was exercised through the withdrawing of her beloved from her, ver. 1–5. II. The daughters of Jerusalem admire the excellence of the church, ver. 6. III. The church admires Jesus Christ under the person of Solomon, his bed, and the life-guards about it (ver. 7, 8), his chariot, ver. 9, 10, 11.

Verses 1–5

It was hard to the Old Testament church to find Christ in the ceremonial law. Long was the consolation of Israel looked for before it came. At length Simeon had him in his arms whom his soul loved. It is applicable to the case of particular believers, who often walk in darkness, but those that seek Christ to the end shall find him at length.

I. How the spouse sought him in vain upon her bed (v. 1). She wanted the communion she used to have with him, as David when he thirsted for God, for the living God. She sought him, but she saw not her signs, and yet she sought them. She failed in her endeavour.

II. How she sought him in vain abroad, v. 2. And yet she is not driven off by the disappointment. She resolves, "I will rise now; I will not lie here if I cannot find my beloved here. I will rise now without delay, and seek him immediately, lest he withdraw further from me." Those that seek Christ must not startle at difficulties. "I will rise, and go about the city, the holy city, in the streets, and the broad-ways"; for she knew he was not to be found in any blind by-ways. We must seek in the city, in Jerusalem, which was a type of the gospel-church, in holy ordinances. She had a good purpose when she said, I will arise now, but the good performance was all in all. How heavy is the accent on this repeated complaint: I sought him, but I found him not!

III. How she enquired of the watchmen concerning him, v. 3. In the night the watchmen go about the city, for the preservation of its peace and safety; these met her in her walks, and she asked them if they could give her any tidings of her beloved. Gracious souls press through crowds of other delights in pursuit of Christ. Saw you him whom my soul loveth? We must search the scriptures, be much in prayer, keep close to ordinances, and all with this upon our heart, Saw you him whom my soul loveth? Those only who have seen Christ themselves are likely to direct others to a sight of him.

IV. How she found him at last, v. 4. She passed from the watchmen as soon as she perceived they could give her no tidings of her beloved. But soon after she parted from the watchmen she found him whom she sought. Those that continue seeking Christ shall find him at last, and when perhaps they were almost ready to despair of finding him. See Ps. xlii. 7, 8; lxxvii. 9, 10; Isa. liv. 7, 8.

V. How close she kept to him when she had found him. She is now as much in fear of losing him as before she was in care to find him. Those that hold Christ fast in the arms of faith and love shall not let him go; he will abide with them.

VI. How desirous she was to make others acquainted with him: "I brought him to my mother's house, that all my relations, all who are dear to me, might have the benefit of communion with him." Wherever we find Christ we must take him home with us to our houses, especially to our hearts. The church is our mother, and we should be concerned for her interests, that she may have Christ present with her.

VII. What care she was in that no disturbance might be given him (v. 5); she repeats the charge she had before given (ch. ii. 7) to the daughters of Jerusalem not to stir up or awake her love. Let all clamour and bitterness be put far from you, for that grieves the Holy Spirit of God, Eph. iv. 30, 31. Some make this to be Christ's charge not to disturb his church, nor trouble the minds of the disciples.

These are the words of the daughters of Jerusalem, to whom the charge was given, v. 5. They had looked shyly upon the bride because she was black (ch. i. 6); but now they admire her, and speak of her with great respect: Who is this? How beautiful she looks! Who would have expected such a person to come out of the wilderness? This is applicable to the Jewish church, when, after forty years' wandering in the wilderness, they came out of it, to take possession of the land of promise. Balaam said when he stood admiring them: From the top of the rocks I see him. How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob! Num. xxiii. 9; xxiv. 5. It is also applicable to the recovery of a gracious soul out of a state of desertion and despondency. She ascends out of the wilderness, the dry and barren land, like pillars of smoke, like a cloud of incense ascending from the altar. This intimates a fire of pious and devout affections in the soul. Christ's return to the soul gives life to its devotion, and its communion with God is most reviving when it ascends out of a wilderness. She is perfumed with myrrh and frankincense. She is replenished with the graces of God's Spirit, which are as sweet spices, or as the holy incense. Who is this? What a monument of mercy is this! The graces and comforts with which she is perfumed are called the powders of the merchant, for they are dear-bought, by our Lord Jesus, that blessed merchant, who took a long voyage, and was at vast expense, no less than that of his own blood, to purchase them for us.

Verses 7–11

The daughters of Jerusalem stood admiring the spouse and commending her, but she transfers all the glory to Christ, and directs them to look from her to him. Here he is three times called Solomon. It is Christ that is here meant, who is greater than Solomon, and of whom Solomon was an illustrious type for his wisdom and especially his building the temple.

Three things she admires:

I. The safety of his bed (v. 7): Behold his bed, even Solomon's, very rich and fine; for such the curtains of Solomon were. Christ's bed, though he had not where to lay his head, is better than Solomon's. The church is his bed, for he has said of it, This is my rest for ever; here will I dwell. The hearts of believers are his bed, for he lies all night between their breasts, Eph. iii. 17. That which she admires his bed for is the guard that surrounded it. Those that rest in Christ not only dwell at ease (many do so who yet are in the greatest danger) but they dwell in safety. This bed had threescore valiant men about it, as yeoman of the guard, well armed: They all hold swords, and know how to hold them; they are expert in war. They are in a posture of defence, every man with his sword upon his thigh and his hand upon his sword, ready to draw upon the first alarm, and this because of fear in the night, and the apprehension which the spouse may have of danger. These guards are set for her satisfaction, that she may be quiet from the fear of evil, which believers themselves are subject to, when they are under a cloud as to their spiritual state. Christ himself was under the special protection of his Father; he had legions of angels at his command. The church is well guarded; more are with her than against her. All the attributes of God are engaged for the safety of believers; his peace protects those in whom it rules (Phil. iv. 7). Our danger is from the rulers of the darkness of this world, but we are safe in the armour of light.

II. The splendour of his chariot, v. 9, 10. This chariot was of Solomon's own contriving and making, the materials very rich, silver, and gold, and cedar, and purple. Some by this chariot (the word is nowhere else used in scripture) understand the human nature of Christ, in which the divine nature rode as in an open chariot. It was a divine workmanship (A body hast thou prepared me); the structure was very fine, but that which was at the bottom of it was love, pure love to the children of men. Others make it to represent the everlasting gospel, in which, as in an open chariot, Christ shows himself. The pillars are of silver, for the words of the Lord are as silver tried (Ps. xii. 6). It is hung with purple, a princely colour; all the adornings of it are dyed in the precious blood of Christ. But that which completes the glory of it is love; It is paved with love, it is lined with love, love of the daughters of Jerusalem, a holy love. Silver is better than cedar, gold than silver, but love is better than gold, better than all, and it is put last, for nothing can be better than that. The gospel is all love.

III. The lustre of his royal person, when he appears in his greatest pomp, v. 11. The call that is given to the daughters of Zion: Go forth, and behold him. Christ, in his gospel, manifests himself. Let each of us add to the number of those that give honour to him. Look with pleasure upon Christ in his glory. Look upon him with an eye of faith, with a fixed eye. Take notice of his crown, either the crown of gold, adorned with jewels, which he wore on his coronation-day, or the garland or crown of flowers and green tied with ribbons which his mother made for him, to adorn the solemnity of his nuptials. Applying this to Christ: Go forth, and see king Jesus, with the crown wherewith his Father crowned him, when he declared him his beloved Son, in whom he was well-pleased, when he set him as King upon his holy hill of Zion. Some apply it to the crown of thorns with which his mother, the Jewish church, crowned him on the day of his death, which was the day of his espousals to his church, when he loved it, and gave himself for it (Eph. v. 25). It seems especially to mean the honour done him by his church, as his mother, and by all true believers. When believers accept of him as theirs, and join themselves to him in an everlasting covenant, it is his coronation-day in their souls. Before conversion they were crowning themselves, but then they begin to crown Christ, and continue to do so from that day forward. It is the day of his espousals, in which he betroths them to him for ever in loving-kindness and in mercies. It is the day of the gladness of his heart; he is pleased with the honour that his people do him.

CHAP. IV

In this chapter, I. Jesus Christ, having espoused his church to himself (ch. iii. 11), highly commends her beauty, ver. 1–5, and again, ver. 7. II. He retires himself, and invites her with him, from the mountains of terror to those of delight, ver. 6, 8. III. He professes his love to her, ver. 9–14. IV. She ascribes all she had that was valuable in her to him, ver. 15, 16.

Verses 1–7

I. A particular account of the beauties of the church, and of gracious souls on whom the image of God is renewed, consisting in the beauty of holiness. Those that honour Christ he will honour, 1 Sam. ii. 30.

1. He does not flatter her, but encourages her under her present dejections. She was espoused to him, and that made her beautiful.

2. As to the representation here made of the beauty of the church, the images are certainly very bright, the shades strong, and the comparisons bold. Seven particulars are specified, a number of perfection, for the church is enriched with manifold graces by the seven spirits that are before the throne, Rev. i. 4; 1 Cor. i. 5, 7.

(1) Her eyes. A good eye contributes much to beauty: Thou hast doves' eyes, clear and chaste, and often cast up towards heaven. Wisdom and knowledge are the eyes of the new man; they must be clear, but not haughty, not exercised in things too high for us. When our aims and intentions are sincere and honest, then we have doves' eyes. The doves' eyes are within the locks, which are as a shade upon them. They cannot fully see. As long as we are here in this world we know but in part.

(2) Her hair; it is compared to a flock of goats, which looked white, and were, on the top of the mountains, like a fine head of hair. Some by the hair here understand the outward conversation of a believer, which ought to be comely, and decent, and agreeable to the holiness of the heart.

(3) Her teeth, v. 2. Ministers are the church's teeth; like nurses, they chew the meat for the babes of Christ. These are here compared to a flock of sheep. Christ called his disciples and ministers a little flock. It is the praise of teeth to be even, to be white, and kept clean, like sheep from the washing.

(4) Her lips; these are compared to a thread of scarlet, v. 3. Red lips are comely, and a sign of health, as the paleness of the lips is a sign of faintness and weakness. When we praise God with our lips, and with the mouth make confession of him to salvation, then they are as a thread of scarlet. All our good works and good words must be washed in the blood of Christ, dyed like the scarlet thread, and then they are acceptable to God.

(5) Her temples, or cheeks, which are here compared to a piece of a pomegranate, a fruit which, when cut in two, has rich veins or specks in it, like a blush in the face. Humility and modesty, blushing at the remembrance of sin and in a sense of our unworthiness of the honour put upon us, will beautify us very much in the eyes of Christ.

(6) Her neck; this is here compared to the tower of David, v. 4. This is generally applied to the grace of faith, by which we are united to Christ, as the body is united to the head by the neck; this is like the tower of David, furnishing us with weapons of war, especially bucklers and shields, as the soldiers were supplied with them out of that tower, for faith is our shield (Eph. vi. 16): those that have it never want a buckler, for God will compass them with his favour as with a shield.

(7) Her breasts; these are like two young roes that are twins, v. 5. The church's breasts are the breasts of her consolation (Isa. lxvi. 11). Some apply these to the two Testaments; others to the two sacraments, the seals of the covenant of grace; others to ministers, who are to be spiritual nurses to the children of God and to give out to them the sincere milk of the word, that they may grow thereby, and, in order to that, are themselves to feed among the lilies where Christ feeds (ch. ii. 16).

II. The bridegroom's resolution hereupon to retire to the mountain of myrrh (v. 6) and there to make his residence. This mountain of myrrh is supposed to signify Mount Moriah, on which the temple was built, where incense was daily burnt to the honour of God. Christ's parting promise to his disciples, as the representatives of the church, answers to this: Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world. Where the ordinances of God are duly administered there Christ will be. The holy hill (as some observe) is here called both a mountain of myrrh, which is bitter, and a hill of frankincense, which is sweet, for there we have occasion both to mourn and rejoice; repentance is a bitter sweet. But in heaven it will be all frankincense, and no myrrh.
